CONTENTS

OF THE SECOND VOLUME.

TEN SERMONS,

BEING

A SUPPLEMENT OF THE ΕΝΙΑΥΤΟΣ.

PAGE

The Righteousness Evangelical 3

Matt. v. 20.

For I say unto you, that except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.

SERMON II.

The Christian's Conquest over the Body of Sin . 11

Rom. vii. 19.

For the good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do.

SERMON III.

Faith working by Love 19

James ii. 24.

Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.

SERMON IV.

Preached at an Episcopal Consecration . . 29

Luke xii. 42, 43.

And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward, whom his Lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season? Blessed is that servant whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing.

SERMON V.

Preached at the opening of the Parliament of Ireland 40

1 Sam. xv. 22, 23.

Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams:—For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry.

SERMON VI.

Via Intelligentiæ 52

John vii. 17.

If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself.

SERMON VII.

Preached at the Funeral of the Lord Primate of Ireland 66

PAGE

1 Cor. xv. 23.

But every man in his own order; Christ the first-fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming.

SERMON VIII.

Countess of Carbery's Funeral Sermon . . 79

2 Sam. xiv. 14.

For we must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again: neither doth God respect any person; yet doth he devise means that his banished be not expelled from him.

SERMON IX.

Preached upon the Anniversary of the Gunpowder Treason 91

Luke ix. 54.

But when James and John saw this, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did?

SERMON X. XI.

The Minister's Duty in Life and Doctrine . 111, 120

Tit. ii. 7, 8.

In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works: in doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity; sound speech that cannot be condemned, that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you.

SERMON XII.

Sir George Dalston's Funeral Sermon . . 130

1 Cor. xv. 19.

If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

OF THE SACRED ORDER AND OFFICES

OF EPISCOPACY 146

SECTION I.

Christ did institute a Government in his Church . 149

SECTION II.

This Government was first committed to the Apostles by Christ 151

PAGE

SECTION III.

With a Power of joining others, and appointing Successors in the Apostolate 151

SECTION IV.

The Succession into the ordinary Office of Apostolate is made by Bishops 152

SECTION V.

And Office 153

SECTION VI.

Which Christ himself hath made distinct from Presbyters 154

SECTION VII.

Giving to Apostles a power to do some Offices perpetually necessary, which to others he gave not . 154

SECTION VIII.

And Confirmation 155

SECTION IX.

And superiority of Jurisdiction 157

SECTION X.

So that Bishops are Successors in the Office of Apostleship, according to the general Tenet of Antiquity 161

SECTION XI.

And particularly of St. Peter 162

SECTION XII.

And the Institution of Episcopacy, as well as the Apostolate, expressed to be Divine, by primitive Authority 164

SECTION XIII.

In pursuance of the Divine Institution, the Apostles did ordain Bishops in several Churches . . 166

SECTION XIV.

St. Timothy, at Ephesus 167

SECTION XV.

St. Titus, at Crete 170

SECTION XVI.

St. Mark, at Alexandria 172

SECTION XVII.

St. Linus and St. Clement, at Rome 173

SECTION XVIII.

St. Polycarp, at Smyrna, and divers others . . 174

SECTION XIX.

So that Episcopacy is, at least, an Apostolical Ordinance; of the same Authority with many other Points generally believed 174

SECTION XX.

And was an Office of Power and great Authority . 175

SECTION XXI.

Not lessened by the Assistance and Counsel of Presbyters 175

SECTION XXII.

And all this hath been the Faith and Practice of Christendom 181

SECTION XXIII.

Who first distinguished Names, used before in common 181

SECTION XXIV.

Appropriating the word "Episcopus" or Bishop to the Supreme Church-officer 184

SECTION XXV.

Calling the Bishop, and him only, the Pastor of the Church 186

PAGE

SECTION XXVI.

And Doctor 187

SECTION XXVII.

And Pontifex 189

SECTION XXVIII.

And these were a distinct Order from the rest . 190

SECTION XXIX.

To which the Presbyterate was but a Degree . . 190

SECTION XXX.

There being a peculiar Manner of Ordination to a Bishopric 191

SECTION XXXI.

To which Presbyters never did assist by imposing Hands 191

SECTION XXXII.

For Bishops had a Power distinct and superior to that of Presbyters. As of Ordination . . . 194

SECTION XXXIII.

And Confirmation 200

SECTION XXXIV.

And Jurisdiction. Which they expressed in Attributes of Authority and great Power . . . 203

SECTION XXXV.

Requiring Universal Obedience to be given to Bishops by Clergy and Laity 204

SECTION XXXVI.

Appointing them to be Judges of the Clergy and Spiritual Causes of the Laity 206

SECTION XXXVII.

Forbidding Presbyters to officiate without Episcopal License 214

SECTION XXXVIII.

Reserving Church-Goods to Episcopal Dispensation . 218

SECTION XXXIX.

Forbidding Presbyters to leave their own Diocess, or to travel, without leave of the Bishop . . 218

SECTION XL.

And the Bishop had Power to prefer which of his Clerks he pleased 218

SECTION XLI.

Bishops only did vote in Councils, and neither Presbyters nor People 222

SECTION XLII.

SECTION XLIII.

Their Jurisdiction was over many Congregations, or Parishes 226

SECTION XLIV.

And was aided by Presbyters, but not impaired . 230

SECTION XLV.

So that the Government of the Church by Bishops was believed necessary 233

SECTION XLVI.

For they are Schismatics, that separate from their Bishop 234

SECTION XLVII.

And Hereti s 235

SECTION XLVIII.

And Bishops were always in the Church, Men of great Honour 236

PAGE

SECTION XLIX.

And trusted with Affairs of Secular Interest . 240

SECTION L.

And therefore were enforced to delegate the Power, and put others in Substitution . . . 245

SECTION LI.

But they were ever Clergymen, for there never were any Lay Elders in any Church-Office heard of in the Church 247

IN

PREACHED AT CHRIST-CHURCH, DUBLIN.

TO THE

MOST NOBLE AND VIRTUOUS PRINCESS,

THE

LADY DUCHESS OF ORMOND,

MADAM,

I PRESENT your Grace herewith a testimony of my obedience, and of your own zeal for the good of souls. You were in your great charity, not only pleased to pardon the weakness of this discourse, but to hope it might serve as a memorial to those that need it, of the great necessity of living virtuously, and by the measures of christianity. Madam, you are too great and too good to have any ambition for the things of this world; but I cannot but observe, that in your designs for the other world, you, by your charity and zeal, adopt yourself into the portion of those ecclesiastics, who humbly hope, and truly labour, for the reward that is promised to those wise persons who convert souls, if our prayers and your desires that every one should be profited in their eternal concerns, cast in a symbol towards this great work, and will give you a title to that great reward; but, Madam, when I received your commands for dispersing some copies of this sermon, I perceived it was too little to be presented to your eminence; and if it were accompanied with something else of the like nature, it might, with more profit, advance that end which your Grace so piously designed; and, therefore, I have taken this opportunity to satisfy the desire of some very honourable and very reverend personages, who required that the two following sermons should also be made fit for the use of those, who hoped to receive profit by them. I humbly lay them all at your Grace's feet, begging of God, that even as many may receive advantages by the perusing of them, as either your Grace will desire, or he that preached them did intend. And if your Grace will accept of this first testimony of my concurrence with all the world that know you, in paying those great regards, which your piety so highly merits, I will endeavour hereafter, in some greater instance, to pursue the intentions of your zeal of souls, and, by such a service, endeavour to do more benefit to others, and by it, as by that which is most acceptable to your Grace, endear the obedience and services of,

MADAM,

Your Grace's most humble

And obedient Servant,

JER. DOWN.

THREE SERMONS.

SERMON I.

THE RIGHTEOUSNESS EVANGELICAL DESCRIBED.

For I say unto you, that except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.—Matt. v. 20.

Rewards and punishments are the best sanction of laws; and although the guardians of laws strike sometimes with the softest part of the hand in their executions of sad sentences, yet in the sanction they make no abatements, but so proportion the duty to the reward, and the punishment to the crime, that by these we can best tell what value the lawgiver puts upon the obedience. Joshua put a great rate upon the taking of Kiriath-Sepher, when the reward of the service was his daughter and a dower. But when the young men ventured to fetch David the waters of Bethlehem, they had nothing but the praise of their boldness, because their service was no more than the satisfaction of a curiosity. But as lawgivers, by their rewards, declare the value of the obedience, so do subjects also, by the grandeur of what they expect, set a value on the law and the lawgiver, and do their services accordingly.

And, therefore, the law of Moses, whose endearment was nothing but temporal goods and transient evils, "could never make the comers thereunto perfect;" but the ἐπεισαγωγὴ κρείττονος ἐλπίδος, "the superinduction of a better hope,"[a] hath endeared a more perfect obedience. When Christ brought life and immortality to light through the gospel, and hath promised to us things greater than all our explicit desires, bigger than the thoughts of our heart, then ἐγγίζομεν τῷ Θεῷ, saith the apostle, "then we draw near to God;" and by these we are enabled to do all that God requires, and then he requires all that we can do; more love and more obedience than he did of those who,—for want of these helps, and these revelations, and these promises, which we have, but they had not,—were but imperfect persons, and could do but little more than human services. Christ hath taught us more, and given us more, and promised to us more, than ever was in the world known or believed before him; and by the strengths and confidence of these, thrusts us forward in a holy and wise economy; and plainly declares, that we must serve him by the measures of a new love, do him honour by wise and material glorifications, be united to God by a new nature, and made alive by a new birth, and fulfil all righteousness; to be humble and meek as Christ, to be merciful as our heavenly Father is, to be pure as God is pure, to be partakers of the Divine nature, to be wholly renewed in the frame and temper of our mind, to become people of a new heart, a direct new creation, new principles, and a new being, to do better than all the world before us ever did, to love God more perfectly, to despise the world more generously, to contend for the faith more earnestly; for all this is but a proper and a just consequent of the great promises, which our blessed Lawgiver came to publish and effect for all the world of believers and disciples.

The matter which is here required, is certainly very great; for it is to be more righteous than the scribes and Pharisees; more holy than the doctors of the law, than the leaders of the synagogue, than the wise princes of the sanhedrim; more righteous than some that were prophets and high priests, than some that kept the ordinances of the law without blame; men that lay in sackcloth, and fasted much, and prayed more, and made religion and the study of the law the work of their lives: this was very much; but christians must do more.

> Nunc te marmoreum pro tempore fecimus; at tu
> Si fœtura gregem suppleverit, aureus esto.

They did well, and we must do better; their houses were marble, but our roofs must be gilded and fuller of glory. But as the matter is very great, so the necessity of it is the greatest in the world. It must be so, or it will be much worse: unless it be thus, we shall never see the glorious face of God. Here it concerns us to be wise and fearful; for the matter is not a question of an oaken garland, or a circle of bays, and a yellow riband: it is not a question of money or land; nor of the vainer rewards of popular noises, and the undiscerning suffrages of the people, who are contingent judges of good and evil: but it is the great stake of life eternal. We cannot be christians, unless we be righteous by the new measures: the righteousness of the kingdom is now the only way to enter into it; for the sentence is fixed, and the judgment is decretory, and the Judge infallible, and the decree irreversible: "For I say unto you," said Christ, "unless your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Here, then, we have two things to consider. 1. What was the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees. 2. How far that is to be exceeded by the righteousness of christians.

1. Concerning the first. I will not be so nice

in the observation of these words, as to take notice that Christ does not name the Sadducees, but the scribes and Pharisees, though there may be something in it: the Sadducees were called "Caraim," from cara, "to read;" for they thought it religion to spend one third part of their day in reading their Scriptures, whose fulness they so admired, they would admit of no suppletory traditions: but the Pharisees were called "Thanaim," that is, δευτερώται, they added to the word of God words of their own, as the church of Rome does at this day; they and these fell into an equal fate; while they "taught for doctrines the commandments of men," they prevaricated the righteousness of God: what the church of Rome, to evil purposes, hath done in this particular, may be demonstrated in due time and place; but what false and corrupt glosses, under the specious title of the tradition of their fathers, the Pharisees had introduced, our blessed Saviour reproves, and are now to be represented as the ἀντιπαράδειγμα, that you may see that righteousness, beyond which all they must go, that intend that heaven should be their journey's end.

1. The Pharisees obeyed the commandments in the letter, not in the spirit: they minded what God spake, but not what he intended: they were busy in the outward work of the hand, but incurious of the affections and choice of the heart. Ὑμεῖς πάντα σαρκικῶς νενοήκατε, said Justin Martyr to Tryphon the Jew, "Ye understand all things carnally;" that is, they rested ἐν πλάσματι εὐσεβείας, as Nazianzen calls it, "in the outward work of piety," which not only Justin Martyr but St. Paul calls "carnality," not meaning a carnal appetite, but a carnal service.[b] Their error was plainly this: they never distinguished duties natural from duties relative; that is, whether it were commanded for itself, or in order to something that was better; whether it were a principal grace, or an instrumental action: so God was served in the letter, they did not much inquire into his purpose: and, therefore, they were curious to wash their hands, but cared not to purify their hearts; they would give alms, but hate him that received it; they would go to the temple, but did not revere the glory of God that dwelt there between the cherubims; they would fast, but not mortify their lusts; they would say good prayers, but not labour for the grace they prayed for. This was just as if a man should run on his master's errand, and do no business when he came there. They might easily have thought, that by the soul only a man approaches to God, and draws the body after it; but that no washing or corporal services could unite them and the shechinah together, no such thing could make them like to God, who is the Prince of Spirits. They did as the dunces in Pythagoras's school, who,—when their master had said "Fabis abstineto," by which he intended—"they should not ambitiously seek for magistracy,"—they thought themselves good Pythagoreans if they "did not eat beans;" and they would be sure to put their right foot first into the shoe, and their left foot into the water, and supposed they had done enough; though if they had not been fools, they would have understood their master's meaning to have been, that they should put more affections to labour and travel, and less to their pleasure and recreation; and so it was with the Pharisee: for as the Chaldees taught their morality by mystic words, and the Egyptians by hieroglyphics, and the Greeks by fables; so did God by rites and ceremonies external, leading them by the hand to the purities of the heart, and by the services of the body to the obedience of the spirit; which because they would not understand, they thought they had done enough in the observation of the letter.

2. In moral duties, where God expressed himself more plainly, they made no commentary of kindness, but regarded the prohibition so nakedly, and divested of all antecedents, consequents, similitudes, and proportions, that if they stood clear of that hated name which was set down in Moses's tables, they gave themselves liberty, in many instances, of the same kindred and alliance. If they abstained from murder, they thought it very well, though they made no scruple of murdering their brother's fame; they would not cut his throat, but they would call him fool, or invent lies in secret, and publish his disgrace openly: they would not dash out his brains, but they would be extremely and unreasonably angry with him: they would not steal their brother's money, but they would oppress him in crafty and cruel bargains. The commandment forbade them to commit adultery; but because fornication was not named, they made no scruple of that; and being commanded to honour their father and their mother, they would give them good words and fair observances; but because it was not named that they should maintain them in their need, they thought they did well enough to pretend "corban," and let their father starve.

3. The scribes and Pharisees placed their righteousness in negatives: they would not commit what was forbidden, but they cared but little for the included positive, and the omissions of good actions did not much trouble them; they would not hurt their brother in a forbidden instance, but neither would they do him good according to the intention of the commandment. It was a great innocence if they did not rob the poor,—then they were righteous men; but they thought themselves not much concerned to acquire that godlike excellency, a philanthropy and love to all mankind. Whosoever blasphemed God was to be put to death; but he that did not glorify God as he ought, they were unconcerned for him, and let him alone. He that spake against Moses, was to die without mercy; but against the ambitious and the covetous, against the proud man and the unmerciful they made no provisions.

> Virtus est vitium fugere, et sapientia prima > Stultitiâ caruisse. HOR.

They accounted themselves good, not for doing good, but for doing no evil; that was the sum of their theology.

4. They had one thing more as bad as all this:

[b] Gal. iii. 3. and vi. 12, 13. Phil. iii. 31.

they broke Moses's tables into pieces, and, gathering up the fragments, took to themselves what part of duty they pleased, and let the rest alone; for it was a proverb among the Jews, "Qui operam dat præcepto, liber est à præcepto;" that is, "if he chooses one positive commandment for his business, he may be less careful in any of the rest." Indeed, they said also, "Quis multiplicat legem, multiplicat vitam;" "He that multiplies the law, increases life;" that is, if he did attend to more good things, it was so much the better, but the other was well enough; but as for universal obedience, that was not the measure of their righteousness; for they taught that God would put our good works and bad into the balance, and according to the heavier scale, give a portion in the world to come; so that some evil they would allow to themselves and their disciples, always provided it was less than the good they did. They would devour widows' houses, and make it up by long prayers; they would love their nation, and hate their prince; offer sacrifice, and curse Cæsar in their heart; advance Judaism, and destroy humanity.

Lastly: St. Austin summed up the difference between the Pharisaical and evangelical righteousness in two words; "Brevis differentia inter legem et evangelium; timor et amor." They served the God of their fathers "in the spirit of fear," and we worship the Father of our Lord Jesus "in the spirit of love," and by the spirit of adoption. And as this slavish principle of theirs was the cause of all their former imperfections, so it finally and chiefly expressed itself in these two particulars:—1. They would do all that they thought they lawfully could do. 2. They would do nothing but what was expressly commanded.

This was the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, and their disciples, the Jews;[c] which, because our blessed Saviour reproves, not only as imperfect then, but as criminal now, calling us on to a new righteousness, the righteousness of God, to the law of the Spirit of life, to the kingdom of God, and the proper righteousness thereof,—it concerns us in the next place to look after the measures of this, ever remembering that it is infinitely necessary that we should do so; and men do not generally know, or not consider, what it is to be a christian; they understand not what the christian law forbiddeth or commandeth. But as for this in my text, it is indeed our great measure; but it is not a question of good and better, but of good and evil, life and death, salvation and damnation; for unless our righteousness be weighed by new weights, we shall be found too light, when God comes to weigh the actions of all the world; and unless we be more righteous than they, we "shall in nowise," that is, upon no other terms in the world, "enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Now concerning this, we shall do very much amiss, if we take our measures by the manners and practices of the many who call themselves christians; for there are, as Nazianzen expresses it, the οἱ τότε καὶ νῦν Φαρισαῖοι, "the old and the new Pharisees." I wish it were no worse amongst us; and that all christians were indeed righteous as they were; "est aliquid prodire tenus:" it would not be just nothing. But I am sure that to bid defiance to the laws of Christ, to laugh at religion, to make a merriment at the debauchery and damnation of our brother, is a state of evil worse than that of the scribes and Pharisees; and yet, even among such men, how impatient would they be, and how unreasonable would they think you to be, if you should tell them, that there are no present hopes or possibility, that, in this state they are in, they can be saved!

> Omnes videmur nobis esse belluli
> Et festivi saperdæ, cùm simus σαπρόι. VAR.

But the world is too full of christians, whose righteousness is very little, and their iniquities very great; and now-a-days, a christian is a man that comes to church on Sundays, and on the week following will do shameful things; being, according to the Jewish proverbial reproof, as so many Mephibosheths: "discipuli sapientum, qui incessu pudefaciunt præceptorem suum;" "their master teaches them to go uprightly, but they still show their lame leg, and shame their master;" as if a man might be a christian, and yet be the vilest person in the world, doing such things for which the laws of men have provided smart and shame, and the laws of God have threatened the intolerable pains of an insufferable and never-ending damnation. Example here cannot be our rule, unless men were much better; and as long as men live at the rate they do, it will be to little purpose to talk of exceeding the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees; but because it must be much better with us all, or it will be very much worse with us at the latter end, I shall leave complaining, and go to the rule, and describe the necessary and unavoidable measures of the righteousness evangelical, without which we can never be saved.

> Passim corvos sequitur, testâque lutoque
> Securus quo pes ferat, atque ex tempore vivit;

1. Therefore, when it is said our "righteousness must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees," let us first take notice, by way of precognition, that it must at least be so much; we must keep the letter of the whole moral law; we must do all that lies before us, all that is in our hand: and therefore ὀργιάζεσθαι, which signifies "to be religious," the grammarians derive ἀπὸ τοῦ χεῖρας ὀρέγεσθαι, "from reaching forth the hand:" the outward work must be done; and it is not enough to say, "My heart is right, but my hand went aside." Prudentius saith, that St. Peter wept so bitterly, because he did not confess Christ openly, whom he loved secretly.

> Flevit negator denique
> Ex ore prolapsum nefas,
> Cùm mens maneret innocens,
> Animusque servârit fidem.

A right heart alone will not do it; or rather, the heart is not right, when the hand is wrong. "If a man strikes his neighbour, and says, Am not I in jest? it is folly and shame to him," said Solomon. For, once for all, let us remember this, that christianity is the most profitable, the most useful, and the most bountiful institution in the whole world; and the best definition I can give of it is this;—It is the wisdom of God brought down among us, to do good to men, and therefore we must not do less than the Pharisees, who did the outward work; at least, let us be sure to do all the work that is laid before us in the commandments. And it is strange that this should be needful to be pressed amongst christians, whose religion requires so very much more. But so it is, upon a pretence that we must serve God with the mind, some are such fools as to think that it is enough to have a good meaning. "Iniquum perpol verbum est, 'bene vult,' nisi qui bene facit." And because we must serve God in the spirit, therefore they will not serve God with their bodies; and because they are called upon to have the power and the life of godliness, they abominate all external works as mere forms; and because the true fast is to abstain from sin, therefore they will not abstain from meat and drink, even when they are commanded; which is just as if a Pharisee, being taught the circumcision of the heart, should refuse to circumcise his flesh; and as if a christian, being instructed in the excellencies of spiritual communion, should wholly neglect the sacramental; that is, because the soul is the life of man, therefore it is fitting to die in a humour, and lay aside the body. This is a taking away the subject of the question; for our inquiry is,—how we should keep the commandments? how we are to do the work that lies before us, by what principles, with what intention, in what degrees, after what manner, "ut bonum bene fiat," "that the good thing be done well." This, therefore, must be presupposed: we must take care that even our bodies bear a part in our spiritual services. Our voice and tongue, our hands and our feet, and our very bowels must be servants of God, and do the work of the commandments.

This being ever supposed, our question is, how much more we must do? and the first measure is this,—whatsoever can be signified and ministered to by the body, the heart and the spirit of a man must be the principal actor. We must not give alms without a charitable soul, nor suffer martyrdom, but in love and in obedience; and when we say our prayers, we do but mispend our time, unless our mind ascend up to God upon the wings of desire.

Desire is the life of prayer; and if you indeed desire what you pray for, you will also labour for what you desire; and if you find it otherwise with yourselves, your coming to church is but like the Pharisees going up to the temple to pray. If your heart be not present, neither will God; and then there is a sound of men and women between a pair of dead walls, from whence, because neither God nor your souls are present, you must needs go home without a blessing.

But this measure of evangelical righteousness is of principal remark in all the rites and solemnities of religion; and intends to say this, that christian religion is something that is not seen, it is the hidden man of the heart; ἐστὶ τὶς Θεὸς ἔνδον, "it is God that dwells within;" and true christians are men, who, as the Chaldee oracle said, are πολὺν ἐσσάμενοι νοῦν, "clothed with a great deal of mind." And, therefore, those words of the prophet Hosea, "Et loquar ad cor ejus," "I will speak unto his heart," is a proverbial expression, signifying to speak spiritual comforts, and, in the mystical sense, signifies εὐαγγελίζειν, "to preach the gospel:" where the Spirit is the preacher, and the heart is the disciple, and the sermon is of righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Our service to God must not be in outward works and scenes of religion, it must be something by which we become like to God; the Divine prerogative must extend beyond the outward man, nay, even beyond the mortification of corporal vices; the Spirit of God must go "in trabis crassitudinem," and mollify all our secret pride, and ingenerate in us a true humility, and a christian meekness of spirit, and a Divine charity. For in the gospel, when God enjoins any external rite or ceremony, the outward work is always the less principal. For there is a bodily and a carnal part, an outside, and a cabinet of religion in christianity itself. When we are baptized, the purpose of God is, that we cleanse ourselves from all pollution of the flesh and spirit, and then we are, indeed, καθαροὶ ὅλοι, "clean all over." And when we communicate, the commandment means that we should be made one spirit with Christ, and should live on him, believing his word, praying for his Spirit, supported with his hope, refreshed by his promises, recreated by his comforts, and wholly, and in all things, conformable to his life; that is the true communion. The sacraments are not made for sinners, until they do repent; they are the food of our souls, but our souls must be alive unto God, or else they cannot eat. It is good to "confess our sins," as St. James says, and to open our wounds to the ministers of religion; but they absolve none but such as are truly penitent.

Solemn prayers, and the sacraments, and the assemblies of the faithful, and fasting days, and acts of external worship, are the solemnities and rites of religion: but the religion of a christian is in the heart and spirit. And this is that by which Clemens Alexandrinus defined the righteousness of a christian, Δικαιοσύνη συμφωνία τῶν τῆς ψυχῆς μερῶν· "all the parts and faculties that make up a man, must make up our religion:" but the heart is "domus principalis," it is "the court" of the great King; and he is properly served with interior graces and moral virtues, with a humble and a good mind, with a bountiful heart, and a willing soul, and these will command the eye, and give laws to the hand, and make the shoulders stoop; but "anima cujusque est quisque;" "a man's soul is the man," and so is his religion; and so you are bound to understand it.

True it is, God works in us his graces by the sacrament; but we must dispose ourselves to a reception of the Divine blessing by moral instruments.

The soul is συνεργὸς τῷ Θεῷ, "it must work together with God;" and the body works together with the soul: but no external action can purify the soul, because, its nature and operations being spiritual, it can no more be changed by a ceremony or an external solemnity, than an angel can be caressed with sweetmeats, or a man's belly with music or long orations. The sum is this: no christian does his duty to God but he that serves him with all his heart: and although it becomes us to fulfil all righteousness, even the external also; yet that which makes us gracious in his eyes, is not the external, it is the love of the heart and the real change of the mind and obedience of the spirit; that is the first great measure of the righteousness evangelical.

2. The righteousness evangelical must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees by extension of our obedience to things of the same signification: "Leges non ex verbis, sed ex mente intelligendas," says the law.[d] There must be a commentary of kindness in the understanding the laws of Christ. We must understand all God's meaning; we must secure his service, we must be far removed from the dangers of his displeasure. And, therefore, our righteousness must be the purification and the perfection of the spirit. So that it will be nothing for us not to commit adultery, unless our eyes and hands be chaste, and the desires be clean. A christian must not look upon a woman to lust after her. He must hate sin in all dimensions, and in all instances, and in every angle of its reception. A christian must not sin, and he must not be willing to sin if he durst. He must not be lustful, and therefore he must not feed high, nor drink deep, for these make provisions for lust: and, amongst christians, great eatings and drinkings are acts of uncleanness as well as of intemperance, and whatever ministers to sin, and is the way of it; it partakes of its nature and its curse.

For it is remarkable that in good and evil the case is greatly different. Mortification (e. g.) is a duty of christianity; but there is no law concerning the instruments of it. We are not commanded to roll ourselves on thorns, as St. Benedict did; or to burn our flesh, like St. Martinian; or to tumble in snows, with St. Francis; or in pools of water, with St. Bernard. A man may chew aloes, or lie upon the ground, or wear sackcloth, if he have a mind to it, and if he finds it good in its circumstances and to his purposes of mortification; but, it may be, he may do it alone by the instrumentalities of fear and love; and so the thing be done, no special instrument is under a command. But although the instruments of virtue are free, yet the instruments and ministries of vice are not. Not only the sin is forbidden, but all the ways that lead to it. The instruments of virtue are of themselves indifferent, that is, not naturally, but good only for their relation's sake, and in order to their end. But the instruments of vice are of themselves vicious; they are part of the sin, they have a share in the fantastic pleasure, and they begin to estrange a man's heart from God, and are directly in the prohibition. For we are commanded to fly from temptation, to pray against it, "to abstain from all appearances of evil," "to make a covenant with our eyes," "to pluck them out" if there be need. And if christians do not understand the commandments to this extension of signification, they will be innocent only by the measures of human laws, but not by the righteousness of God.

3. Of the same consideration it is also that we understand Christ's commandments to extend our duty, not only to what is named, and what is not named of the same nature and design; but that we abstain from all such things as are like to sins. Of this nature there are many. All violences of passion, irregularities in gaming, prodigality of our time, indecency of action, doing things unworthy of our birth or our profession, aptness to go to law; "ambitus," or a fierce prosecution even of honourable employments; misconstruction of the words and actions of our brother; easiness to believe evil of others, willingness to report the evil which we hear; curiosity of diet, peevishness towards servants, indiscreet and importune standing for place, and all excess in ornaments; for even this little instance is directly prohibited by the christian and royal law of charity. For ἀγάπη οὐ περπερεύεται, saith St. Paul; the word is a word hard to be understood; we render it well enough, "charity vaunteth not itself;" and upon this St. Basil says, that an ecclesiastic person (and so every christian in his proportion) ought not to go in splendid and vain ornaments; Πᾶν γὰρ ὁ μὴ διὰ χρείαν, ἀλλὰ διὰ καλλωπισμὸν παραλαμβάνεται περπερείας ἔχει κατηγορίαν· "Every thing that is not wisely useful or proportioned to the state of the christian, but ministers only to vanity, is a part of this περπερεύεσθαι," it is a "vaunting," which the charity and the grace of a christian does not well endure. These things are like to sins; they are of a suspicious nature, and not easily to be reconciled to the righteousness evangelical. It is no wonder if christianity be nice and curious; it is the cleanness and the purification of the soul, and Christ intends to present his church to God ἄσπιλον καὶ ἀμώμητον, "without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing." N. B. or any such thing. If there be any irregularity that is less than a wrinkle, the evangelical righteousness does not allow it. These are such things which if men will stand to defend, possibly a modest reprover may be more ashamed than an impudent offender. If I see a person apt to quarrel, to take every thing in an ill sense, to resent an error deeply, to reprove it bitterly, to remember it tenaciously, to repeat it frequently, to upbraid it unhandsomely, I think I have great reason to say, that this person does not do what becomes the sweetness of a christian spirit. If it be replied, It is no where forbidden to chide an offending person, and that it cannot be a fault to understand when a thing is said or done amiss; I cannot return an answer, but by saying, that suppose nothing of it were a sin, yet that every thing of it is so like a sin, that it is the worse for it; and that it were better not to do so; at least I think so, and so ought you too, if you be curious of your eternal interest: a little more tenderness here would do well. I cannot say that this dress, or this garment, or this standing for place, is the direct sin of pride; but I am sure it looks like it in some persons; at least the letting it alone is much better, and is very like humility. And certain it is, that he is dull of hearing who understands not the voice of God, unless it be clamorous in an express and a loud commandment, proclaimed with trumpets and clarions upon mount Sinai; but a willing and an obedient ear understands the still voice of Christ, and is ready to obey his meaning at half a word; and that is the righteousness evangelical. It not only abstains from sins named, and sins implied, but from the beginnings and instruments of sin; and from whatsoever is like it. The Jews were so great haters of swine upon pretensions of the Mosaic rites, that they would not so much as name a swine, but called it דבר אחר daber acher, another thing. And thus the Romans, in their auguries, used "alterum" for "non bonum." The simile of this St. Paul translates to a christian duty: "Let not fornication be so much as named amongst you, ὡς πρέπον ἐν τοῖς ἁγίοις, as is comely amongst christians;" that is, come not near a foul thing; speak not of it, let it be wholly banished from all your conversation; for this niceness and curiosity of duty "becometh saints," and is an instance of the righteousness evangelical.

I have now done with the first sort of measures of the christian righteousness; these which are the matter of our negative duty; these are the measures of our caution and our first innocence. But there are greater things behind, which although I must crowd up into a narrow room, yet I must not wholly omit them: therefore,

4. The fourth thing I shall note to you is, that whereas the righteousness of the Pharisees was but a fragment of the broken tables of Moses; the pursuance of some one grace, "lacinia sanctitatis," "a piece of the robe of righteousness;" the righteousness evangelical must be like Christ's seamless coat, all of a piece from the top to the bottom; it must invest the whole soul: Misma, Dumah, Massah, said the proverb of the Rabbins; it is this, and it is the other, and it must be all, it must be a universal righteousness;[c] not a little knot of holy actions scattered in our lives, and drawn into a sum at the day of judgment, but it must be a state of holiness. It was said of the Paphlagonian pigeons, διπλῆν ὁρᾶσθαι τὴν καρδίαν, "every one of them had two hearts;" but that in our mystical theology signifies a wicked man. So said Solomon, "the perverse or wicked man (derachaim) he is a man of two ways; ἀνὴρ δίψυχος, so St. James expresses an unbeliever; a man that will and will not; something he does for God, and something for the world; he hath two minds: and in a good fit, in his well days he is full of repentance, and overflows in piety; but the paroxysm will return in the day of temptation, and then he is gone infallibly. But know this, that in the righteousness evangelical, one duty cannot be exchanged for another, and three virtues will not make amends for one remaining vice. He that oppresses the poor cannot make amends by giving good counsel; and if a priest be simoniacal, he cannot be esteemed righteous before God by preaching well, and taking care of his charge. To be zealous for God and for religion is good, but that will not legitimate cruelty to our brother. It is not enough for a man to be a good citizen, unless he be also a good man; but some men build their houses with half a dozen cross sticks, and turf is the foundation, and straw is the covering, and they think they dwell securely; their religion is made up of two or three virtues, and they think to comute with God, some good for some bad, πολλὰ μεμιγμένα, πολλὰ δὲ αἰσχρὰ· as if one deadly wound were not enough to destroy the most healthful constitution in the world. Deceive not yourselves. It is all one on which hand we fall:

> ———Unum operantur
> Et calor et frigus, sic hoc, sic illud adurit;
> Sic tenebræ visum, sic sol contrarius aufert.

The moon may burn us by night as well as the sun by day: and a man may be made blind by the light of the sun as well as by the darkness of the evening, and any one great mischief is enough to destroy one man. Some men are very meek and gentle naturally, and that they serve God withal, they pursue the virtue of their nature: that is, they tie a stone at the bottom of the well, and that is more than needs; the stone will stay there without that trouble; and this good inclination will of itself easily proceed to issue; and, therefore, our care and caution should be more carefully employed in mortification of our natures, and acquist of such virtues to which we are more refractory, and then cherish the other too, even as much as we please: but, at the same time we are busy in this, it may be, we are secret adulterers, and that will spoil our confidences in the goodness of the other instance: others are greatly bountiful to the poor, and love all mankind, and hurt nobody but themselves; but it is a thousand pities to see such loving good-natured persons to perish infinitely by one crime, and to see such excellent good things thrown away to please an uncontrolled and a stubborn lust; but so do some escape out of a pit, and are taken in a trap at their going forth: and stepping aside to avoid the hoarfrost, fall into a valley full of snow. The righteousness evangelical is another kind of thing: it is a holy conversation, a godlike life, an universal obedience, a keeping nothing back from God, a sanctification of the whole man, and keeps not the body only, but the soul and the spirit, unblamable to the coming of the Lord Jesus.

5. And lastly: the pharisaical righteousness was the product of fear, and, therefore, what they must needs do, that they would do; but no more: but the righteousness evangelical is produced by love, it is managed by choice, and cherished by delight and fair experiences. Christians are a willing people; "homines bonæ voluntatis," "men of good will;" arbores Domini:" so they are mystically represented in Scripture; "the trees of the Lord are full of sap:" among the Hebrews the trees of the Lord did signify such trees as grew of themselves; and all that are of God's planting, are such as have a vital principle within, and grow without constraint. Πείθονται τοῖς ὡρισμένοις νόμοις, καὶ τοῖς ἰδίοις βιοῖς νικῶσι τοὺς νόμους, one said it of christians: "They obey the laws, and by the goodness of their lives exceed the laws;" and certain it is, no man hath the righteousness evangelical, if he resolves always to take all his liberty in every thing that is merely lawful; or if he purposes to do no more than he must needs, that is, no more than he is just commanded. For the reasons are plain.

1. The christian that resolves to do every thing that is lawful, will many times run into danger and inconvenience; because the utmost extremity of lawful is so near to that which is unlawful, that he will often pass into unlawful undiscernibly. Virtues and vices have not, in all their instances, a great landmark set between them, like warlike nations separate by prodigious walls, vast seas, and portentous hills; but they are oftentimes like the bounds of a parish; men are fain to cut a cross upon the turf, and make little marks and annual perambulations for memorials: so it is in lawful and unlawful, by a little mistake a man may be greatly ruined. He that drinks till his tongue is as full as a sponge, and his speech a little stammering and tripping, hasty and disorderly, though he be not gone as far as drunkenness, yet he is gone beyond the severity of a christian; and when he is just past into unlawful, if he disputes too curiously, he will certainly deceive himself for want of a wiser curiosity.

But 2. He that will do all that he thinks he may lawfully, had need have an infallible guide always by him, who should, without error, be able to answer all cases of conscience, which will happen every day in a life so careless and insecure; for if he should be mistaken, his error is his crime, and not his excuse. A man in this case had need be very sure of his proposition; which because he cannot be, in charity to himself, he will quickly find that he is bound to abstain from all things that are uncertainly good, and from all disputable evils, from things which, although they may be in themselves lawful, yet, accidentally, and that from a thousand causes, may become unlawful. "Pavidus quippe et formidolosus est christianus," saith Salvian, "atque in tantum peccare metuens, ut interdum et non timenda formidet:" "A christian is afraid of every little thing; and he sometimes greatly fears that he hath sinned, even then when he hath no other reason to be afraid, but because he would not do so for all the world."

3. He that resolves to use all his liberty, cannot be innocent, so long as there are in the world so many bold temptations, and presumptuous actions, so many scandals, and so much ignorance in the things of God, so many things that are suspicious, and so many things that are of evil report; so many ill customs and disguises in the world, with which if we resolve to comply in all that is supposed lawful, a man may be in the regions of death, before he perceive his head to ache; and, instead of a staff in his hand, may have a splinter in his elbow.

4. Besides all this; he that thus stands on his terms with God, and so carefully husbands his duty, and thinks to make so good a market of obedience, that he will quit nothing which he thinks he may lawfully keep, shall never be exemplar in his life, and shall never grow in grace, and therefore shall never enter into glory. He, therefore, that will be righteous by the measures evangelical, must consider not only what is lawful, but what is expedient; not only what is barely safe, but what is worthy; that which may secure, and that which may do advantage to that concern that is the greatest in the world.

And 2. The case is very like with them that resolve to do no more good than is commanded them. For 1. It is infinitely unprofitable as to our eternal interest, because no man does do all that is commanded at all times; and, therefore, he that will not sometimes do more, besides that he hath no love, no zeal of duty, no holy fires in his soul; besides this, I say, he can never make any amends towards the reparation of his conscience. "Let him that stole, steal no more;" that is well; but that is not well enough; for he must, if he can, make restitution of what he stole, or he shall never be pardoned; and so it is in all our intercourse with God. To do what is commanded is the duty of the present; we are tied to this in every present, in every period of our lives; but, therefore, if we never do any more than just the present duty, who shall supply the deficiencies, and fill up the gaps, and redeem what is past? This is a material consideration in the righteousness evangelical.

But then, 2. We must know that in keeping of God's commandments, every degree of internal duty is under the commandments; and, therefore, whatever we do, we must do it as well as we can. Now he that does his duty with the biggest affection he can, will also do all that he can; and he can never know that he hath done what is commanded, unless he does all that is in his power. For God hath put no limit but love and possibility; and therefore whoever says, Hither will I go, and no further; this I will do, and no more; thus much will I serve God, but that shall be all; he hath the affections of a slave, and the religion of a Pharisee, the craft of a merchant, and the falseness of a broker; but he hath not the proper measures of the righteousness evangelical. But so it happens in the mud and slime of the river Borborus, when the eye of the sun hath long dwelt upon it, and produces frogs and mice which begin to move a little under a thin cover of its own parental matter, and if they can get loose to live half a life, that is all; but the hinder parts, which are not formed before the setting of the sun, stick fast in their beds of mud, and the little moiety of a creature dies before it could be well said to live; so it is with those christians, who will do all that they think lawful, and will do no more than what they suppose necessary; they do but peep into the light of the Sun of righteousness; they have the beginnings of life; but their hinder parts, their passions and affections, and the desires of the lower man, are still unformed; and he that dwells in this state, is just so much of a christian, as a sponge is of a plant, and a mushroom of a shrub; they may be as sensible as an oyster, and discourse at the rate of a child, but are greatly short of the righteousness evangelical.

I have now done with those parts of the christian righteousness, which were not only an ὑπεροχὴ, or, "excess," but an ἀντιστοιχείωσις to the pharisaical: but because I ought not to conceal any thing from you that must integrate our duty, and secure our title to the kingdom of heaven; there is this to be added, that this precept of our blessed Saviour is to be extended to the direct degrees of our duty. We must do more duties, and we must do them better. And in this, although we can have no positive measures, because they are potentially infinite, yet therefore we ought to take the best, because we are sure the greatest is not too big; and we are not sure that God will accept a worse, when we can do a better. Now although this is to be understood of the internal affection only, because that must never be abated, but God is at all times to be loved and served with all our heart; yet concerning the degrees of external duty, as prayers, and alms, and the like, we are certainly tied to a greater excellency in the degree, than was that of the scribes and Pharisees. I am obliged to speak one word for the determination of this inquiry, viz. to how much more of external duty christians are obliged, than was in the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees. In order to this, briefly thus.

I remember that Salvian, speaking of old men summing up their repentances, and making amends for the sins of their whole life, exhorts them to alms and works of piety; but inquiring how much they should do towards the redeeming of their souls, answers with a little sarcasm, but plainly enough to give a wise man an answer: "A man," says he, "is not bound to give away all his goods, unless, peradventure, he owes all to God; but, in that case, I cannot tell what to say; for then the case is altered. A man is not bound to part with all his estate; that is, unless his sins be greater than his estate; but if they be, then he may consider of it again, and consider better. And he need not part with it all, unless pardon be more precious to him than his money, and unless heaven be worth it all, and unless he knows justly how much less will do it. If he does, let him try his skill, and pay just so much and no more than he owes to God; but if he does not know, let him be sure to do enough." His meaning is this: not that a man is bound to give all he hath, and leave his children beggars; he is bound from that by another obligation. But as when we are tied to pray continually, the meaning is, we should consecrate all our time by taking good portions out of all our time for that duty; the devoutest person being like the waters of Siloam,[f] a perpetual spring, but not a perpetual current; that is always in readiness, but actually thrusting forth his waters at certain periods every day. So out of all our estate we must take for religion and repentance such portions as the whole estate can allow; so much as will consecrate the rest; so much as is fit to bring when we pray for a great pardon, and deprecate a mighty anger, and turn aside an intolerable fear, and will purchase an excellent peace, and will reconcile a sinner. Now in this case a christian is to take his measures according to the rate of his contrition and his love, his religion and his fear, his danger and his expectation, and let him measure his amends wisely; his sorrow pouring in, and his fear thrusting it down, and it were very well, if his love also would make it run over. For, deceive not yourselves, there is no other measure but this; so much good as a man does, or so much as he would do, if he could,—so much of religion, and so much of repentance he hath, and no more: and a man cannot ordinarily know that he is in a savable condition, but by the testimony which a divine philanthropy and a good mind always gives, which is to omit no opportunity of doing good in our several proportions and possibilities.

There was an alms which the scribes and Pharisees were obliged by the law to give, the tenth of every third year's increase; this they always paid, and this sort of alms is called δικαιοσύνη, "righteousness" or "justice;" but the alms which christians ought to give, is χάρις, and it is ἀγάπη, it is "grace," and it is "love," and it is abundance; and so the old rabbins told: "Justitia propriè dicitur in iis quæ jure facimus; benignitas in iis quæ præter jus." It is more than righteousness, it is bounty and benignity, for that is the christian measure. And so it is in the other parts and instances of the righteousness evangelical. And, therefore, it is remarkable that the saints in the Old Testament were called εὐθεῖς, "right men;" and the book of Genesis, as we find it twice attested by St. Jerome, was called by the ancient Hellenists, βίβλος εὐθέων, "the book of right or just men," the book of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.[g] But the word for christians is χρηστοὶ, "good" men, harmless, and profitable; men that are good, and men that do good. In pursuance of which it is further observed by learned men, that the word ἀρετὴ, or "virtue," is not in the four gospels; for the actions of Christ's disciples should not be in "gradu virtutis" only, virtuous and laudable; such as these Aristotle presses in his "Magna Moralia;" they must pass on to a further excellency than so: the same which he calls πράξεις τῶν ἡρώων, they must be sometimes, and as often as we can, in "gradu heroico;" or, that I may use the christian style, they must be "actions of perfection." "Righteousness" was the συνώνυμον for "alms" in the Old Testament,—and τελειότης, or "perfection," was the word for "alms" in the New; as appears by comparing the fifth of St. Matthew and the sixth of St. Luke together; and that is the full state of this difference in the inquiries of the righteousness pharisaical and evangelical.

I have many more things to say, but ye cannot hear them now, because the time is past. One thing indeed were fit to be spoken of, if I had any time left; but I can only name it, and desire your consideration to make it up. This great rule that Christ gives us, does also, and that principally too, concern churches and commonwealths, as well as every single christian. Christian parliaments must exceed the religion and government of the sanhedrim. Your laws must be more holy, the condition of the subjects be made more tolerable, the laws of Christ must be strictly enforced; you must not suffer your great Master to be dishonoured, nor his religion dismembered by sects, or disgraced by impiety: you must give no impunity to vicious persons, and you must take care that no great example be greatly corrupted; you must make better provisions for your poor than they did, and take more care even of the external advantages of Christ's religion and his ministers, than they did of the priests and Levites; that is, in all things you must be more zealous to promote the kingdom of Christ, than they were for the ministries of Moses.

The sum of all is this: the righteousness evangelical is the same with that, which the ancients called ἀποστολικὴν διάγειν πολίτειαν, "to live an apostolical life;" that was the measure of christians; the οἱ ἐναρέτως καὶ ϑεαρέστως βιοῦντες, "men that desired to please God;" that is, as Apostolius most admirably describes it,[h] men who are curious of their very eyes, temperate in their tongue, of a mortified body, and an humble spirit, pure in their intentions, masters of their passions; men who, when they are injured, return honourable words; when they are lessened in their estates, increase in their charity; when they are abused, they yet are courteous, and give entreaties; when they are hated, they pay love; men that are dull in contentions, and quick in loving-kindnesses, swift as the feet of Asahel,[i] and ready as the chariots of Amminadib.[k] True christians are such as are crucified with Christ, and dead unto all sin, and finally place their whole love on God, and, for his sake, upon all mankind: this is the description of a christian, and the true state of the righteousness evangelical; so that it was well said of Athenagoras, Οὐδεὶς χριστιανὸς πονηρὸς, εἰ μὴ ὑποκρίνεται τὸν λόγον, "No christian is a wicked man, unless his life be a continual lie,"[l] unless he be false to God and his religion. For the righteousness of the gospel is, in short, nothing else but a transcript of the life of Christ: "De matthana nahaliel; de nahaliel Bamoth," said R. Joshua; Christ is the image of God, and every christian is the image of Christ, whose example is imitable; but it is the best, and his laws are the most perfect, but the most easy; and the promises by which he invites our greater services, are most excellent, but most true; and the rewards shall be hereafter, but they shall abide for ever; and, that I may take notice of the last words of my text, the threatenings to them that fall short of this righteousness, are most terrible, but most certainly shall come to pass; "they shall never enter into the kingdom of heaven;" that is, their portion shall be shame and an eternal prison, ἀσφαλτῶδες ῥεῦμα, "a flood of brimstone," and a cohabitation with devils to eternal ages; and if this consideration will not prevail, there is no place left for persuasion, and there is no use of reason, and the greatest hopes and the greatest fears can be no argument or sanction of laws; and the greatest good in the world is not considerable, and the greatest evil is not formidable: but if they be, there is no more to be said; if you would have your portion with Christ, you must be righteous by his measures: and these are they that I have told you of.

SERMON II.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CONQUEST OVER THE BODY OF SIN.

For the good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do.—Rom. vii. 19.

WHAT the eunuch said to Philip, when he read the book of the prophet Isaiah, "Of whom speaketh the prophet this, of himself, or some other man?" the same question I am to ask concerning the words of my text: Does St. Paul mean this of himself, or of some other? It is hoped that he speaks it of himself; and means, that though his understanding is convinced that he ought to serve God, and that he hath some imperfect desires to do so, yet the law of God without is opposed by a law of sin within. We have a corrupted nature, and a body of infirmity, and our reason dwells in the dark, and we must go out of the world before we leave our sin. For besides that some sins are esteemed brave and honourable, and he is a baffled person that dares not kill his brother like a gentleman; our very tables are made a snare, and our civilities are direct treasons to the soul. You cannot entertain your friend, but excess is the measure; and that you may be very kind to your guest, you step aside, and lay away the christian; your love cannot be expressed, unless you do him an ill turn, and civilly invite him to a fever. Justice is too often taught to bow to great interests, and men cannot live without flattery: and there are some trades that minister to sin, so that without a sin we cannot maintain our families; and if you mean to live, you must do as others do. Now so long as men see they are like to be undone by innocence, and that they can no way live but by compliance with the evil customs of the world, men conclude practically, because they must live, they must sin; they must live handsomely, and, therefore, must do some things unhandsomely, and so upon the whole matter sin is unavoidable. Fain they would, but cannot tell how to help it. But since it is no better, it is well it is no worse. For it is St. Paul's case, no worse man: he would and he would not, he did and he did not; he was willing, but he was not able; and, therefore, the case is clear, that if a man strives against sin, and falls unwillingly, it shall not be imputed to him; he may be a regenerate man for all that. A man must, indeed, wrangle against sin when it comes, and, like a peevish lover, resist and consent at the same time, and then all is well; for this not only consists with, but is a sign of the state of regeneration.

If this be true, God will be very ill served. If it be not true, most men will have but small hopes of being saved, because this is the condition of most men. What then is to be done? Truth can do us no hurt; and, therefore, be willing to let this matter pass under examination; for if it trouble us now, it will bring comfort hereafter. And, therefore, before I enter into the main inquiry, I shall, by describing the state of the man of whom St. Paul speaks here, tell you plainly, who it is that is in this state of sad things; and then do ye make your resolutions, according as you shall find it necessary for the saving of your souls, which, I am sure, ought to be the end of all preaching.

1. The man St. Paul speaks of, is one that is "dead,"[a] one that was "deceived" and "slain,"[b] one in whom "sin was exceeding sinful,"[c] that is, highly imputed, greatly malicious, infinitely destructive: he is one who is "carnal, and sold under sin;"[d] he is one that sins against his "conscience and his reason;"[e] he is one in whom "sin dwells," but the Spirit of God does not dwell; for "no good thing dwells in him;"[f] he is one who is "brought into captivity to the law of sin;" he is a servant of uncleanness, with his "flesh and members serving the law of sin."[g] Now if this be a state of regeneration, I wonder what is, or can be, a state of reprobation! for though this be the state of nature, yet it cannot be the state of one redeemed by the Spirit of Christ; and, therefore, flatter not yourselves any more, that it is enough for you to have good desires and bad performances: never think that any sin can reign in you, and yet you be servants of God; that sin can dwell in you, and at the same time the Spirit of God can dwell in you too; or that life and death can abide together. The sum of affairs is this: "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye, through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live;"[h] but not else upon any terms whatsoever.

My text is one of the hard places of St. Paul, which, as St. Peter says, "the ignorant and the unstable wrest to their own damnation." But because in this case the danger is so imminent, and the deception would be so intolerable, St. Paul, immediately after this chapter, (in which, under his own person, as was usual with him to do, he describes the state of a natural man advanced no further than Moses's law, and not redeemed by the blood of Christ, or enlightened by the Spirit of God, and taught by the wiser lessons and sermons of the gospel,) immediately spends the next chapter in opposing the evangelical state to the legal, the spiritual to the carnal, the christian to the natural; and tells us plainly, he that is redeemed by the blood of Christ, is redeemed from the power of sin: he that is Christ's freed-man, is not a slave of sin, not captive to the devil at his will: he that is in "the flesh, cannot please God," but every servant of Christ is freed from sin, and is a servant of righteousness, and redeemed from all his vain conversation: for this is the end of Christ's coming, and cannot be in vain, unless we make it so. He came to bless us by turning every one of us from our iniquities. Now concerning this, besides the evidence of the thing itself, that St. Paul does not speak these words of himself, but by a μετασχηματισμὸς, under his own borrowed person he describes the state of a carnal, unredeemed, unregenerate person, is expressly affirmed by St. Irenæus and Origen, by Tertullian and St. Basil, by Theodoret and St. Chrysostom, by St. Jerome, and sometimes by St. Austin, by St. Ambrose and St. Cyril, by Macarius and Theophylact; and is indeed that true sense and meaning of these words of St. Paul, which words none can abuse or misunderstand, but to the great prejudice of a holy life, and the patronage of all iniquity.

But for the stating of this great case of conscience, I shall first in short describe to you what are the proper causes, which place men and keep them in this state of a necessity of sinning; and 2. I shall prove the absolute necessity of coming out of this condition, and quitting all our sin. 3. In what degree this is to be effected. 4. By what instruments this is to be done; and all these being practical, will, of themselves, be sufficient use to the doctrines, and need no other applicatory but a plain exhortation.

1. What are the causes of this evil, by which we are first placed, and so long kept, in a necessity of sinning, so that we cannot do what good we would, nor avoid the evil that we hate?

The first is the evil state of our nature. And, indeed, he that considers the daily experiment of his own weak nature, the ignorance and inconstancy of his soul, being like a sick man's legs, or the knees of infants, reeling and unstable by disease or by infirmity, and the perpetual leaven and germinations, the thrustings forth and swelling of his senses, running out like new wine into vapours and intoxicating activities, will readily confess, that though even in nature there may be many good inclinations to many instances of the Divine commandments; yet it can go no further than this "velleity," this desiring to do good, but is not able. And it is upon this account that Lactantius brings in the pagan or natural man complaining, "Volo equidem non peccare, sed vincor, indutus enim sum carne fragili et imbecillâ." This is very true; and I add only this caution: there is not in the corruption of our nature so much as will save us harmless, or make us excusable, if we sin against God. Natural corruption can make us criminal, but not innocent; for though by him that willingly abides in the state of mere nature, sin cannot be avoided, yet no man is in that state longer than he loves to be so; for the grace of God came to rescue us from this evil portion, and is always present, to give us a new nature, and create us over again: and, therefore, though sin is made necessary to the natural man by his impotency and fond loves, that is, by his unregenerate nature; yet, in the whole constitution of affairs, God hath more than made it up by his grace, if we will make use of it. "In pueris elucet spes plurimorum, quæ ubi emoritur ætate, manifestum est, non defecisse naturam, sed curam," said Quintilian.[i] We cannot tell what we are, or what we think, in our infancy; and, when we can know our thoughts, we can easily observe that we have learned evil things by evil examples, and the corrupt manners of an evil conversation: "Et ubi per socordiam vires, tempus, ingenium defluxêre, naturæ infirmitas accusatur;"[k] that, indeed, is too true: "We grow lazy, and wanton, and we lose our time, and abuse our parts, and do ugly things, and lay the fault wholly upon our natural infirmities:" but we must remember, that, by this time, it is a state of nature, a state of flesh and blood, which cannot enter into heaven. The natural man and the natural child are not the same thing in true divinity. The natural child indeed can do no good; but the natural man cannot choose but do evil; but it is because he will do so; he is not born in the second birth, and renewed in the baptism of the Spirit.

2. We have brought ourselves into an accidental necessity of sinning by the evil principles, which are sucked in by great parts of mankind. We are taught ways of going to heaven without forsaking our sins; of repentance without restitution; of being in charity without hearty forgiveness and without love; of believing our sins to be pardoned before they are mortified; of trusting in Christ's death without conformity to his life; of being in God's favour upon the only account of being of such an opinion; and that when we are once in, we can never be out. We are taught to believe that the events of things do not depend upon our crucifying our evil and corrupt affections, but upon eternal and unalterable counsels; that the promises are not the rewards of obedience, but graces pertaining only to a few predestinates, and yet men are saints for all that; and that the laws of God are of the race of the giants, not to be observed by any grace or by any industry: this is the catechism of the ignorant and the profane: but, without all peradventure, the contrary propositions are the way to make the world better: but certainly they that believe these things, do not believe it necessary that we should eschew all evil: and no wonder then, if when men upon these accounts slacken their industry and their care, they find sin still prevailing, still dwelling within them, and still unconquerable by so slight and disheartened labours. For Ἰδιώτης πᾶς καὶ ἀπαίδευτος τρόπον τινα παῖς ἐστι· "Every fool and every ignorant person is a child still:" and it is no wonder that he who talks foolishly should do childishly and weakly.

3. To our weak and corrupted nature, and our foolish discourses, men do daily superinduce evil habits and customs of sinning. "Consuetudo mala tanquam hamus infixus animæ," said the father; "An evil custom is a hook in the soul," and draws it whither the devil pleases. When it comes to the καρδία γεγυμνασμένη πλεονεξίαις, as St. Peter's word is, "a heart exercised with covetous practices," then it is also ἀσθενὴς, it is "weak" and unable to do the good it fain would, or to avoid the evil, which, in a good fit, it pretends to hate. This is so known, I shall not insist upon it; but add this only, that wherever a habit is contracted, it is all one what the instance be; it is as easy as delicious, as unalterable in virtue as in vice; for what helps nature brings to a vicious habit, the same and much more the Spirit of God, by his power and by his comforts, can do in a virtuous; and then we are well again. You see by this who are, and why they are, in this evil condition. The evil natures, and the evil principles, and the evil manners of the world, these are the causes of our imperfect willings and weaker actings in the things of God; and as long as men stay here, sin will be unavoidable. For even meat itself is loathsome to a sick stomach, and it is impossible for him that is heart-sick to eat the most wholesome diet; and yet he that shall say eating is impossible, will be best confuted by seeing all the healthful men in the world eat heartily every day.

2. But what then? Cannot sin be avoided? Cannot a christian mortify the deeds of the body? Cannot Christ redeem us, and cleanse us from all our sins? Cannot the works of the devil be destroyed? That is the next particular to be inquired of: Whether or no it be not necessary, and, therefore, very possible, for a servant of God to pass from this evil state of things, and not only hate evil, but avoid it also?

"He that saith he hath not sinned, is a liar;" but what then? Because a man hath sinned, it does not follow he must do so always. "Hast thou sinned? do so no more," said the wise Bensirach; and so said Christ to the poor paralytic, "Go, and sin no more."—They were excellent words spoken by a holy prophet: "Let not the sinner say he hath not sinned; for God shall burn coals of fire upon his head, that saith before the Lord God and his glory, I have not sinned." Well! that case is confessed; "All men have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." But is there no remedy for this? Must it always be so? and must sin for ever have the upper hand, and for ever baffle our resolutions, and all our fierce and earnest promises of amendment? God forbid. There was a time then, to come, and, blessed be God, it hath been long come; "Yet a little while," saith that prophet, "and iniquity shall be taken out of the earth, and righteousness shall reign among you." For that is in the day of Christ's kingdom, the manifestation of the gospel. When Christ reigns in our hearts by his Spirit, Dagon and the ark cannot stand together; we cannot serve Christ and Belial. And as in the state of nature no good thing dwells within us; so when Christ rules in us, no evil thing can abide; "For every plant that my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up," and cast away into the fires of consumption or purification. But how shall this come to pass, since we all find ourselves so infinitely weak and foolish? I shall tell you. "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven," saith Christ. It is impossible to nature; it is impossible to them that are given to vanity; it is impossible for them that delight in the evil snare: but Christ adds, "With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible." What we cannot do for ourselves, God can do for us, and with us. What nature cannot do, the grace of God can. So that the thing may be done; not indeed by ourselves, but "gratia Dei mecum," saith St. Paul; God and man together can do it. But if it can be done any way that God has put into our powers, the consequent is this; no man's good will shall be taken in exchange for the real and actual mortification of his sins. He that sins, and would fain not sin, but sin is present with him whether he will or no, let him take heed; for the same is "the law of sin," and "the law of death," saith the apostle; and that man's heart is not right with God. For it is impossible men should pray for deliverance, and not be heard; that they should labour, and not be prosperous; unless they pray amiss, and labour falsely. Let no man, therefore, please himself with talking of great things, with perpetual conversation in pious discourses, or with ineffective desires of serving God: he that does not practice as well as he talks, and do what he desires, and what he ought to do, confesses himself to sin greatly against his conscience; and it is a prodigious folly to think that he is a good man, because though he does sin, yet it was against his mind to do so. A man's conscience can never condemn him, if that be his excuse, to say that his conscience checked him: and that will be but a sad apology at the day of judgment. Some men talk like angels, and pray with fervour, and meditate with deep recesses, and speak to God with loving affections, and words of union, and adhere to him in silent devotion, and when they go abroad are as passionate as ever, peevish as a frighted fly, vexing themselves with their own reflections: they are cruel in their bargains, unmerciful to their tenants, and proud as a barbarian prince: they are, for all their fine words, impatient of reproof, scornful to their neighbours, lovers of money, supreme in their own thoughts, and submit to none; all their spiritual life they talk of, is nothing but spiritual fancy and illusion; they are still under the power of their passions, and their sin rules them imperiously, and carries them away infallibly. Let these men consider, there are some men think it impossible to do as much as they do: the common swearer cannot leave that vice, and talk well; and these men that talk thus well, think they cannot do as well as they talk; but both of them are equally under the power of their respective sins, and are equally deceived, and equally not the servants of God. This is true; but it is equally as true, that there is no necessity for all this; for it ought, and it may be otherwise if we please: for, I pray, be pleased to hear St. Paul; "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh;" there is your remedy: "For the Spirit lusteth against the flesh, and the flesh against the Spirit; there is the cause of it; ἵνα μὴ ποιῆτε, "so that ye may not, or cannot, do the things ye would;"[l] that is the blessed consequent and product of that cause. That is plainly,—As there is a state of carnality, of which St. Paul speaks in my text, so that in that state a man cannot but obey the flesh,—so there is also a state of spirituality, when sin is dead, and righteousness is alive; and, in this state, the flesh can no more prevail than the Spirit could do in the other.—Some men cannot choose but sin; "for the carnal mind is not subject to God, neither, indeed, can be,"[m] saith St. Paul; but there are, also, some men that cannot endure any thing that is not good. It is a great pain for a temperate man to suffer the disorders of drunkenness, and the shames of lust are intolerable to a chaste and modest person. This also is affirmed by St. John: "Whosoever is born of God, doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him."[n] So that, you see, it is possible for a good man not to commit the sin to which he is tempted. But the apostle says more: "He doth not commit sin, neither indeed can he, because he is born of God."

And this is agreeable to the words of our blessed Saviour: "A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit, and a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit;"[o] that is, as the child of hell is carried to sin, "pleno impetu," he does not check at it, he does it, and is not troubled; so, on the other side, a child of God is as fully convinced of righteousness, and that which is unrighteous is as hateful to him as colocynths to the taste, or the sharpest punctures to the pupil of the eye. We may see something of this in common experiences. What man of ordinary prudence and reputation can be tempted to steal? or, for what price would he be tempted to murder his friend? If we did hate all sins as we hate these, would it not be as easy to be as innocent in other instances, as most men are in these? and we should have as few drunkards as we have thieves. In such as these, we do not complain in the words of my text, "What I would not, that I do; and what I would, I do not." Does not every good man overcome all the power of great sins? and can he, by the Spirit of God and right reason, by fear and hope, conquer Goliath, and beat the sons of the giant; and can he not overcome the children of Gath? or is it harder to overcome a little sin than a great one? Are not the temptations to little sins very little? and yet are they greater and stronger than a mighty grace? Could the poor demoniac, that lived in the graves, by the power of the devil break his iron chains in pieces? and cannot he, who hath the Spirit of God, dissolve the chains of sin? "Through Christ that strengthens me, I can do all things," saith St. Paul; "Satis sibi copiarum cum Publio

[l] Gal. v. 16. [m] Rom. viii. 7. [n] 1 John iii. 9. [o] Matt. vii. 18.

Decio, et nunquam nimium hostium fore," said one in Livy; which is best rendered by St. Paul—"If God be with us, who can be against us?" Nay, there is an ὑπερνικῶμεν in St. Paul, "We are more than conquerors." For even amongst an army of conquerors there are degrees of exaltation; some serve God like the centurion, and some like St. Peter; some like Martha, and some like Mary; μετ' εὐκολίας ἁπάσης, ἄνευ πόνων καὶ ἱδρώτων, all good men conquer their temptations, but some with more ease, and some with a clearer victory; and more than thus,—"Non solùm viperam terimus, sed ex eâ antidotum conficimus," "We kill the viper, and make treacle of him;" that is, not only escape from, but get advantages by temptations. But we, commonly, are more afraid than hurt: "Let us, therefore, lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us:"[p] so we read the words of the apostle; but St. Chrysostom's rendition of them is better; for the word εὐπερίστατος is a perfect passive, and cannot signify the strength and irresistibility of sin upon us, but quite the contrary, εὐπερίστατος ἁμαρτία signifies "the sin that is so easily avoided," as they that understand that language know very well. And if we were so wise and valiant as not to affright ourselves with our own terrors, we should quickly find, that by the help of the Spirit of God, we can do more than we thought we could. It was said of Alexander, "Benè ausus est vana contemnere,"[q] he did no great matter in conquering the Persians, because they were a pitiful and a soft people; only he understood them to be so, and was wise and bold enough not to fear such images and men of clouts. But men, in the matter of great sins and little, do as the magicians of Egypt: when Moses turned his rod into a serpent, it moved them not; but when they saw the lice and the flies, then they were afraid. We see, that, by the grace of God, we can escape great sins; but we start at flies, and a bird out of a bush disorders us; the lion in the way troubles us not, but a frog and a worm affrights us. Remember the saying of St. Paul, "Christ came to redeem to himself a church, and to present it, pure and spotless, before the throne of grace;" and, if you mean to be of this number, you must endeavour to be under this qualification, that is, as Paul laboured to be, "void of offence, both towards God and towards man." And so I have done with the second proposition. It is necessary that all sin, great and little, should be mortified and dead in us, and that we no longer abide in that state of slavery, as to say, "The good that I would I do not; but the evil that I would not, that I do."

3. In the next place we are to inquire in what degree this is to be effected; for though in negatives, properly, there are no degrees, yet, unless there be some allays in this doctrine, it will not be so well, and it may be, your experiences will for ever confute my arguments; for, "Who can say that he is clean from his sin?" said the wise man. And as our blessed Saviour said, "He that is innocent among you all, let him throw the first stone at the sinner," and spare not.

[p] Heb. xii. 1. [q] Liv.

To this I answer, in the words of St. Gregory, All man's righteousness will be found to be unrighteous, if God should severely enter into judgment; but, therefore, even after our innocence we must pray for pardon, "ut quæ succumbere discussa poterat, ex judicis pietate convalescat," "that our innocence, which, in strictness of Divine judgment, would be found spotted and stained, by the mercy of our Saviour may be accepted." St. Bernard expresses this well: "Nostra siqua est humilis justitia, recta forsitan, sed non pura;" "Our humble righteousness is, perhaps, right in the eyes of God, but not pure;" that is, accepted by his mercy, but it is such as dares not contend in judgment. For as no man is so much a sinner, but he sometimes speaks a good word, or does some things not ill, and yet that little good interrupts not that state of evil; so it is amongst very good men, from whom, sometimes, may pass something that is not commendable; and yet their heart is so habitually right towards God, that they will do nothing, I do not say which God in justice cannot, but which in mercy he will not, impute to eternal condemnation. It was the case of David; "he was a man after God's own heart;" nay, it is said, "he was blameless, save in the matter of Uriah;" and yet we know he numbered the people, and God was angry with him, and punished him for it, but, because he was a good man, and served God heartily, that other fault of his was imputed to him no further. God set a fine upon his head for it; but it was "salvo contenemento," "the main stake was safe."

For concerning good men, the question is not, whether or no God could not, in the rigour of justice, blame their indiscretion, or impute a foolish word, or chide them for a hasty answer, or a careless action, for a less devout prayer, or weak hands, for a fearful heart, or a trembling faith. These are not the measures by which God judges his children; "for he knoweth whereof we are made, and he remembers that we are but dust."—But the question is, whether any man that is covetous or proud, false to his trust, or a drunkard, can, at the same time, be a child of God? No, certainly he cannot. But then we know that God judges us by Jesus Christ, that is, with the allays of mercy, with an eye of pardon, with the sentences of a father, by the measures of a man, and by analogy, to all our unavoidable abatements. God could enter with us into a more severe judgment, but he would not; and no justice tied him from exercising that mercy. But, according to the measures of the gospel, "he will judge every man according to his works."—Now what these measures are, is now the question. To which I answer, first, in general, and then more particularly.

1. In general, thus:—A christian's innocence is always to be measured by the plain lines and measures of the commandments; but is not to be taken into account by uncertain and fond opinions, and the scruples of zealous and timorous persons. My meaning is this: Some men tell us that every natural inclination to a forbidden object is a sin; which they that believe, finding them to be natural, do also confess that such sins are unavoidable. But if these natural and first motions be sins, then a man sins whether he resists them, or resists them not, whether he prevails, or prevails not; and there is no other difference but this,—he that fights not against, but always yields to his desires, sins greatest; and he that never yields, but fights always, sins oftenest. But then, by this reckoning, it will indeed be impossible to avoid millions of sins; because the very doing of our duty does suppose a sin. If God should impute such first desires to us as sins, we were all very miserable; but if he does not impute them, let us trouble ourselves no further about them, but to take care that they never prevail upon us. Thus men are taught, that they never say their prayers but they commit a sin. Indeed that is true but too often; but yet it is possible for us, by the grace of God, to please him in saying our prayers, and to be accepted of him. But, indeed, if God did proceed against us as we do against one another, no man could abide innocent for so much as one hour. But God's judgment is otherwise; he inquires if the heart be right, if our labour be true, if we love no sin, if we use prudent and efficacious instruments to mortify our sin, if we go about our religion as we go about the biggest concerns of our life, if we be sincere and real in our actions and intentions. For this is the ἀναμαρτησία that God requires of us all; this is that "sinless state," in which if God does not find us, we shall never see his glorious face; and if he does find us, we shall certainly be saved by the blood of Jesus. For, in the style of Scripture, to be εἰλικρινεῖς καὶ ἀπρόσκοποι is the same thing: "to be sincere and to be without offence," is all one. Thus David spake heartily, "I am utterly purposed that my mouth shall not offend; and thou shalt find no wickedness in me." He that endeavours this, and hopes this, and does actions and uses means accordingly, not being deceived by his own false heart, nor abused by evil propositions,—this man will stand upright in the congregations of the just; and, though he cannot challenge heaven by merit, yet he shall receive it as a gift by promise and by grace. "Lex nos innocentes esse jubet, non curiosos," said Seneca. For God takes no judgment of us by any measures, but of the commandment without, and the heart and the conscience within; but he never intended his laws to be a snare to us, or to entrap us with consequences and dark interpretations, by large deductions and witty similitudes of faults; but he requires of us a sincere heart, and a hearty labour in the work of his commandments; he calls upon us to avoid all that which his law plainly forbids, and which our consciences do condemn. This is the general measure. The particulars are briefly these.

1. Every christian is bound to arrive at that state, that he have remaining in him no habit of any sin whatsoever. "Our old man must be crucified,"—"the body of sin must be destroyed,"—"he must no longer serve sin,"—"sin shall not have the dominion over you."—All these are the apostle's words; that is, plainly, as I have already declared, you must not be at that pass, that though ye would avoid sin, ye cannot. For he that is so, is a most perfect slave, and Christ's freedman cannot be so. Nay, he that loves sin, and delights in it, hath no liberty indeed, but he hath more show of it than he that obeys it against his will.

> ———Libertatis servaveris umbram,
> Si quidquid jubeare velis. LUCAN.

He that loves to be in the place, is a less prisoner than he that is confined against his will.

2. He that commits any one sin by choice and deliberation, is an enemy to God, and is under the dominion of the flesh. In the case of deliberate sins, one act does give the denomination; he is an adulterer, that so much as once foully breaks the holy laws of marriage. "He that offends in one, is guilty of all," saith St. James. St. Peter's denial, and David's adultery, had passed on to a fatal issue, if the mercy of God, and a great repentance, had not interceded. But they did so no more, and so God restored them to grace and pardon. And in this sense are the words of St. John, Ὁ ποιῶν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν, "He that does a sin, is of the devil," and "he that is born of God," ἁμαρτίαν οὐ ποιεῖ, "does not commit a sin;"[r] he chooses none, he loves none, he endures none, "talia quæ non faciet bonæ fidei et spei Christianus;" they do no great sin, and love no little one. A sin chosen and deliberately done, is, as Tertullian's expression is, "crimen devoratorium salutis;" "it devours salvation." For as there are some sins which can be done but once,—as a man can kill his father but once, or himself but once, so in those things which can be repeated, a perfect choice is equivalent to a habit; it is the same in principle, that a habit is in the product. In short, he is not a child of God, that, knowingly and deliberately, chooses any thing that God hates.

3. Every christian ought to attain to such a state of life, as that he never sin, not only by a long deliberation, but also not by passion. I do not say that he is not a good christian, who by passion is suddenly surprised, and falls into folly; but this I say, that no passion ought to make him choose a sin. For, let the sin enter by anger or by desire, it is all one, if the consent be gained. It is an ill sign, if a man, though on the sudden, consents to a base action. Thus far every good man is tied, not only to endeavour, but to prevail against his sin.

4. There is one step more, which, if it be not actually effected, it must, at least, be greatly endeavoured, and the event be left to God; and that is, that we strive for so great a dominion over our sins and lust, as that we be not surprised on a sudden. This, indeed, is a work of time, and it is well if it be ever done; but it must always be endeavoured. But in this particular even good men are sometimes unprosperous. St. Epiphanius and St. Chrysostom grew once into choler, and they passed too far, and lost more than their argument; they lost their reason, and they lost their patience; and Epiphanius wished that St. Chrysostom might not die a bishop; and he in a peevish exchange, wished that Epiphanius might never return to his bishopric: when they had forgotten their foolish anger, God remembered it, and said "Amen" to both their cursed speakings. Nay, there is yet a greater example of human frailty; St. Paul and Barnabas were very holy persons; but once, in a heat, they were both to blame; they were peevish, and parted company. This was not very much; but God was so displeased, even for this little fly in their box of ointment, that their story says, they never saw one another's face again. These earnest emissions and transportations of passion do sometime declare the weakness of good men; but that, even here, we ought at least to endeavour to be more than conquerors, appears in this, —because God allows it not, and by punishing such follies, does manifest that he intends that we should get victory over our sudden passions, as well as our natural lusts. And so I have done with the third inquiry, in what degree God expects our innocence; and now I briefly come to the last particular, which will make all the rest practicable. I am now to tell you how all this can be effected, and how we shall get free from the power and dominion of our sins.

4. The first great instrument is faith. He that hath faith like a grain of mustard-seed, can remove mountains; the mountains of sin shall fall flat at the feet of the faithful man, and shall be removed into the sea, the sea of Christ's blood, and penitential waters. "Faith overcometh the world," saith St. John; and "walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh." There are two of our enemies gone,—the world and the flesh, by faith and the Spirit, by the spirit of faith; and, as for the devil, put on the shield of faith, and "resist the devil, and he will flee from you," saith the apostle; and the powers of sin seem insuperable to none, but to them that have not faith: we do not believe that God intends we should do what he seems to require of us; or else we think, that though God's grace abounds, yet sin must superabound, expressly against the saying of St. Paul; or else we think, that the evil spirit is stronger than the good Spirit of God. Hear what St. John saith: "My little children, ye are of God, and have overcome the evil one; for the Spirit that is in you, is greater than that which is in the world."[s] Believest thou this? If you do, I shall tell you what may be the event of it. When the father of the boy possessed with the devil told his sad story to Christ, he said, Master, if thou canst do any thing, I pray help me. Christ answered him, If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth.[t] N. B. And therefore, if you do believe this, go to your prayers, and go to your guards, and go to your labour, and try what God will do for you. "For whatsoever things ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye shall receive them, and ye shall have them." Now consider; Do not we every day pray, in the Divine hymn called "Te Deum," "Vouchsafe, O Lord, to keep us this day without sin?" And in the collect at morning prayer,—"and grant that this day we fall into no sin, neither run into any kind of danger; but that all our doings may be ordered by thy governance, to do always that which is righteous in thy sight?" Have you any hope, or any faith, when you say that prayer? And if you do your duty as you can, do you think the failure will be on God's part? Fear not that, if you can trust in God, and do accordingly; "though your sins were as scarlet, yet they shall be as white as snow," and pure as the feet of the holy Lamb. Only let us forsake all those weak propositions, which cut the nerves of faith, and make it impossible for us to actuate all our good desires, or to come out from the power of sin.

2. He that would be free from the slavery of sin, and the necessity of sinning, must always watch. Aye, that is the point; but who can watch always? Why every good man can watch always; and, that we may not be deceived in this, let us know, that the running away from a temptation is a part of our watchfulness, and every good employment is another great part of it, and a laying in provisions of reason and religion beforehand, is yet a third part of this watchfulness; and the conversation of a christian is a perpetual watchfulness; not a continual thinking of that one, or those many things, which may endanger us; but it is a continual doing something, directly or indirectly, against sin. He either prays to God for his Spirit, or relies upon the promises, or receives the sacrament, or goes to his bishop for counsel and a blessing, or to his priest for religious offices, or places himself at the feet of good men to hear their wise sayings, or calls for the church's prayers, or does the duty of his calling, or actually resists temptation, or frequently renews his holy purposes, or fortifies himself by vows, or searches into his danger by a daily examination; so that, in the whole, he is for ever upon his guards. This duty and caution of a christian is like watching, lest a man cut his finger. Wise men do not often cut their fingers, and yet every day they use a knife; and a man's eye is a tender thing, and every thing can do it wrong, and every thing can put it out; yet, because we love our eyes so well, in the midst of so many dangers, by God's providence, and a prudent natural care, by winking when any thing comes against them, and by turning aside when a blow is offered, they are preserved so certainly, that not one man in ten thousand does, by a stroke, lose one of his eyes in all his life-time. If we would transplant our natural care to a spiritual caution, we might, by God's grace, be kept from losing our souls, as we are from losing our eyes; and, because a perpetual watchfulness is our great defence, and the perpetual presence of God's grace is our great security, and that this grace never leaves us unless we leave it, and the precept of a daily watchfulness is a thing not only so reasonable, but so many easy ways to be performed,—we see upon what terms we may be quit of our sins, and more than conquerors over all the enemies and impediments of salvation.

3. If you would be in the state of the liberty of the sons of God, that is, that you may not be servants of sin in any instance, be sure, in the mortifications of sin, willingly or carelessly to leave no remains of it, no nest-egg, no principles of it, no affections to it; if any thing remains, it will prove to us as manna to the sons of Israel on the second day; it will breed worms, and stink. Therefore, labour against every part of it, reject every proposition that gives it countenance, pray to God against it all. And what then? Why then, "ask, and you shall have," said Christ. Nay, say some, it is true, you shall be heard, but in part only; for God will leave some remains of sin within us, lest we should become proud, by being innocent. So vainly do men argue against God's goodness, and their own blessing and salvation; μετὰ πλείονος τέχνης καὶ παρασκευῆς, καὶ πραγματείας ἀπόλλυνται, as St. Basil says; "they contrive witty arts to undo themselves," being entangled in the periods of ignorant disputations. But as to the thing itself, if by the remains of sin, they mean the propensities and natural inclinations to forbidden objects, there is no question but they will remain in us, so long as we bear our flesh about us; and, surely, that is a great argument to make us humble. But these are not the sins which God charges on his people. But if, by remains, we mean any part of the habit of sin, any affection, any malice or perverseness of the will, then it is a contradiction to say that God leaves in us such remains of sin, lest, by innocence, we become proud; for how should pride spring in a man's heart, if there be no remains of sin left? And is it not the best, the surest way, to cure the pride of our hearts, by taking out every root of bitterness, even the root of pride itself? Will a physician purposely leave the relics of a disease, and pretend he does it to prevent a relapse? And is it not more likely he will relapse, if the sickness be not wholly cured? But besides this, if God leaves any remains of sin in us, what remains are they, and of what sins? Does he leave the remains of pride? If so, that were a strange cure, to leave the remains of pride in us, to keep us from being proud. But, if not so, but that all the remains of pride be taken away by the grace of God blessing our endeavours, what danger is there of being proud, the remains of which sin are, by the grace of God, wholly taken away? But then, if the pride of the heart be cured, which is the hardest to be removed, and commonly is done last of all,—who can distrust the power of the Spirit of God, or his goodness, or his promises, and say that God does not intend to cleanse his sons and servants from all unrighteousness; and, according to St. Paul's prayer, "keep their bodies, and souls, and spirits, unblamable to the coming of the Lord Jesus?" But, however, let God leave what remains he please, all will be well enough on that side; but let us be careful, as far as we can, that we leave none; lest it be severely imputed to us, and the fire break out, and consume us.

4. Let us, without any further question, put this argument to a material issue; let us do all that we can do towards the destruction of the whole body of sin; but let us never say we cannot be quit of our sin, till we have done all that we can do towards the mortification of it. For till that be done, how can any man tell where the fault lies, or whether it can be done or no? If any man can say that he hath done all that he could do, and yet hath failed of his duty,—if he can say truly, that he hath endured as much as is possible to be endured,—that he hath watched always, and never nodded when he could avoid it,—that he hath loved as much as he could love,—that he hath waited till he can wait no longer;—then, indeed, if he says true, we must confess that it is not to be understood. But is there any man in the world that does all that he can do? If there be, that man is blameless; if there be not, then he cannot say but it is his own fault that his sin prevails against him. It is true, that no man is free from sin; but it is as true, that no man does as much as he can against it; and, therefore, no man must go about to excuse himself by saying, No man is free from his sin; and, therefore, no man can be, no, not by the powers of grace: for he may as well argue thus,—No man does do all that he can do against it, and, therefore, it is impossible he should do what he can do. The argument is apparently foolish, and the excuse is weak, and the deception visible, and sin prevails upon our weak arguings; but the consequence is plainly this,—when any man commits a sin, he is guilty before God, and he cannot say he could not help it; and God is just in punishing every sin, and very merciful when he forgives us any. But he that says he cannot avoid it, that he cannot overcome his lust,—confesses himself a servant of sin, and that he is not yet redeemed by the blood of the holy Lamb.

5. He that would be advanced beyond the power and necessity of sinning, must take great caution concerning his thoughts and secret desires; "for lust, when it is conceived, bringeth forth sin;" but, if it be suppressed in the conception, it comes to nothing; but we find it hard to destroy the serpent, when the egg is hatched into a cockatrice. The thought is ἀμάρτυρος ἁμαρτία; no man takes notice of it, but lets it alone till the sin be too strong;[u] and then we complain we cannot help it. "Nolo sinas cogitationem crescere," "Suffer not your thoughts to grow up;" for they usually come ἄφνω, ὡσακόπως, ἀπραγματεύτως, as St. Basil says, "suddenly, and easily, and without business;" but take heed that you nurse them not; but, if you chance to stumble, mend your pace, and if you nod, let it awaken you; for he only can be a good man, that raises himself up at the first trip, that strangles his sin in the birth: Τοιοῦται τῶν ἁγίων ψυχαὶ, πρὶν ἔπεσαν, ἀνίστανται, "Good men rise up again, even before they fall," saith St. Chrysostom. Now, I pray, consider, that when sin is but in the thought, it is easily suppressed, and, if it be stopped there, it can go no further; and what great mountain of labour is it, then, to abstain from our sin? Is not the adultery of the eye easily cured by shutting the eye-lid? and cannot the thoughts of the heart be turned aside by doing business, by going into company, by reading, or by sleeping? A man may divert his thoughts by shaking of his head, by thinking any thing else, by thinking nothing. "Da mihi christianum," saith St. Austin, "et intelligit quod dico." Every man that loves God, understands this, and more than this, to be true. Now if things be thus, and that we may be safe in that which is supposed to be the hardest of all, we must needs condemn ourselves, and lay our faces in the dust, when we give up ourselves to any sin; we cannot be justified by saying we could not help it. For as it was decreed by the fathers of the second Arausican council, "Hoc etiam secundum fidem catholicam credimus," &c. "This we believe according to the catholic faith," that have received baptismal grace; all that are baptized by the aid and co-operation of Christ, must and can, if they will labour faithfully, perform and fulfil those things, which belong unto salvation.

6. And lastly: if sin hath gotten the power of any one of us, consider in what degree the sin hath prevailed: if but a little, the battle will be more easy, and the victory more certain; but then be sure to do it thoroughly, because there is not much to be done: but if sin hath prevailed greatly, then indeed you have very much to do; therefore begin betimes, and defer not this work, till old age shall make it extremely difficult, or death shall make it impossible.

> Nam quamvis prope te, quamvis temone sub uno
> Vertentem sese, frustra sectabere canthum,
> Cum rota posterior curras, et in axe secundo. PERS.

If thou beest cast behind; if thou hast neglected the duties of thy vigorous age, thou shalt never overtake that strength; "the hinder wheel, though bigger than the former, and measures more ground at every revolution, yet shall never overtake it;" and all the second counsels of thy old age, though undertaken with greater resolution, and acted with the strengths of fear and need, and pursued with more pertinacious purposes than the early repentances of young men, yet shall never overtake those advantages, which you lost when you gave your youth to folly, and the causes of a sad repentance.

However, if you find it so hard a thing to get from the power of one master-sin; if an old adulterer does dote,—if an old drunkard be further from remedy than a young sinner,—if covetousness grows with old age,—if ambition be still more hydropic and grows more thirsty for every draught of honour,—you may easily resolve that old age, or your last sickness, is not so likely to be prosperous in the mortification of your long prevailing sins. Do not all men desire to end their days in religion, to die in the arms of the church, to expire under the conduct of a religious man? When ye are sick or dying, then nothing but prayers and sad complaints, and the groans of a tremulous repentance, and the faint labours of an almost impossible mortification: then the despised priest is sent for; then he is a good man, and his words are oracles, and religion is truth, and sin is a load, and the sinner is a fool; then we watch for a word of comfort from his mouth, as the fearful prisoner for his fate upon the judge's answer. That which is true then, is true now; and, therefore, to prevent so intolerable a danger, mortify your sin betime, for else you will hardly mortify it at all. Remember that the snail outwent the eagle, and won the goal, because she set out betimes.

To sum up all: every good man is a new creature, and christianity is not so much a Divine institution, as a Divine frame and temper of spirit,—which if we heartily pray for, and endeavour to obtain, we shall find it as hard and as uneasy to sin against God, as now we think it impossible to abstain from our most pleasing sins. For as it is in the spermatic virtue of the heavens, which diffuses itself universally upon all sublunary bodies, and subtilely insinuating itself into the most dull and inactive element, produces gold and pearls, life and motion, and brisk activities in all things that can receive the influence and heavenly blessing:—so it is in the Holy Spirit of God, and the word of God, and the grace of God, which St. John calls "the seed of God;" it is a law of righteousness, and it is a law of the Spirit of life, and changes nature into grace, and dulness into zeal, and fear into love, and sinful habits into innocence, and passes on from grace to grace, till we arrive at the full measures of the stature of Christ, and into the perfect liberty of the sons of God; so that we shall no more say, The evil that I would not, that I do;—but we shall hate what God hates, and the evil that is forbidden we shall not do; not because we are strong of ourselves, but because Christ is our strength, and he is in us; and Christ's strength shall be perfected in our weakness, and his grace shall be sufficient for us; and he will, of his own good pleasure, work in us, not only to will, but also to do, "velle et perficere," saith the apostle, "to will and to do it thoroughly" and fully, being sanctified throughout, to the glory of his holy name, and the eternal salvation of our souls, through Jesus Christ our Lord; to whom with the Father, &c.

SERMON III.

FIDES FORMATA: OR, FAITH WORKING BY LOVE.

You see, then, how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.—James ii. 24.

THAT we are "justified by faith," St. Paul tells us;[a] that we are also "justified by works," we are told in my text; and both may be true. But that this justification is wrought by faith without works, "to him that worketh not, but believeth," saith St. Paul: that this is not wrought without works, St. James is as express for his negative as St. Paul was for his affirmative; and how both these should be true, is something harder to unriddle. But, "affirmanti incumbit probatio," "he that affirms must prove;" and, therefore, St. Paul proves his doctrine by the example of Abraham, to whom faith was imputed for righteousness; and, therefore, not by works. And what can be answered to this? Nothing but this, that St. James uses the very same argument to prove that our justification is by works also; "For our father Abraham was justified by works, when he offered up his son Isaac." [b] Now which of these says true? Certainly both of them; but neither of them have been well understood; insomuch that they have not only made divisions of heart among the faithful, but one party relies on faith to the disparagement of good life, and the other makes works to be the main ground of our hope and confidence, and consequently to exclude the efficacy of faith: the one makes christian religion a lazy and inactive institution; and the other, a bold presumption on ourselves; while the first tempts us to live like heathens, and the other recalls us to live the life of Jews; while one says "I am of Paul," and another, "I am of St. James," and both of them put it in danger of evacuating the institution and the death of Christ; one looking on Christ only as a Lawgiver, and the other only as a Saviour. The effects of these are very sad, and by all means to be diverted by all the wise considerations of the Spirit.

My purpose is not with subtle arts to reconcile them that never disagreed; the two apostles spake by the same Spirit, and to the same last design, though to differing intermedial purposes; but because the great end of faith, the design, the definition, the state, the economy of it, is that all believers should not live according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit. Before I fall to the close handling of the text, I shall premise some preliminary considerations, to prepare the way of holiness, to explicate the differing senses of the apostles, to understand the question and the duty, by removing the causes of the vulgar mistakes of most men in this article; and then proceed to the main inquiry.

1. That no man may abuse himself or others by mistaking of hard words, spoken in mystery, with allegorical expressions to secret senses, wrapt up in a cloud; such as are, "faith, and justification, and imputation, and righteousness, and works," be pleased to consider, that the very word "faith" is, in Scripture, infinitely ambiguous, insomuch that in the Latin concordances of St. Jerome's Bible, published by Robert Stephens, you may see no less than twenty-two several senses and acceptations of the word "faith," set down with the several places of Scripture referring to them; to which if, out of my own observation, I could add no more, yet these are an abundant demonstration, that whatsoever is said of the efficacy of faith for justification, is not to be taken in such a sense as will weaken the necessity and our carefulness of good life, when the word may, in so many other senses, be taken to verify the affirmation of St. Paul, of "justification by faith," so as to reconcile it to "the necessity of obedience."

2. As it is in the word "faith," so it is in "works;" for by works is meant sometimes the thing done,—sometimes the labour of doing,—sometimes the good will;—it is sometimes taken for a state of good life,—sometimes for the covenant of works;—it sometimes means the works of the law,—sometimes the works of the gospel;—sometimes it is taken for a perfect, actual, unsinning obedience,—sometimes for a sincere endeavour to please God;—sometimes they are meant to be such who can challenge the reward as of debt;—sometimes they mean only a disposition of the person to receive the favour and the grace of God. Now since our good works can be but of one kind, (for ours cannot be meritorious, ours cannot be without sin all our life, they cannot be such as need no repentance,) it is no wonder if we must be justified without works in this sense; for by such works no man living can be justified: and these St. Paul calls the "works of the law," and sometimes he calls them "our righteousness;" and these are the covenant of works. But because we came into the world to serve God, and God will be obeyed, and Jesus Christ came into the world to save us from sin, and "to redeem to himself a people zealous of good works," and hath, to this purpose, revealed to us all his Father's will, and destroyed the words of the devil, and gives us his Holy Spirit, and by him we shall be justified in this obedience; therefore, when works signify a sincere, hearty endeavour to keep all God's commands, out of a belief in Christ, that if we endeavour to do so we shall be helped by his grace, and if we really do so we shall be pardoned for what is past, and if we continue to do so we shall receive a crown of glory;—therefore, it is no wonder that it is said we are to be justified by works; always meaning, not the works of the law, that is, works that are meritorious, works that can challenge the reward, works that need no mercy, no repentance, no humiliation, and no appeal to grace and favour;—but always meaning works, that are an obedience to God by the measures of good will, and a sincere endeavour, and the faith of the Lord Jesus.

3. But thus also it is in the word "justification:" for God is justified, and wisdom is justified, and man is justified, and a sinner is not justified as long as he continues in sin; and a sinner is justified when he repents, and when he is pardoned; and an innocent person is justified when he is declared to be no criminal; and a righteous man is justified when he is saved; and a weak christian is justified when his imperfect services are accepted for the present, and himself thrust forward to more grace; and he that is justified may be justified more; and every man that is justified to one purpose, is not so to all; and faith, in divers senses, gives justification in as many; and, therefore, though to every sense of faith there is not always a degree of justification in any, yet when the faith is such that justification is the product and correspondent,—as that faith may be imperfect, so the justification is but begun, and either must proceed further, or else, as the faith will die, so the justification will come to nothing. The like observation might be made concerning imputation, and all the words used in this question; but these may suffice till I pass to other particulars.

4. Not only the word "faith," but also "charity," and "godliness," and "religion," signify sometimes particular graces; and sometimes they suppose universally, and mean conjugations and unions of graces, as is evident to them that read the Scriptures with observation. Now when justification is attributed to faith, or salvation to godliness, they are to be understood in the aggregate sense; for, that I may give but one instance of this, when St. Paul speaks of faith as it is a particular grace, and separate from the rest, he also does separate it from all possibility of bringing us to heaven: "Though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing:" [c] when faith includes charity, it will bring us to heaven; when it is alone, when it is without charity, it will do nothing at all.

5. Neither can this φαινόμενον be solved by saying, that though faith alone does justify, yet when she does justify, she is not alone, but good works must follow; for this is said to no purpose:

1. Because if we be justified by faith alone, the work is done, whether charity does follow or no; and, therefore, that want of charity cannot hurt us.

2. There can be no imaginable cause why charity and obedience should be at all necessary, if the whole work can be done without it.

3. If obedience and charity be not a condition of our salvation, then it is not necessary to follow faith; but if it be, it does as much as faith, for that is but a part of the condition.

4. If we can be saved without charity and keeping the commandments, what need we trouble ourselves for them? If we cannot be saved without them, then either faith without them does not justify; or if it does, we are never the better, for we may be damned for all that justification.

The consequent of these observations is briefly this:—

1. That no man should fool himself by disputing about the philosophy of justification, and what causality faith hath in it, and whether it be the act of faith that justifies, or the habit? Whether faith as a good work, or faith as an instrument? Whether faith as it is obedience, or faith as it is an access to Christ? Whether as a hand, or as a heart? Whether by its own innate virtue, or by the efficacy of the object? Whether as a sign, or as a thing signified? Whether by introduction, or by perfection? Whether in the first beginnings, or in its last and best productions? Whether by inherent worthiness, or adventitious imputation? "Uberiùs ista, quæso, &c." (that I may use the words of Cicero,[d]) "hæc enim spinosiora, prius, ut confitear, me cogunt, quam ut assentiar:" these things are knotty, and too intricate to do any good; they may amuse us, but never instruct us; and they have already made men careless and confident, disputative and troublesome, proud and uncharitable, but neither wiser nor better. Let us, therefore, leave these weak ways of troubling ourselves or others, and directly look to the theology of it, the direct duty, the end of faith, and the work of faith, the conditions and the instruments of our salvation, the just foundation of our hopes, how our faith can destroy our sin, and how it can unite us unto God; how by it we can be made partakers of Christ's death, and imitators of his life. For since it is evident, by the premises, that this article is not to be determined or relied upon by arguing from words of many significations, we must walk by a clearer light, by such plain sayings and dogmatical propositions of Scripture, which evidently teach us our duty, and place our hopes upon that which cannot deceive us, that is, which require obedience. which call upon us to glorify God, and to do good to men, and to keep all God's commandments with diligence and sincerity.

For since the end of our faith is, that we may be disciples and servants of the Lord Jesus, advancing his kingdom here, and partaking of it hereafter; since we are commanded to believe what Christ taught, that it may appear as reasonable as it is necessary to do what he hath commanded; since faith and works are in order one to the other, it is impossible that evangelical faith and evangelical works should be opposed one to the other in the effecting of our salvation. So that as it is to no purpose for christians to dispute whether we are justified by faith or the works of the law, that is, the covenant of works, without the help of faith and the auxiliaries and allowances of mercy on God's part, and repentance on ours; because no christian can pretend to this,—so it is perfectly foolish to dispute whether christians are to be justified by faith, or the works of the gospel; for I shall make it appear that they are both the same thing. No man disparages faith but he that says, faith does not work righteousness; for he that says so, says indeed it cannot justify; for he says that faith is alone: it is "faith only," and the words of my text are plain: "You see," saith St. James, that is, it is evident to your sense, it is as clear as an ocular demonstration, "that a man is justified by works, and not by faith only."

My text hath in it these two propositions; a negative and an affirmative. The negative is this, 1. "By faith only" a man is not justified. The affirmative, 2. "By works also" a man is justified.

When I have briefly discoursed of these, I shall only add such practical considerations as shall make the doctrines useful, and tangible, and material.

1. By faith only a man is not justified. By faith only, here is meant, faith without obedience. For what do we think of those that detain the faith in unrighteousness? They have faith, they could not else keep it in so ill a cabinet: but yet the apostle reckons them amongst the reprobates; for the abominable, the reprobates, and the disobedient, are all one; and, therefore, such persons, for all their faith, shall have no part with faithful Abraham: for none are his children but they that do the works of Abraham. Abraham's faith, without Abraham's works, is nothing; for of him "that hath faith, and hath not works," St. James asks, "Can faith save him?" [e] meaning, that it is impossible. For what think we of those, that did miracles in Christ's name, and in his name cast out devils? Have not they faith? Yes, "omnem fidem," "all faith," that is, alone, for "they could remove mountains:" but yet to many of them Christ will say, "Depart from me, ye workers of iniquity; I know you not." Nay, at last, what think we of the devils themselves? Have not they faith? Yes; and this faith is not "fides miraculorum" neither; but it is an operative faith, it works a little; for it makes them tremble; and it may be, that is more than thy faith does to thee: and yet dost thou hope to be saved by a faith that does less to thee than the devil's faith does to him? That is impossible. For "faith without works is dead," saith St. James. It is "manus arida," saith St. Austin; "it is a withered hand;"—and that which is dead cannot work the life of grace in us, much less obtain eternal life for us. In short, a man may have faith, and yet do the works of unrighteousness; he may have faith and be a devil; and then what can such a faith do to him or for him? It can do him no good in the present constitution of affairs. St. Paul, from whose mistaken words much noise hath been made in this question, is clear in this particular: "Nothing in Christ Jesus can avail, but faith working by charity;"[f] that is, as he expounds himself once and again, "nothing but a new creature, nothing but keeping the commandments of God."[g] If faith be defined to be any thing that does not change our natures, and make us to be a new creation unto God: if keeping the commandments be not in the definition of faith, it avails nothing at all. Therefore deceive not yourselves; they are the words of our blessed Lord himself: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord," that is, not every one that confesses Christ, and believes in him, calling Christ Master and Lord, shall be saved; "but he that doth the will of my Father which is in heaven." These things are so plain, that they need no commentary; so evident, that they cannot be denied: and to these I add but this one truth; that faith alone without a good life is so far from justifying a sinner, that it is one of the greatest aggravations of his condemnation in the whole world. For no man can be so greatly damned as he that hath faith; for unless he knows his Master's will, that is, by faith be convinced, and assents to the revelations of the will of God, "he can be beaten but with few stripes:" but he that believes, hath no excuse; he is αὐτοκατάκριτος, "condemned by the sentence of his own heart," and therefore πολλαὶ πληγαὶ, "many stripes," the greater condemnation shall be his portion. Natural reason is a light to the conscience, but faith is a greater; and therefore if it be not followed, it damns deeper than the hell of the infidels and uninstructed. And so I have done with the negative proposition of my text; a man is not justified by faith alone, that is, by faith which hath not in it charity and obedience.

2. If faith alone will not do it, what will? The affirmative part of the text answers; not faith alone; but works must be an ingredient: "a man is justified by works:" and that is now to be explicated and proved. It will be absolutely to no purpose to say that faith alone does justify, if, when a man is justified, he is never the nearer to be saved. Now that without obedience no man can go to heaven, is so evident in Holy Scripture, that he that denies it, hath no faith. "There is no peace, saith my God, unto the wicked;"[h] and "I will not justify a sinner,"[i] saith God; unless faith purges away our sins, it can never justify. Let a man believe all the revelations of God; if that belief ends in itself, and goes no further, it is like physic taken to purge the stomach; if it do not work, it is so far from bringing health, that itself is a new sickness. Faith is a great purger and purifier of the soul; "purifying your hearts by faith," saith the apostle. It is the best physic in the world for a sinful soul; but if it does not work, it corrupts in the stomach, it makes us to rely upon weak propositions and trifling confidences, it is but a dreaming μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας, "a phantastic dream," and introduces pride or superstition, swelling thoughts and presumptions of the Divine favour: but what saith the apostle? "Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man can see God:"[k] mark that. If faith does not make you charitable and holy, talk no more of justification by it, for you shall never see the glorious face of God. Faith indeed is a title and relation to Christ; it is a naming of his names; but what then? Why then, saith the apostle, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity."

For let any man consider, can the faith of Christ and the hatred of God stand together? Can any man be justified that does not love God? Or can any man love God and sin at the same time? And does not he love sin, that falls under its temptation, and obeys it in the lusts thereof, and delights in the vanity, and makes excuses for it, and returns to it with passion, and abides with pleasure? This will not do it; such a man cannot be justified for all his believing. But, therefore, the apostle shows us a more excellent way: "This is a true saying, and I will that thou affirm constantly, that they who have believed in God, be careful to maintain good works."[l] The apostle puts great force on this doctrine, he arms it with a double preface; the saying is "true," and it is to be "constantly affirmed;" that is, it is not only true, but necessary; it is like Pharaoh's dream, doubled, because it is bound upon us by the decree of God; and it is unalterably certain, that every believer must do good works, or his believing will signify little; nay more than so, every man must be careful to do good works; and more yet, he must carefully maintain them; that is, not do them by fits and interrupted returns, but προίστασθαι, to be incumbent upon them, to dwell upon them, to maintain good works, that is, to persevere in them. But I am yet but in the general: be pleased to go along with me in these particular considerations.

1. No man's sins are pardoned, but in the same measure in which they are mortified, destroyed, and taken away; so that if faith does not cure our sinful natures, it never can justify, it never can procure our pardon. And therefore it is, that as soon as ever faith in the Lord Jesus was preached, at the same time also they preached repentance from dead works: insomuch that St. Paul reckons it among the fundamentals and first principles of christianity;[m] nay, the Baptist preached repentance and amendment of life as a preparation to the faith of Christ. And I pray consider; can there be any forgiveness of sins without repentance? But if an apostle should preach forgiveness to all that believe, and this belief did not also mean that they should repent and forsake their sin,—the sermons of the apostle would make christianity nothing else but the sanctuary of Romulus, a device to get together all the wicked people of the world, and to make them happy without any change of manners. Christ came to other purposes; he came "to sanctify us and to cleanse us by his word:"[n] the word of faith was not for itself, but was a design of holiness, and the very "grace of God did appear" for this end; that "teaching us to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live holily, justly, and soberly in this present world:"[o] he came to gather a people together; not like David's army, when Saul pursued him, but the armies of the Lord, "a faithful people, a chosen generation;" and what is that? The Spirit of God adds, "a people zealous of good works." Now as Christ proved his power to forgive sins, by curing the poor man's palsy, because a man is never pardoned but when the punishment is removed; so the great act of justification of a sinner, the pardoning of his sins, is then only effected, when the spiritual evil is taken away: that is the best indication of a real and an eternal pardon, when God takes away the hardness of the heart, the love of sin, the accursed habit, the evil inclination, the sin that doth so easily beset us: and when that is gone, what remains within us that God can hate? Nothing stays behind, but God's creation, the work of his own hands, the issues of his Holy Spirit. The faith of a christian is πάσης ἁμαρτάδος ἀναιρετική, "it destroys the whole body of sin;" and to suppose that Christ pardons a sinner, whom he doth not also purge and rescue from the dominion of sin, is to affirm that he justifies the wicked; that he calls good evil, and evil good; that he delights in a wicked person; that he makes a wicked man all one with himself; that he makes the members of a harlot at the same time also the members of Christ: but all this is impossible, and, therefore, ought not to be pretended to by any christian. Severe are those words of our blessed Saviour, "Every plant in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away:"[p] faith ingrafts us into Christ; by faith we are inserted into the vine; but the plant that is ingrafted, must also be parturient and fruitful, or else it shall be quite cut off from the root, and thrown into the everlasting burning: and this is the full and plain meaning of those words so often used in Scripture for the magnification of faith, "The just shall live by faith:" no man shall live by faith but the just man; he indeed is justified by faith, but no man else; the unjust and the unrighteous man hath no portion in this matter. That is the first great consideration in this affair; no man is justified in the least sense of justification, that is, when it means nothing but the pardon of sins, but when his sin is mortified and destroyed.

[f] Gal. v. 6. [g] Gal. vi. 15. 1 Cor. vii. 19.
[h] Isaiah lvii. 21. [i] Exod. xxv. 7. [k] Heb. xii. 14.
[l] Titus iii. 8.

2. No man is actually justified, but he that is in some measure sanctified. For the understanding and clearing of which proposition we must know, that justification, when it is attributed to any cause, does not always signify justification actual. Thus, when it is said in Scripture, "We are justified by the death of Christ," it is but the same thing as to say, "Christ died for us;" and he rose again for us too, that we might indeed be justified in due time, and by just measures and dispositions; "he died for our sins, and rose again for our justification;" that is, by his death and resurrection he hath obtained this power, and effected this mercy, that if we believe him and obey, we shall be justified and made capable of all the blessings of the kingdom. But that this is no more but a capacity of pardon, of grace, and of salvation, appears not only by God's requiring obedience as a condition on our parts, but by his expressly attributing this mercy to us at such times, and in such circumstances, in which it is certain and evident, that we could not actually be justified; for so saith the scripture: "We, when we were enemies, were reconciled to God by the death of his Son; and while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us;"[q] that is, then was our justification wrought on God's part; that is, then he intended this mercy to us, then he resolved to show us favour, to give us promises, and laws, and conditions, and hopes, and an infallible economy of salvation; and when faith lays hold on this grace, and this justification, then we are to do the other part of it; that is, as God made it potential by the death and resurrection of Christ, so we, laying hold on these things by faith, and working the righteousness of faith, that is, performing what is required on our parts, we, I say, make it actual; and for this very reason it is, that the apostle puts more emphasis upon the resurrection of Christ than upon his death, "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again."[r] And "Christ was both delivered for our sins, and is risen again for our justification;"[s] implying to us, that as it is in the principal, so it is in the correspondent; our sins indeed are potentially pardoned, when they are marked out for death and crucifixion; when, by resolving and fighting against sin, we die to sin daily, and are so made conformable to his death; but we must partake of Christ's resurrection before this justification can be actual; when we are "dead to sin, and are risen again unto righteousness," then, as we are "partakers of his death," so we shall "be partakers of his resurrection," saith St. Paul; that is, then we are truly, effectually, and indeed justified; till then we are not.

"He that loveth gold, shall not be justified," saith the wise Bensirach;[t] he that is covetous, let his faith be what it will, shall not be accounted righteous before God, because he is not so in himself, and he is not so in Christ, for he is not in Christ at all; he hath no righteousness in himself, and he hath none in Christ; for if we be in Christ, or "if Christ be in us, the body is dead by reason of sin, and the spirit is life because of righteousness:" [u] for this is the τὸ πιστὸν, "that faithful thing," that is, the faithfulness is manifested; the "emun," from whence comes "emunah," which is the Hebrew word for "faith," from whence "amen" is derived. "Fiat quod dictum est hinc inde; hoc fidum est;" when God and we both say amen to our promises and undertakings. "Fac fidelis sis fideli; cave fidem fluxam geras," said he in the comedy; [x] God is faithful, be thou so too; for if thou failest him, thy faith hath failed thee. "Fides sumitur pro eo, quod est inter utrumque placitum," says one; and then it is true which the prophet and the apostle said, "the just shall live by faith," in both senses: "ex fide meâ vivet, ex fide suâ:" "we live by God's faith, and by our own;" by his fidelity, and by ours. When the righteousness of God becomes "your righteousness, and exceeds the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees;" when the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in us, "by walking not after the flesh, but after the Spirit;" then we are justified by God's truth and by ours, by his grace and our obedience. So that now we see that justification and sanctification cannot be distinguished but as words of art signifying the various steps of progression in the same course; they may be distinguished in notion and speculation, but never when they are to pass on to material events; for no man is justified but he that is also sanctified. They are the express words of St. Paul: "Whom he did foreknow, them he did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son," to be like to Christ; and then it follows, "Whom he hath predestinated," so predestinated, "them he hath also called, and whom he hath called, them he hath also justified:" and then it follows, "Whom he hath justified, them he hath also glorified." [y] So that no man is justified, that is, so as to signify salvation, but sanctification must be precedent to it; and that was my second consideration ὅπερ ἔδει δεῖξαι, "that which I was to prove."

3. I pray consider, that he that does not believe the promises of the gospel, cannot pretend to faith in Christ; but the promises are all made to us upon the conditions of obedience, and he that does not believe them as Christ made them, believes them not at all. "In well-doing commit yourselves to God as unto a faithful Creator;" there is no committing ourselves to God without well-doing: "For God will render to every man according to his deeds: to them that obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath; but to them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honour, and immortality, to them eternal life." [z] So that if faith apprehends any other promises, it is illusion, and not faith; God gave us none such, Christ purchased none such for us; search the Bible over, and you shall find none such. But if faith lays hold on these promises that are, and as they are, then it becomes an article of our faith, that without obedience and a sincere endeavour to keep God's commandments, no man living can be justified; and, therefore, let us take heed, when we magnify the free grace of God, we do not exclude the conditions, which this free grace hath set upon us. Christ freely died for us, God pardons us freely in our first access to him; we could never deserve pardon, because when we need pardon we are enemies, and have no good thing in us; and he freely gives us of his Spirit, and freely he enables us to obey him; and for our little imperfect services he freely and bountifully will give us eternal life; here is free grace all the way, and he overvalues his pitiful services, who thinks that he deserves heaven by them; and that if he does his duty tolerably, eternal life is not a free gift to him, but a deserved reward.

Conscius est animus meus, experientia testis,
Mystica quæ retuli dogmata vera scio.
Non tamen idcirco scio me fore glorificandum,
Spes mea crux Christi, gratia, non opera.

It was the meditation of the wise chancellor of Paris: "I know that without a good life, and the fruits of repentance, a sinner cannot be justified; and, therefore, I must live well, or I must die for ever; but if I do live holily, I do not think that I deserve heaven, it is the cross of Christ that procures me grace; it is the Spirit of Christ that gives me grace; it is the mercy and the free gift of Christ that brings me unto glory." But yet he that shall exclude the works of faith from the justification of a sinner by the blood of Christ, may as well exclude faith itself; for faith itself is one of the works of God; it is a good work, so said Christ to them that asked him, "What shall we do to work the works of God? Jesus said, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." [a] Faith is not only the foundation of good works, but itself is a good work; it is not only the cause of obedience, but a part of it; it is not only, as the son of Sirach calls it, "initium adhærendi Deo," "a beginning of cleaving unto God," but it carries us on to the perfection of it. Christ is the Author and Finisher of our faith; and when faith is finished, a good life is made perfect in our kind: let no man therefore expect events, for which he hath no promise; nor call for God's fidelity without his own faithfulness; nor snatch at a promise without performing the condition; nor think faith to be a hand to apprehend Christ, and to do nothing else; for that will but deceive us, and turn religion into words, and holiness into hypocrisy, and the promises of God into a snare, and the truth of God into a lie. For when God made a covenant of faith, he made also the νόμος πίστεως, "the law of faith;" and when he admitted us to a covenant of more mercy than was in the covenant of works, or of the law, he did not admit us to a covenant of idleness, and an incurious walking in a state of disobedience; but the mercy of God leadeth us to repentance, and when he gives us better promises, he intends we should pay him a better obedience; when he forgives us what is past, he intends we should sin no more; when he offers us his graces, he would have us to make use of them; when he causes us to distrust ourselves, his meaning is we should rely upon him; when he enables us to do what he commands us, he commands us to do all that we can. And, therefore, this covenant of faith and mercy is also a covenant of holiness, and the grace that pardons us does also purify us: for so saith the apostle, "He that hath this hope purifies himself, even as God is pure." And when we are so, then we are justified indeed; this is the νόμος πίστεως, "the law of faith;" and by works in this sense, that is, by the works of faith, by faith working by love, and producing fruits worthy of amendment of life, we are justified before God. And so I have done with the affirmative proposition of my text; you see that "a man is justified by works."

But there is more in it than this matter yet amounts to: for St. James does not say, "we are justified by works, and are not justified by faith;" that had been irreconcilable with St. Paul; but we are so justified by works, that it is not by faith alone; it is faith and works together: that is, it is by the ὑπακοὴ πίστεως, "by the obedience of faith," by the works of faith, by the law of faith, by righteousness evangelical, by the conditions of the gospel, and the measures of Christ. I have many things to say in this particular; but because I have but a little time left to say them in, I will sum it all up in this proposition, that in the question of justification and salvation, faith and good works are no part of a distinction, but members of one entire body. Faith and good works together work the righteousness of God: that is, that I may speak plainly, justifying faith contains in it obedience; and if this be made good, then the two apostles are reconciled to each other, and both of them to the necessity, the indispensable necessity of a good life.

Now that justifying and saving faith must be defined by something more than an act of understanding, appears not only in this, that St. Peter reckons faith as distinctly from knowledge as he does from patience, or strength, or brotherly kindness: saying, "Add to your faith, virtue; to virtue, knowledge;"[b] but in this also, because an error in life, and whatsoever is against holiness, is against faith: and, therefore, St. Paul reckons the lawless and the disobedient, murderers of parents, man-stealing, and such things, to be against sound doctrines; for the doctrine of faith is called ἡ κατ' εὐσέβειαν διδασκαλία, "the doctrine that is according to godliness." And when St. Paul prays against ungodly men, he adds this reason, οὐ γὰρ πάντων ἡ πίστις, "for all men have not faith:"[c] meaning that wicked men are infidels and unbelievers; and particularly he affirms of him "that does not provide for his own, that he hath denied the faith."[d] Now from hence it follows that faith is godliness, because all wickedness is infidelity, it is an apostasy from the faith. "Ille erit, ille nocens qui me tibi fecerat hostem;" he that sins against God, he is the enemy to the faith of Jesus Christ; and therefore we deceive ourselves, if we place faith in the understanding only; it is not that, and it does not well there, but ἐν καθαρᾷ συνειδήσει, saith the apostle; the mystery of faith is kept no where, it dwells no where but "in a pure conscience."

For I consider, that, since all mortal habits are best defined by their operation, we can best understand what faith is by seeing what it does. To this purpose hear St. Paul: "By faith, Abel offered up to God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain. By faith, Noah made an ark. By faith, Abraham left his country, and offered up his son. By faith, Moses chose to suffer affliction, and accounted the reproach of Christ greater than all the riches of Egypt."[e] In short, the children of God, "by faith, subdued kingdoms, and wrought righteousness." To work righteousness is as much the duty and work of faith as believing is. So that now we may quickly make an end of this great inquiry, whether a man is justified by faith, or by works, for he is so by both: if you take it alone, faith does not justify: but take it in the aggregate sense, as it is used in the question of justification by St. Paul, and then faith does not only justify, but it sanctifies too; and then you need to inquire no further; obedience is a part of the definition of faith, as much as it is of charity. This is love, saith St. John, "that we keep his commandments." And the very same is affirmed of faith too by Bensirach, "He that believeth the Lord, will keep his commandments."[f]

I have now done with all the propositions expressed and implied in the text. Give me leave to make some practical considerations; and so I shall dismiss you from this attention.

The rise I take from the words of St. Epiphanius,[g] speaking in the praise of the apostolical and purest ages of the church. There was, at first, no distinction of sects and opinions in the church; she knew no difference of men, but good and bad; there was no separation made, but what was made by piety or impiety, or, says he, which is all one, by fidelity and infidelity; πίστις μὲν ἐπέχουσα τοῦ Χριστιανισμοῦ εἰκόνα· ἀπιστία δὲ ἐπέχουσα τόν ἀσεβείας χαρακτῆρα καὶ παρανομίας· "for faith hath in it the image of godliness engraven, and infidelity hath the character of wickedness and prevarication." A man was not then esteemed a saint, for disobeying his bishop or an apostle, nor for misunderstanding the hard sayings of St. Paul about predestination; to kick against the laudable customs of the church, was not then accounted a note of the godly party; and to despise government was but an ill mark and weak indication of being a good christian. The kingdom of God did not then consist in words, but in power, the power of godliness; though now we are fallen into another method; we have turned all religion into faith, and our faith is nothing but the productions of interest or disputing,—it is adhering to a party, and a wrangling against all the world beside; and when it is asked of what religion he is of, we understand the meaning to be, what faction does he follow: what are the articles of his sect, not what is the manner of his life: and if men be zealous for their party and that interest, then they are precious men, though otherwise they be covetous as the grave, factious as Dathan, schismatical as Corah, or proud as the fallen angels. Alas! these things will but deceive us; the faith of a christian cannot consist in strifes about words, and perverse disputings of men. These things the apostle calls "profane and vain babblings;"[h] and, mark what he says of them, these things will increase ἐπὶ πλεῖον ἀσεβείας· They are, in themselves, ungodliness, and will produce more,—"they will increase unto more ungodliness." But the faith of a christian had other measures; that was faith then which made men faithful to their vows in baptism. The faith of a christian was the best security in contracts, and a christian's word was as good as his bond, because he was faithful that promised, and a christian would rather die than break his word, and was always true to his trust; he was faithful to his friend, and loved as Jonathan did David. This was the christian faith then: their religion was, to hurt no man, and to do good to every man, and so it ought to be. "True religion is to visit the fatherless and widow, and to keep ourselves unspotted of the world." That is a good religion that is "pure and undefiled." So St. James: and St. Chrysostom defines εὐσέβειαν, "true religion," to be πίστιν καθαρὰν καὶ ὀρθὸν βίον, "a pure faith and a godly life;" for they make up the whole mystery of godliness; and no man could then pretend to faith, but he that did do valiantly, and suffer patiently, and resist the devil, and overcome the world. These things are as properly the actions of faith, as alms is of charity; and therefore, they must enter into the moral definition of it. And this was truly understood by Salvian, that wise and godly priest of Massilia: what is faith, and what is believing, saith he; "hominem fideliter Christo credere est fidelem Deo esse, h. e. fideliter Dei mandata servare:" "That man does faithfully believe in Christ, who is faithful unto God,—who faithfully keeps God's commandments;" and, therefore, let us measure our faith here, by our faithfulness to God, and by our diligence to do our Master's commandments; for "Christianorum omnis religio sine scelere et maculâ vivere," said Lactantius; "The whole religion of a christian is to live unblamably,"[i] that is, in all holiness and purity of conversation.

2. When our faith is spoken of as the great instrument of justification and salvation, take Abraham's faith as your best pattern, and that will end the dispute, because that he was justified by faith, when his faith was mighty in effect; when he trusted in God, when he believed the promises, when he expected a resurrection of the dead, when he was strong in faith, when he gave glory to God, when against hope he believed in hope; and when all this passed into an act of a most glorious obedience, even denying his greatest desires, contradicting his most passionate affections, offering to God the best thing he had, and exposing to death his beloved Isaac, his laughters, all his joy, at the command of God. By this faith he was justified, saith St. Paul; "by these works he was justified," saith St. James; that is, by this faith working this obedience. And then all the difficulty is over; only remember this, your faith is weak, and will do but little for you, if it be not stronger than all your secular desires and all your peevish angers. Thus we find, in the holy gospels, this conjunction declared necessary, "Whatsoever things ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them."[k] Here is as glorious an event promised to faith as can be expressed; faith shall obtain any thing of God. True; but it is not faith alone, but faith in prayer; faith praying, not faith simply believing. So St. James; the "prayer of faith shall save the sick;" but adds, it must be "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man;" so that faith shall prevail, but there must be prayer in faith, and fervour in prayer, and devotion in fervour, and righteousness in devotion; and then impute the effect to faith if you please, provided that it be declared, that effect cannot be wrought by faith unless it be so qualified. But Christ adds one thing more: "When ye stand praying, forgive; but if ye will not forgive, neither will your Father forgive you." So that it will be to no purpose to say a man is justified by faith, unless you mingle charity with it; for without the charity of forgiveness, there can be no pardon, and then justification is but a word, when it effects nothing.

3. Let every one take heed, that by an importune adhering to and relying upon a mistaken faith, he do not really make a shipwreck of a right faith. Hymenæus and Alexander lost their faith by putting away a good conscience; and what matter is it of what religion or faith a man be, if he be a villain and a cheat, a man of no truth, and of no trust, a lover of the world, and not a lover of God? But, I pray, consider, can any man have faith that denies God? That is not possible: and cannot a man as well deny God by an evil action, as by an heretical proposition? Cannot a man deny God by works, as much as by words? Hear what the apostle says: "They profess that they know God, but in works they deny him, being abominable and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate."[l] Disobedience is a denying God, "Nolumus hunc regnare," is as plain a renouncing of Christ, as "Nolumus huic credere." It is to no purpose to say we believe in Christ and have faith, unless Christ reign in our hearts by faith.

4. From these premises we may see but too evidently, that though a great part of mankind pretend to be saved by faith, yet they know not what it is, or else wilfully mistake it, and place their hopes upon sand, or the more unstable water. Believing is the least thing in a justifying faith; for faith is a conjugation of many ingredients, and faith is a covenant, and faith is a law, and faith is obedience, and faith is a work, and indeed it is a sincere cleaving to and closing with the terms of the gospel in every instance, in every particular. Alas! the niceties of a spruce understanding, and the curious nothings of useless speculation, and all the opinions of men that make the divisions of heart, and do nothing else, cannot bring us one drop of comfort in the day of tribulation, and therefore are no parts of the strength of faith. Nay, when a man begins truly to fear God, and is in the agonies of mortification, all these new nothings and curiosities will lie neglected by, as baubles do by children when they are deadly sick. But that only is faith that makes us to love God, to do his will, to suffer his impositions, to trust his promises, to see through a cloud, to overcome the world, to resist the devil, to stand in the day of trial, and to be comforted in all our sorrows. This is that precious faith so mainly necessary to be insisted on, that by it we may be sons of the free woman, "liberi à vitiis ac ritibus;" that the true Isaac may be in us, which is Christ according to the Spirit, the wisdom and power of God, a divine vigour and life, whereby we are enabled, with joy and cheerfulness, to walk in the way of God. By this you may try your faith, if you please, and make an end of this question: Do you believe in the Lord Jesus, yea or no? God forbid else; but if your faith be good, it will abide the trial. There are but three things that make the integrity of christian faith; believing the words of God, confidence in his goodness, and keeping his commandments.

For the first, it is evident that every man pretends to it; if he calls himself christian, he believes all that is in the canon of the Scriptures; and if he did not, he were indeed no christian. But now consider, what think we of this proposition? "All shall be damned who believe not the truth, but have pleasure in unrighteousness."[m] Does not every man believe this? Is it possible they can believe there is any such thing as unrighteousness in the world, or any such thing as damnation, and yet commit that which the Scriptures call unrighteousness, and which all laws and all good men say is so? Consider how many unrighteous men there are in the world, and yet how few of them think they shall be damned. I know not how it comes to pass, but men go upon strange principles, and they have made christianity to be a very odd institution, if it had not better measures than they are pleased to afford it. There are two great roots of all evil, covetousness and pride, and they have infected the greatest parts of mankind, and yet no man thinks himself to be either covetous or proud; and, therefore, whatever you discourse against these sins, it never hits any man, but, like Jonathan's arrows to David, they fall short, or they fly beyond. Salvian complained of it in his time: "Hoc ad crimina nostra addimus, ut cum in omnibus rei simus, etiam bonos nos et sanctos esse credamus:" "This we add unto our crimes, we are the vilest persons in the world, and yet we think ourselves to be good people," and, when we die, make no question but we shall go to heaven.[n] There is no cause of this, but because we have not so much faith as believing comes to; and yet most men will pretend not only to believe, but to love Christ all this while. And how do they prove this? Truly they hate the memory of Judas, and curse the Jews that crucified Christ, and think Pilate a very miserable man, and that all the Turks are damned, and to be called Caiaphas is a word of reproach; and, indeed, there are many that do not much more for Christ than this comes to; things to as little purpose, and of as little signification. But so the Jews did hate the memory of Corah as we do of Caiaphas, and they built the sepulchre of the prophets; and we also are angry at them that killed the apostles and the martyrs; but, in the mean time, we neither love Christ nor his saints; for we neither obey him, nor imitate them. And yet we should think ourselves highly injured, if one should call us infidels, and haters of Christ. But, I pray, consider; what is hating of any man, but designing and doing him all the injury and spite we can? Does not he hate Christ that dishonours him, that makes Christ's members the members of a harlot, that doth not feed and clothe these members? If the Jews did hate Christ when they crucified him, then so does a christian too, when he crucifies him again. Let us not deceive ourselves; a christian may be damned as well as a Turk; and christians may with as much malice crucify Christ, as the Jews did: and so does every man that sins wilfully; he spills the blood of Christ, making it to be spent in vain. "He that hateth you, hateth me; he that receives you, receives me," said Christ to his apostles. I wish the world had so much faith as to believe that; and by this try whether we love Christ, and believe in him, or no. I shall, for the trial of our faith, ask one easy question: Do we believe that the story of David and Jonathan is true? Have we so much faith as to think it possible that two rivals of a crown should love so dearly? Can any man believe this, and not be infinitely ashamed to see christians, almost all christians, to be irreconcilably angry, and ready to pull their brother's heart out, when he offers to take our land or money from us? Why do almost all men that go to law for right, hate one another's persons? Why cannot men with patience hear their titles questioned? But, if christianity be so excellent a religion, why are so very many christians so very wicked? Certainly they do not so much as believe the propositions and principles of their own religion. For the body of christians is so universally wicked, that it would be a greater change to see christians generally live according to their profession, than it was at first from infidelity to see them turn believers. The conversion from christian to christian, from christian in title to christian in sincerity, would be a greater miracle than it was, when they were converted from heathen and Jew to christian. What is the matter? Is not "repentance from dead works" reckoned by St. Paul[o] as one of the fundamental points of christian religion? Is it not a piece of our catechism, the first thing we are taught, and is it not the last thing that we practise? We had better be without baptism than without repentance, and yet both are necessary; and, therefore, if we were not without faith, we should be without neither. Is not repentance a forsaking all sin, and an entire returning unto God? Who can deny this? And is it not plainly said in Scripture, "Unless ye repent, ye shall all perish?" But show me the man that believes these things heartily; that is, show me a true penitent, he only believes the doctrines of repentance.

[m] 2 Thess. ii. 12. [n] Lib. iii.

If I had time, I should examine your faith by your confidence in God, and by your obedience. But, if we fall in the mere believing, it is not likely we should do better in the other. But because all the promises of God are conditional, and there can be no confidence in the particular without a promise or revelation, it is not possible that any man that does not live well, should reasonably put his trust in God. To live a wicked life, and then to be confident that in the day of our death God will give us pardon, is not faith, but a direct want of faith. If we did believe the promises upon their proper conditions, or believe that God's commandments were righteous and true, or that the threatenings were as really intended as they are terribly spoken,—we should not dare to live at the rate we do. But "wicked men have not faith," saith St. Paul; and then the wonder ceases.

But there are such palpable contradictions between men's practices and the fundamentals of our faith, that it was a material consideration of our blessed Saviour, "When the Son of man comes, shall he find faith upon earth?" meaning it should be very hard and scant: "Every man shall boast of his own goodness; 'sed virum fidelem,' (saith Solomon,) but 'a faithful man,' who can find?" Some men are very good when they are afflicted.

> Hanc tibi virtutem fractâ facit urceus ansâ,
> Et tristis nullo qui tepet igne focus;
> Et teges et cimex, et nudi sponda grabati,
> Fit brevis atque eadem nocte dieque toga. MARTIAL.

When the gown of the day is the mantle of the night, and cannot at the same time cover the head and make the feet warm; when they have but one broken dish and no spoon, then they are humble and modest; then they can suffer an injury and bear contempt: but give them riches, and they grow insolent; fear and pusillanimity did their first work, and an opportunity to sin undoes it all. "Bonum militem perdidisti, imperatorem pessimum creâsti," said Galba: "You have spoiled a good trooper, when you made me a bad commander." Others can never serve God but when they are prosperous; if they lose their fortune, they lose their faith, and quit their charity: "Non rata fides, ubi jam melior fortuna ruit;" if they become poor, they become liars and deceivers of their trust, envious and greedy, restless and uncharitable; that is, one way or other they show that they love the world, and by all the faith they pretend to cannot overcome it.

Cast up, therefore, your reckonings impartially; see what is, what will be required at your hands; do not think you can be justified by faith, unless your faith be greater than all your passions; you have not the learning, not so much as the common notices of faith, unless you can tell when you are covetous, and reprove yourself when you are proud; but he that is so, and knows it not, (and that is the case of most men,) hath no faith, and neither knows God nor knows himself.

To conclude. He that hath true justifying faith, believes the power of God to be above the powers of nature; the goodness of God above the merit and disposition of our persons; the bounty of God above the excellency of our works; the truth of God above the contradiction of our weak arguings and fears; the love of God above our cold experience and ineffectual reason; and the necessities of doing good works above the faint excuses and ignorant pretences of disputing sinners: but want of faith makes us so generally wicked as we are, so often running to despair, so often baffled in our resolutions of a good life; but he whose faith makes him more than conqueror over these difficulties, to him Isaac shall be born even in his old age; the life of God shall be perfectly wrought in him; and by this faith, so operative, so strong, so lasting, so obedient, he shall be justified, and he shall be saved.

SERMON IV.

PREACHED AT THE

CONSECRATION OF TWO ARCHBISHOPS AND TEN BISHOPS,

IN THE CATHEDRAL CHURCH OF ST. PATRICK, IN DUBLIN,

January 27, 1660.

Sal liquefit, ut condiat.

TO THE CHRISTIAN READER.

My obedience to the commands of the Right Honourable the Lord Justices, and the most Reverend and Learned Primate, and to the desires of my Reverend Brethren, put it past my inquiry, whether I ought to publish this following Sermon. I will not, therefore, excuse it, and say it might have advantages in the delivery which it would want in the reading; and the ear would be kind to the piety of it, which was apparent in the design, when the eye would be severe in its censure of those arguments, which, as they could not be longer in that measure of time, so would have appeared more firm, if they could have had liberty to have been pursued to their utmost issue: but reason lies in a little room, and obedience in less; and although what I have here said, may not stop the mouths of men resolved to keep up a faction, yet I have said enough to the sober and pious, to them who love order, and hearken to the voice of the spouse of Christ, to the loving and to the obedient: and for those that are not so, I have no argument fit to be used, but prayer, and readiness to give them a reason when they shall modestly demand it. In the mean time, I shall only desire them to make use of those truths which the more learned of their party have, by the evidence of fact, been forced to confess. Rivet affirms, that it descended "ex veteris ævi reliquiis," that presbyters should be assistants or conjoined to the bishops (who is by this confessed to be the principal) in the imposition of hands for ordination. Walo Messalinus acknowledges it to be "rem antiquissimam," "a most ancient thing," that these two orders, viz., of bishops and presbyters, should be distinct, even in the middle, or in the beginning of the next age after Christ. David Blondel places it to be thirty-five years after the death of St. John. Now, then, episcopacy is confessed to be of about one thousand six hundred years' continuance; and if, before this, they can show any ordination by mere presbyters, by any but an apostle, or an apostolical man; and if there were not visibly a distinction of powers and persons relatively in the ecclesiastical government; or if they can give a rational account why they, who are forced to confess the honour and distinct order of episcopacy, for about sixteen ages, should, in the dark interval of thirty-five years, in which they can pretend to no monument or record to the contrary, yet make unlearned scruples of things they cannot colourably prove; if, I say, they can reasonably account for these things, I, for my part, will be ready to confess, that they are not guilty of the greatest, the most unreasonable and inexcusable schism in the world; but else they have no colour to palliate the unlearned crime: for will not all wise men in the world conclude, that the church of God, which was then holy, not in title only and design, but practically and materially, and persecuted, and not immerged in secular temptations, could not, all in one instant, join together to alter that form of church government, which Christ and his apostles had so recently established, and, without a Divine warrant, destroy a Divine institution, not only to the confusion of the hierarchy, but to the ruin of their own souls? It were strange that so great a change should be, and no good man oppose it: "In toto orbe decretum est;" so St. Jerome: "All the world consented" in the advancement of the episcopal order: and, therefore, if we had no more to say for it, yet in prudence and piety we cannot say they would innovate in so great a matter.

But I shall enter no further upon this inquiry: only I remember that it is not very many months since the bigots of the popish party cried out against us vehemently, and inquired, "Where is your church of England, since you have no unity? for your ecclesiastic head of unity, your bishops, are gone:" and if we should be desirous to verify their argument, so as indeed to destroy episcopacy, we should too much advantage popery, and do the most imprudent and most impious thing in the world. But blessed be God, who hath restored that government, for which our late king, of glorious memory, gave his blood; and that, methinks, should very much weigh with all the king's true-hearted subjects, who should make it religion not to rob that glorious prince of the greatest honour of such a martyrdom. For my part, I think it fit to rest in these words of another martyr, St. Cyprian: "Si quis cum episcopo non sit, in ecclesia non esse:" "He that is not with the bishop, is not in the church:" * that is, he that goes away from him, and willingly separates, departs from God's church; and whether he can then be with God, is a very material consideration, and fit to be thought on by all that think heaven a more eligible good than the interests of a faction and the importune desire of rule can countervail.

However, I have, in the following papers, spoken a few things, which, I hope, may be fit to persuade them that are not infinitely prejudiced: and although two or three good arguments are as good as two or three hundred, yet my purpose here was to prove the dignity and necessity of the office and order episcopal, only that it might be as an economy to convey notice and remembrances of the great duty incumbent upon all them that undertake this great charge. The dignity and the duty take one another by the hand, and are born together; only every sheep of the flock must take care to make the bishop's duty as easy as it can, by humility and love, by prayer and by obedience. It is, at the best, very difficult; but they who oppose themselves to government, make it harder and uncomfortable: but take heed, if thy bishop hath cause to complain to God of thee, for thy perverseness and uncharitable walking, thou wilt be the loser; and for us, we can only say, in the words of the prophet, "We will weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people:" † but our comfort is in God: for we can do nothing without him, but in him we can do all things: and, therefore, we will pray, "Domine, dabis pacem nobis; omnia enim opera nostra operatus es in nobis:" "God hath wrought all our works within us; and therefore he will give us peace, and give us his Spirit."‡

"Finally: Brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified, even as it is with you; and that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men; for all men have not faith."§

SERMON.

And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward, whom his lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season?

Blessed is that servant, whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing.—Luke xii. 42, 43.

Τίς ἐστιν ἄρα πιστὸς καὶ φρόνιμος οἰκονόμος.

THESE words are not properly a question, though they seem so; and the particle τὶς is not interrogative, but hypothetical, and extends "who" to "whosoever;" plainly meaning, that whoever is a steward over Christ's household, of him God requires a great care, because he hath trusted him with a great employment. Every steward ὃν καθέστήκεν ὁ Κύριος, so it is in St. Matthew;[a] ὃν καταστήσει ὁ Κύριος, so it is in my text; every steward whom the Lord hath or shall appoint over the family, to rule it and to feed it, now and in all generations of men, as long as this family shall abide on earth; that is, the apostles, and they who were to succeed the apostles in the stewardship, were to be furnished with the same power, and to undertake the same charge, and to give the same strict and severe accounts.

In these words here is something insinuated, and much expressed.

1. That which is insinuated only is, who these stewards are, whom Christ had, whom Christ would appoint over his family, the church: they are not here named, but we shall find them out by their proper direction and indigitation by and by.

2. But that which is expressed, is the office itself, in a double capacity. 1. In the dignity of it, it is a rule and a government; "whom the lord shall make ruler over his household." 2. In the care and duty of it, which determines the government to be paternal and profitable; it is a rule, but such a rule as shepherds have over their flocks, to lead them to good pastures, and to keep them within their appointed walks, and within their folds: διδόναι σιτομέτριον· that is the work, "to give them a measure and proportion of nourishment:" τροφὴν ἐν καιρῷ, so St. Matthew calls it: "meat in the season;" that which is fit for them, and when it is fit; meat enough, and meat convenient; and both together mean that which the Greek poets call ἁρμαλιὴν ἔμμηνον,[b] "the strong wholesome diet."

3. Lastly: Here is the reward of the faithful and wise dispensation. The steward that does so, and continues to do so, till his Lord find him so doing, this man shall be blessed in his deed. "Blessed is the servant, whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing." Of these in order.

1. Who are these rulers of Christ's family? for though Christ knew it, and, therefore, needed not to ask; yet we have disputed it so much, and obeyed so little, that we have changed the plain hypothesis into an entangled question. The answer yet is easy as to some part of the inquiry: the apostles are the first meaning of the text; for they were our fathers in Christ, they begat sons and daughters unto God; and were a spiritual paternity, is evident: we need look no further for spiritual government, because in the paternal rule all power is founded; they begat the family by the power of the word and the life of the Spirit, and they fed this family, and ruled it, by the word of their proper ministry: they had the keys of this house, the steward's ensign, and they had the ruler's place; "for they sat on twelve thrones, and judged the twelve tribes of Israel." But of this there is no question.

And as little of another proposition; that this stewardship was to last for ever, for the power of ministering in this office and the office itself were to be perpetual: for the issues and powers of government are more necessary for the perpetuating the church, than for the first planting; and if it was necessary that the apostles should have a rod and a staff at first, it would be more necessary afterwards, when the family was more numerous, and their first zeal abated, and their native simplicity perverted into arts of hypocrisy and forms of godliness, when "heresies should arise, and the love of many should wax cold." The apostles had also a power of ordination: and that the very power itself does denote, for it makes perpetuity, that could not expire in the days of the apostles; for by it they themselves propagated a succession. And Christ, having promised his Spirit to abide with his church for ever, and made his apostles the channels, the ministers and conveyances of it, that it might descend as the inheritance and eternal portion of the family; it cannot be imagined, that when the first ministers were gone, there should not others rise up in the same places, some like to the first, in the same office and ministry of the Spirit. But the thing is plain and evident in the matter of fact also: "Quod in ecclesiâ nunc geritur, hoc olim fecerunt apostoli," said St. Cyprian: "What the apostles did at first, that the church does to this day,"[c] and shall do so for ever: for when St. Paul had given to the bishop of Ephesus rules of government in this family, he commands that they should be "observed till the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ;"[d] and, therefore, these authorities and charges are given to him and to his successors; it is the observation of St. Ambrose upon the warranty of that text, and is obvious and undeniable.

Well, then, the apostles were the first stewards; and this office dies not with them, but must for ever be succeeded in; and now begins the inquiry, Who are the successors of the apostles? for they are, they must evidently be, the stewards to feed and to rule this family. There are some that say, that all who have any portion of work in the family, all the ministers of the gospel, are these stewards, and so all will be rulers. The presbyters surely; for, say they, presbyter and bishop is the same thing, and have the same name in Scripture, and, therefore, the office cannot be distinguished. To this I shall very briefly say two things, which will quickly clear our way through this bush of thorns.

1. That the word "presbyter" is but an honourable appellative used amongst the Jews, as "alderman" amongst us; but it signifies no order at all, nor was ever used in Scripture to signify any distinct company or order of clergy: and this appears not only by an induction in all the enumerations of the offices ministerial in the New Testament,[e] where to be a presbyter is never reckoned either as a distinct office, or a distinct order; but by its being indifferently communicated to all the superior clergy, and all the princes of the people.

2. The second thing I intended to say, is this: that although all the superior clergy had not only one, but divers common appellatives, all being called πρεσβύτεροι and διάκονοι, even the apostolate itself being called a deaconship;[f] yet it is evident, that before the common appellatives were fixed into names of propriety, they were as evidently distinguished in their offices and powers, as they are at this day in their names and titles.

To this purpose St. Paul gave to Titus, the bishop of Crete, a special commission, command, and power, to make ordinations; and in him, and in the person of Timothy, he did erect a court of judicature even over some of the clergy, who yet were called presbyters; "Against a presbyter receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses:"[g] there is the measure and the warranty of the "audientia episcopalis," "the bishops' audience court;" and when the accused were found guilty, he gives in charge to proceed to censures: ἔλεγχε ἀποτόμως, and δεῖ ἐπιστομίζειν· "You must rebuke them sharply, and you must silence them, stop their mouths,"[h] that is St. Paul's word; that they may no more scatter their venom in the ears and hearts of the people. These bishops were commanded "to set in order things that were wanting" in the churches, the same with that power of St. Paul;—"Other things will I set in order when I come," said he to the Corinthian churches; in which there were many who were called presbyters, who nevertheless, for all that name, had not that power. To the same purpose it is plain in Scripture, that some would have been apostles that were not; such were those whom the Spirit of God notes in the Revelation;[i] and some did "love pre-eminence" that had it not, for so did Diotrephes; and some were judges of questions, and all were not, for therefore they appealed to the apostles at Jerusalem; and St. Philip, though he was an evangelist, yet he could not give confirmation to the Samaritans whom he had baptized, but the apostles were sent for; for that was part of the power reserved to the episcopal or apostolic order.

Now from these premises, the conclusion is plain and easy. 1. Christ left a government in his church, and founded it in the persons of the apostles. 2. The apostles received this power for the perpetual use and benefit, for the comfort and edification of the church for ever. 3. The apostles had this government; but all that were taken into the ministry, and all that were called presbyters, had it not. If, therefore, this government, in which there is so much disparity in the very nature, and exercise, and first original of it, must abide for ever; then so must that disparity. If the apostolate, in the first stabiliment, was this eminency of power, then it must be so; that is, it must be the same in the succession that it was in the foundation. For, after the church is founded upon its governors, we are to expect no change of government. If Christ was the author of it, then, as Christ left it, so it must abide for ever: for ever there must be the governing and the governed, the superior and the subordinate, the ordainer and the ordained, the confirmer and the confirmed.

Thus far the way is straight, and the path is plain. The apostles were the stewards and the ordinary rulers of Christ's family, by virtue of the order and office apostolical; and although this be succeeded to for ever, yet no man, for his now or at any time being called a presbyter or elder, can pretend to it; for, besides his being a presbyter, he must be an apostle too; else, though he be called "in partem sollicitudinis," and may do the office of assistance and under-stewardship, yet the κῦρος, "the government," and rule of the family, belongs not to him.

But then τίς ἄρα καὶ σήμερον, "who are these stewards and rulers over the household now?" To this the answer is also certain and easy. Christ hath made the same governors to-day as heretofore; "apostles still." For though the twelve apostles are dead, yet the apostolical order is not: it is τάξις γεννητική, "a generative order," and begets more apostles. Now who these "minores apostoli" are, the successors of the apostles in that office apostolical and supreme regiment of souls, we are sufficiently taught in holy Scriptures; which when I have clearly shown to you, I shall pass on to some more practical considerations.

1. Therefore, certain and known it is, that Christ appointed two sorts of ecclesiastic persons,—twelve apostles, and the seventy-two disciples; to these he gave a limited commission; to those a fulness of power; to these a temporary employment; to those a perpetual and everlasting: from these two societies, founded by Christ, the whole church of God derives the two superior orders in the sacred hierarchy; and, as bishops do not claim a Divine right but by succession from the apostles, so the presbyters cannot pretend to have been instituted by Christ, but by claiming a succession to the seventy-two. And then consider the difference, compare the tables, and all the world will see the advantages of argument we have; for since the seventy-two had nothing but a mission on a temporary errand; and more than that, we hear nothing of them in Scripture; but upon the apostles Christ poured all the ecclesiastical power, and made them the ordinary ministers of that Spirit, which was to abide with the church for ever: the Divine institution of bishops, that is, of successors to the apostles, is much more clear than that Christ appointed presbyters, or successors of the seventy-two. And yet, if from hence they do not derive it, they can never prove their order to be of Divine institution at all, much less to be so alone.

But we may see the very thing itself—the very matter of fact. St. James, the bishop of Jerusalem, is by St. Paul called an apostle: "Other apostles saw I none, save James, the Lord's brother."[k] For there were some whom the Scriptures call "the apostles of our Lord;" that is, such which Christ made by his word immediately, or by his Spirit extraordinarily; and even into this number and title, Matthias, and St. Paul, and Barnabas, were accounted.[l] But the church also made apostles;[m] and these were called by St. Paul, ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν, "apostles of the churches;" and particularly Epaphroditus was the "apostle of the Philippians;" —"properly so, saith Primasius; and "what is this else but the bishop," saith Theodoret; for τοὺς νῦν καλουμένους ἐπισκόπους ὠνόμαζον ἀποστόλους, "those who are now called bishops, were then called apostles," saith the same father. The sense and full meaning of which argument is a perfect commentary upon that famous prophecy of the church, "Instead of thy fathers thou shalt have children, whom thou mayest make princes in all lands;[n] that is, not only the twelve apostles, our fathers in Christ, who first begat us, were to rule Christ's family, but when they were gone, their children and successors should arise in their stead: "Et nati natorum, et qui nascentur ab illis:" their direct successors to all generations shall be "principes populi," that is, "rulers and governors of the whole catholic church."—"De prole enim ecclesiæ crevit eadem paternitas, id est, episcopi quos illa genuit, et patres appellat, et constituit in sedibus patrum," saith St. Austin: "The children of the church become fathers of the faithful; that is, the church begets bishops, and places them in the seat of fathers, the first apostles."

After these plain and evident testimonies of Scripture, it will not be amiss to say, that this great affair, relying not only upon the words of institution, but on matter of fact, passed forth into a demonstration and greatest notoriety by the doctrine and practice of the whole catholic church: for so St. Irenæus, who was one of the most ancient fathers of the church, and might easily make good his affirmative: "We can," says he, "reckon the men, who by the apostles were appointed bishops in churches, to be their successors unto us; leaving to them the same power and authority which they had."—Thus St. Polycarp was by the apostles made bishop of Smyrna; St. Clement, bishop of Rome, by St. Peter; "and divers others by the apostles," saith Tertullian; saying also, that the Asian bishops were consecrated by St. John. And to be short, that bishops are the successors of the apostles in the stewardship and rule of the church, is expressly taught by St. Cyprian[o] and St. Jerome,[p] St. Ambrose and St. Austin,[q] by Euthymius and Pacianus, by St. Gregory and St. John Damascenus, by Clarius à Muscula and St. Sixtus, by Anacletus and St. Isidore; by the Roman council under St. Sylvester, and the council of Carthage; and the διαδοχὴ, or "succession" of bishops from the apostles' hands in all the churches apostolical, was as certainly known as in our chronicles we find the succession of our English kings, and one can no more be denied than the other. The conclusion from these premises I give you in the words of St. Cyprian: "Cogitent diaconi, quòd apostolos, id est, episcopos, Dominus ipse elegerit:" "Let the ministers know, that apostles, that is, the bishops, were chosen by our blessed Lord himself:"[r] and this was so evident, and so believed, that St. Austin affirms it with a "Nemo ignorat," "No man is so ignorant but he knows this, that our blessed Saviour appointed bishops over churches."[s]

Indeed the Gnostics spake evil of this order; for they are noted by three apostles, St. Paul, St. Peter, and St. Jude, to be "despisers of government, and to speak evil of dignities;" and what government it was they did so despise, we may understand by the words of St. Jude; they were ἐν τῇ ἀντιλογίᾳ τοῦ Κορὲ, "in the contradiction or gainsaying of Corah," who with his company rose up against Aaron the high priest; and excepting these, who were the vilest of men, no man, within the first three hundred years after Christ, opposed episcopacy. But when Constantine received the church into his arms, he found it universally governed by bishops; and, therefore, no wise or good man professing to be a christian, that is, to believe the holy catholic church, can be content to quit the apostolical government, (that by which the whole family of God was fed, and taught, and ruled,) and beget to himself new fathers and new apostles, who, by wanting succession from the apostles of our Lord, have no ecclesiastical and derivative communion with these fountains of our Saviour.

If ever Vincentius Lirinensis's rule could be used in any question, it is in this: "Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus;" that bishops are the successors of the apostles in this stewardship, and that they did always rule the family, was taught and acknowledged "always, and every where, and by all men" that were of the church of God: and if these evidences be not sufficient to convince modest and sober persons in this question, we shall find our faith to fail in many other articles, of which we yet are very confident: for the observation of the Lord's day, the consecration of the holy eucharist by priests, the baptizing infants, the communicating of women, and the very canon of the Scripture itself, rely but upon the same probation; and, therefore, the denying of articles thus proved, is a way, I do not say, to bring in all sects and heresies,—that is but little; —but a plain path and inlet to atheism and irreligion; for by this means it will not only be impossible to agree concerning the meaning of Scripture, but the Scripture itself, and all the records of religion, will become useless, and of no efficacy or persuasion.

I am entered into a sea of matter: but I will break it off abruptly, and sum up this inquiry with the words of the council of Chalcedon, which is one of the four generals, by our laws made the measures of judging heresies: Ἐπίσκοπον εἰς πρεσβυτέρου βαθμὸν ἀναφέρειν, ἱεροσυλία ἐστίν, "It is sacrilege to bring back a bishop to the degree and order of a presbyter." It is indeed a rifling the order, and entangling the gifts, and confounding the method of the Holy Ghost; it is a dishonouring them whom God would honour, and a robbing them of those spiritual eminences with which the Spirit of God does anoint the consecrated heads of bishops. And I shall say one thing more, which indeed is a great truth, that the diminution of episcopacy was first introduced by popery; and the popes of Rome, by communicating to abbots, and other mere priests, special graces to exercise some essential offices of episcopacy, have made this sacred order to be cheap, and apt to be invaded. But then add this: if Simon Magus was in so damnable a condition for offering to buy the gifts and powers of the apostolical order, what shall we think of them that snatch them away, and pretend to wear them, whether the apostles and their successors will or no? This is ψεύσασθαι τὸ ἅγιον Πνεῦμα, "to belie the Holy Ghost;" that is the least of it: it is rapine and sacrilege, besides the heresy and schism, and the spiritual lie. For the government episcopal, as it was exemplified in the synagogue, and practised by the same measures in the temple, so it was transcribed by the eternal Son of God, who translated it into a gospel ordinance: it was sanctified by the Holy Spirit, who named some of the persons, and gave to them all power and graces from above: it was subjected in the apostles first, and by them transmitted to a distinct order of ecclesiastics: it was received into all churches, consigned in the records of the Holy Scriptures, preached by the universal voice of all the christian world, delivered by notorious and uninterrupted practice, and derived to further and unquestionable issue by perpetual succession.

I have done with the hardest part of the text, by finding out the persons intrusted, "the stewards of Christ's family;" which though Christ only intimated in this place, yet he plainly enough manifested in others: the apostles, and their successors the bishops, are the men intrusted with this great charge; God grant they may all discharge it well. And so I pass from the officers to a consideration of the office itself, in the next words; "whom the Lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their meat in due season."

2. The office itself is the stewardship, that is episcopacy, the office of the bishop: the name signifies an office of the ruler indefinitely, but the word was chosen, and by the church appropriated to those whom it now signifies, both because the word itself is a monition of duty, and also because the faithful were used to it in the days of Moses and the prophets. The word is in the prophecy of the church: "I will give to thee princes in peace, καὶ ἐπισκόπους ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ, and bishops in righteousness;"[t] upon which place St. Jerome says, "Principes ecclesia vocat futuros episcopos;"[u] "The Spirit of God calls them who were to be christian bishops, 'principes,' or 'chief rulers,'" and this was no new thing; for the chief of the priests who were set over the rest, are called bishops by all the Hellenist Jews. Thus Joel is called ἐπίσκοπος ἐπ' αὐτοὺς, "the bishop over the priests;"[x] and the son of Bani, ἐπίσκοπος Λευίτων, "the bishop and visitor over the Levites;" and we find at the purging of the land from idolatry, the high priest placed ἐπισκόπους εἰς οἶκον Κυρίου, "bishops over the house of God."[y] Nay it was the appellative of the high priest himself, ἐπίσκοπος Ἐλεάζαρ, "bishop Eleazar,"[z] the son of Aaron the priest, to whom is committed the care of lamps, and the daily sacrifice, and the holy unction.

Now this word the church retained, choosing the same name to her superior ministers, because of the likeness of the ecclesiastical government between the Old and New Testament.

For Christ made no change but what was necessary: baptism was a rite among the Jews, and the Lord's supper was but the "post-cœnium" of the Hebrews changed into a mystery, from a type to a more real exhibition; and the Lord's Prayer was a collection of the most eminent devotions of the prophets and holy men before Christ, who prayed by the same Spirit; and the censures ecclesiastical were but an imitation of the proceedings of the Judaical tribunals; and the whole religion was but the law of Moses drawn out of its vail into clarity and manifestation; and to conclude in order to the present affair, the government which Christ left, was the same as he found it; for what Aaron and his sons, and the Levites, were in the temple,—that bishops, priests, and deacons, are in the church: it is affirmed by St. Jerome more than once; and the use he makes of it is this, "Esto subjectus pontifici tuo, et quasi animæ parentem suscipe;" "Obey your bishop, and receive him as the nursing-father of your soul."[a] But above all, this appellation is made honourable by being taken by our blessed Lord himself; for he is called in Scripture the "great Shepherd and Bishop of our souls."

But our inquiry is not after the name, but the office, and the dignity and duty of it: "Ecclesiæ gubernandæ sublimis ac Divina potestas," so St. Cyprian calls it; "A high and a Divine power from God of governing the church;" "rem magnam et pretiosam in conspectu Domini," so St. Cyril; "a great and precious thing in the sight of God;"—τῶν ἐν ἀνθρώποις εὐκταίων ὅρον, by Isidore Pelusiot; "the utmost limit of what is desirable among men:"—but the account upon which it is so desirable, is the same also that makes it formidable. They who have tried it, and did it conscientiously, have found the burden so great, as to make them stoop with care and labour; and they who do it ignorantly or carelessly, will find it will break their bones: for the bishop's office is all that duty which can be signified by those excellent words of St. Cyprian: "He is a bishop or overseer of the brotherhood, the ruler of the people, the shepherd of the flock, the governor of the church, the minister of Christ, and the priest of God." These are great titles, and yet less than what is said of them in Scripture, which calls them "salt of the earth,—lights upon a candlestick,—stars and angels,—fathers of our faith,—ambassadors of God,—dispensers of the mysteries of God,—the apostles of the churches,—and the glory of Christ:"—but then they are great burdens too; for the bishop is πεπιστευμένος τὸν λαὸν τοῦ Κυρίου, "intrusted with the Lord's people;" that is a great charge, but there is a worse matter that follows, καὶ τὸν ὑπὲρ τῶν ψυχῶν αὐτῶν λόγον ἀπαιτηθησόμενος· the bishop is he, of whom God will require "an account for all their souls:" they are the words of St. Paul,[b] and transcribed into the fortieth canon of the apostles, and the twenty-fourth canon of the council of Antioch.

And now I hope the envy is taken off; for the honour does not pay for the burden; and we can no sooner consider episcopacy in its dignity, as it is a rule; but the very nature of that rule does imply so severe a duty, that as the load of it is almost insufferable, so the event of it is very formidable, if we take not great care. For this stewardship is κυριότης καὶ διακονία, "a principality and a ministry." So it was in Christ; he is Lord of all, and yet he was the Servant of all: so it was in the apostles; it was κλῆρος διακονίας καὶ ἀποστολῆς, "their lot was to be apostles, and yet to serve and minister;"[c] and it is remarkable, that, in Isaiah, the Seventy use the word ἐπίσκοπος, or "bishop;"[d] but there they use it for the Hebrew word "nechosheth," which the Greeks usually render by ἐργοδιώκτης, φορολόγος, πράκτωρ, and the interlineary translation by "exactores." Bishops are only God's ministers and tribute-gatherers, requiring and overseeing them that they do their duty: and, therefore, here the case is so, and the burden so great, and the dignity so allayed, that the envious man hath no reason to be troubled that his brother hath so great a load, nor the proud man plainly to be delighted with so honourable a danger. It is indeed a rule, but it is paternal; it is a government, but it must be neither ἀναγκαστικὸν nor αἰσχροκερδὲς, it is neither "a power to constrain" nor "a commission to get wealth,"[e] for it must be without necessity, and not for filthy lucre sake; but it is a rule, ὡς διακονοῦντος, so St. Luke, "as of him that ministers;"[f] ὡς πάντων δούλου, so St. Mark, "as of him that is servant of all;"[g] ὡς πόδας νίπτοντος, so St. John;[h] such a principality as he hath "that washes the feet" of the weary traveller; or if you please, take it in the words of our blessed Lord himself, that "He that will be chief among you, let him be your minister;" meaning, that if under Christ's kingdom you desire rule, possibly you may have it; but all that rule under him, are servants to them that are ruled; and, therefore, you get nothing by it, but a great labour and a busy employment, a careful life and a necessity of making severe accounts. But all this is nothing but the general measures; I cannot be useful or understood unless I be more particular, The particulars we shall best enumerate by recounting those great conjugations of worthy offices and actions, by which christian bishops have blessed and built up christendom; for because we must be followers of them, as they were of Christ, the recounting what they did worthily in their generations, will not only demonstrate how useful, how profitable, how necessary episcopacy is to the christian church, but it will, at the same time, teach us our duty, by what services we are to benefit the church, in what works we are to be employed, and how to give an account of our stewardship with joy.

1. The christian church was founded by bishops, not only because the apostles, who were bishops, were the first preachers of the gospel, and planters of the churches,—but because the apostolical men, whom the apostles used in planting and disseminating religion, were, by all antiquity, affirmed to have been diocesan bishops; insomuch that, as St. Epiphanius[i] witnesses, there were, at the first disseminations of the faith of Christ, many churches, who had in them no other clergy, but a bishop and his deacons: and the presbyters were brought in afterwards, as the harvest grew greater: but the bishops' names are known, they are "recorded in the book of life," and "their praise is in the gospel;" such were Timothy and Titus, Clemens and Linus, Marcus and Dionysius, Onesimus and Caius, Epaphroditus and St. James, our Lord's brother,—Evodius and Simeon; all which, if there be any faith in christians that gave their lives for a testimony to the faith, and any truth in their stories; and unless we, who believe Thucydides and Plutarch, Livy and Tacitus, think that all church-story is a perpetual romance, and that all the brave men, the martyrs and the doctors of the primitive church, did conspire, as one man, to abuse all christendom for ever; I say, unless all these impossible suppositions be admitted,—all these, whom I have now reckoned, were bishops fixed in several churches, and had dioceses for their charges.

The consequent of this consideration is this: If bishops were those upon whose ministry Christ founded and built his church, let us consider what great wisdom is required of them that seem to be pillars: the stewards of Christ's family must be wise; that Christ requires: and if the order be necessary to the church, wisdom cannot but be necessary to the order; for it is a shame if they, who by their office are fathers in Christ, shall by their unskilfulness be but babes themselves, understanding not the secrets of religion, the mysteries of godliness, the perfections of the evangelical law, all the advantages and disadvantages in the spiritual life. A bishop must be exercised in godliness, a man of great experience in the secret conduct of souls, not satisfied with an ordinary skill in making homilies to the people, and speaking common exhortations in ordinary cases; but ready to answer in all secret inquiries, and able to convince the gainsayers, and to speak wisdom amongst them that are perfect.

If the first bishops laid the foundation, their successors must not only preserve whatsoever is fundamental, but build up the church in a most holy faith, taking care that no heresy sap the foundation, and that no hay or rotten wood be built upon it; and above all things, that a most holy life be superstructed upon a holy and unreprovable faith. So the apostles laid the foundation, and built the walls of the church, and their successors must raise up the roof as high as heaven. For let us talk and dispute eternally, we shall never compose the controversies in religion, and establish truth upon unalterable foundations, as long as men handle the word of God deceitfully, that is, with designs and little artifices, and secular partialities; and they will for ever do so, as long as they are proud or covetous. It is not the difficulty of our questions, or the subtlety of our adversaries, that makes disputes interminable; but we shall never cure the itch of disputing, or establish unity, unless we apply ourselves to humility and contempt of riches. If we will be contending, let us contend like the olive and the vine, who shall produce best and most fruit; not like the aspen and the elm, which shall make most noise in a wind. And all other methods are a beginning at a wrong end. And as for the people, the way to make them conformable to the wise and holy rules of faith and government, is by reducing them to live good lives. When the children of Israel gave themselves to gluttony, and drunkenness, and filthy lusts, they quickly fell into abominable idolatries; and St. Paul says, "that men make shipwreck of their faith by putting away a good conscience:"[k] for the mystery of faith is best preserved ἐν καθαρᾷ συνειδήσει, "in a pure conscience," saith the same apostle:[l] secure but that, and we shall quickly end our disputes, and have an obedient and conformable people; but else never.

2. As bishops were the first fathers of churches, and gave them being, so they preserve them in being; for without sacraments there is no church, or it will be starved, and die; and without bishops there can be no priests, and consequently no sacraments; and that must needs be a supreme order, from whence ordination itself proceeds. For it is evident and notorious, that in Scripture there is no record of ordination, but an apostolical hand was in it; one of the ἄνδρες ἡγούμενοι, one of the chief, one of the superior and "ruling" clergy; and it is as certain in the descending ages of the church, the bishop always had that power: it was never denied to him, and it was never imputed to presbyters: and St. Jerome himself, when, out of his anger against John, bishop of Jerusalem, he endeavoured to equal the presbyter with the bishop, though in very many places he spake otherwise, yet even then also, and in that heat, he excepted ordination, acknowledging that to be the bishop's peculiar. And, therefore, they who go about to extinguish episcopacy, do as Julian did; they destroy the presbytery, and starve the flock, and take away their shepherds, and dispark their pastures, and tempt God's providence to extraordinaries, and put the people to hard shifts, and turn the channels of salvation quite another way, and leave the church to a perpetual uncertainty, whether she be alive or dead, and the people destitute of the life of their souls, and their daily bread, and their spiritual comforts, and holy blessings.

The consequent of this is: if sacraments depend upon bishops, then let us take care that we convey to the people holy and pure materials, sanctified with a holy ministry, and ministered by holy persons: for although it be true that the efficacy of the sacraments does not depend wholly upon the worthiness of him that ministers; yet it is as true, that it does not wholly rely upon the worthiness of the receiver; but both together, relying upon the goodness of God, produce all those blessings which are designed. The minister hath an influence into the effect, and does very much towards it; and if there be a failure there, it is a defect in one of the concurring causes; and therefore an unholy bishop is a great diminution to the people's blessing. St. Jerome presses this severely: "Impiè faciunt," &c. "They do wickedly who affirm, that the holy eucharist is consecrated by the words (alone) and solemn prayer of the consecrator, and not also by his life and holiness:"[m] and therefore St. Cyprian affirms, that "none but holy and upright men are to be chosen, who, offering their sacrifices worthily to God, may be heard in their prayers for the Lord's people:"[n] but for others, "Sacrificia eorum, panis luctûs," saith the prophet Hosea: "Their sacrifices are like the bread of sorrow; whoever eats thereof, shall be defiled."

This discourse is not mine, but St. Cyprian's: and although his words are not to be understood dogmatically, but in the case of duty and caution, yet we may lay our hands upon our hearts, and consider how we shall give an account of our stewardship, if we shall offer to the people the bread of God with impure hands; it is of itself a pure nourishment; but if it passes through an unclean vessel, it loses much of its excellency.

3. The like also is to be said concerning prayer; for the episcopal order is appointed by God to be the great ministers of Christ's priesthood, that is, to stand between Christ and the people in the intercourse of prayer and blessing. "We will give ourselves continually to prayer," said the apostles; that was the one-half of their employment;—and indeed a bishop should spend very much of his time in holy prayer, and in diverting God's judgments, and procuring blessings to the people; for in all times, the chief of the religion was ever the chief minister of blessing. Thus Abraham blessed Abimelech, and Melchisedeck blessed Abraham, and Aaron blessed the people; and "without all controversy," saith the apostle, "the less is blessed of the greater." But then "we know that God heareth not sinners;" and it must be "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man that shall prevail."

And, therefore, we may easily consider, that a vicious prelate is a great calamity to that flock, which he is appointed to bless and pray for. How shall he reconcile the penitents, who is himself at enmity with God? How shall the Holy Spirit of God descend upon the symbols at his prayer, who does perpetually grieve him, and quench his holy fires, and drive him quite away? How shall he that hath not tasted of the Spirit by contemplation, stir up others to earnest desires of celestial things? Or what good shall the people receive, when the bishop lays upon their head a covetous or a cruel, an unjust or an impure hand? But, therefore, that I may use the words of St. Jerome, "Cum ab episcopo gratia in populum transfundatur, et mundi totius et ecclesiæ totius condimentum sit episcopus," &c.[o] Since it is intended that from the bishop grace should be diffused amongst all the people, there is not in the world a greater indecency than a holy office ministered by an unholy person, and no greater injury to the people, than that of the blessings which God sends to them by the ministries evangelical, they should be cheated and defrauded by a wicked steward. And, therefore, it was an excellent prayer, which to this very purpose was, by the son of Sirach, made in behalf of the high priests, the sons of Aaron: "God give you wisdom in your heart, to judge his people in righteousness, that their good things be not abolished, and that their glory may endure for ever."[p]

4. All the offices ecclesiastical always were, and ought to be, conducted by the episcopal order, as is evident in the universal doctrine and practice of the primitive church: Οἱ πρεσβύτεροι καὶ διάκονοι ἄνευ γνώμης τοῦ ἐπισκόπου μηδὲν ἐπιτελείτωσαν. It is the fortieth canon of the apostles, "Let the presbyters and deacons do nothing without leave of the bishop;"[q] but that case is known.

The consequent of this consideration is no other than the admonition in my text: "We are stewards of the manifold grace of God," and dispensers of the mysteries of the kingdom; and "it is required of stewards that they be found faithful;"[r] "that we preach the word of God in season and out of season,—that we rebuke and exhort, admonish and correct;"—for these God calls "pastores secundum cor meum," "pastors according to his own heart, which feed the people with knowledge and understanding;"[s] but they must also "comfort the afflicted, and bind up the broken heart;" minister the sacraments with great diligence, and righteous measures, and abundant charity, always having in mind those passionate words of Christ to St. Peter: "If thou lovest me, feed my sheep; if thou hast any love to me, feed my lambs."

And let us remember this also, that nothing can enforce the people to obey their bishops as they ought, but our doing that duty and charity to them which God requires. There is reason in these words of St. Chrysostom: "It is necessary that the church should adhere to their bishop, as the body to the head, as plants to their roots, as rivers to their springs, as children to their fathers, as disciples to their masters." These similitudes express not only the relation and dependence, but they tell us the reason of the duty: the head gives light and reason to conduct the body; the roots give nourishment to the plants; and the springs, perpetual emanation of waters to the channels: fathers teach and feed their children; and disciples receive wise instructions from their masters: and if we be all this to the people, they will be all that to us: and wisdom will compel them to submit, and our humility will teach them obedience, and our charity will invite their compliance; our good example will provoke them to good works, and our meekness will melt them into softness and flexibility: for all the Lord's people are "populus voluntarius," "a free and willing people;" and we, who cannot compel their bodies, must thus constrain their souls, by inviting their wills, by convincing their understandings, by the beauty of fair example, the efficacy and holiness, and the demonstrations of the Spirit.

This is "experimentum ejus, qui in nobis loquitur Christus," "the experiment of Christ that speaketh in us:" for to this purpose those are excellent words which St. Paul spake: "Remember them who have the rule over you: whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation."[t] There lies the demonstration: and those prelates who teach good life, whose sermons are the measures of Christ, and whose life is a copy of their sermons, these must be followed, and surely these will; for these are burning and shining lights: but if we hold forth false fires, and by the amusement of evil examples, call the vessels that sail upon a dangerous sea, to come upon a rock or an iron shore instead of a safe harbour, we cause them to make shipwreck of their precious faith, and to perish in the deceitful and unstable waters: "Vox operum fortiùs sonat quàm verborum:" "a good life is the strongest argument that your faith is good," and a gentle voice will be sooner entertained than a voice of thunder: but the greatest eloquence in the world is a meek spirit and a liberal hand; these are the two pastoral staves the prophet speaks of. "nognam et hovelim." "beauty and bands;"[u] he that hath the staff of the beauty of holiness, the ornament of fair example, he hath also the staff of bands: "Atque in funiculis Adam trahet eos, in vinculis charitatis," as the prophet Hosea's expression is, "He shall draw the people after him by the cords of a man, by the bands of a holy charity."[x] But if, against all these demonstrations, any man will be refractory, we have, instead of a staff, an apostolical rod, which is the last and latest remedy, and either brings to repentance, or consigns to ruin and reprobation.

If there were any time remaining, I could reckon that the episcopal order is the principle of unity in the church: and we see it is so, by the innumerable sects that sprang up, when episcopacy was persecuted. I could add, how that bishops were the cause that St. John wrote his gospel; that the christian faith was, for three hundred years together, bravely defended by the sufferings, the prisons and flames, the life and the death of bishops, as the principal combatants: that the fathers of the church, whose writings are held in so great veneration in all the christian world, were almost all of them bishops. I could add, that the reformation of religion in England was principally by the preachings and the disputings, the writings and the martyrdom of bishops; that bishops have ever since been the greatest defensatives against popery: that England and Ireland were governed by bishops ever since they were christian, and under their conduct have, for so many ages, enjoyed all the blessings of the gospel. I could add also, that episcopacy is the great stabiliment of monarchy: but of this we are convinced by a sad and too dear-bought experience: I could therefore instead of it say, that episcopacy is the great ornament of religion: that as it rescues the clergy from contempt, so it is the greatest preservative of the people's liberty from ecclesiastic tyranny on one hand, (the gentry being little better than servants, while they live under the presbytery,) and anarchy and licentiousness on the other: that it endears obedience, and is subject to the laws of princes, and is wholly ordained for the good of mankind and the benefit of souls. But I cannot stay to number all the blessings which have entered into the world at this door: I only remark these, because they describe unto us the bishop's employment, which is, to be busy in the service of souls,—to do good in all capacities,—to serve every man's need,—to promote all public benefits,—to cement governments,—to establish peace,—to propagate the kingdom of Christ,—to do hurt to no man,—to do good to every man;—that is, so to minister, that religion and charity, public peace and private blessings, may be in their exaltation.

As long as it was thus done by the primitive bishops, the princes and the people gave them all honour: insomuch, that by a decree of Constantine the Great, the bishop had power given him to retract the sentences made by the presidents of provinces; and we find, in the acts of St. Nicholas, that he rescued some innocent persons from death, when the executioner was ready to strike the fatal blow, which thing, even when it fell into inconvenience, was indeed forbidden by Arcadius and Honorius: but the confidence and honour was only changed, it was not taken away: for the condemned criminal had leave to appeal to the "Audientia Episcopalis," to "the Bishops' Court." This was not any right which the bishops could challenge, but a reward of their piety; and so long as the holy office was holily administered, the world found so much comfort and security, so much justice and mercy, so many temporal and spiritual blessings, consequent to the ministries of that order, that, as the Galatians to St. Paul, "men have plucked out their eyes" to do them service, and to do them honour. For then episcopacy did that good that God intended by it; it was a spiritual government, by spiritual persons, for spiritual ends. Then the princes and the people gave them honour, because they deserved, and sought them not; then they gave them wealth, because they would dispend it wisely, frugally, and charitably; then they gave them power, because it was sure to be used for the defence of the innocent, for the relief of the oppressed, for the punishment of evil-doers, and the reward of the virtuous. Then they desired to be judged by them, because their audiences, or courts, did ἡσυχάζειν τὸ βαρβαρικὸν, "they appeased all furious sentences," and taught gentle principles, and gave merciful measures, and in their courts were all equity and piety, and christian determinations.

But afterwards, when they did fall εἰς ἐναστείαν, "into secular methods," and made their counsels vain by pride, and dirtied their sentences with money, then they became like other men; and so it will be, unless the bishop be more holy than other men; but when our sanctity and severity shall be as eminent as the calling is, then we shall be called to councils, and sit in public meetings, and bring comfort to private families, and rule in the hearts of men by a "jus relationis," such as was between the Roman emperors and the senate; they courted one another into power, and, in giving honour, strove to outdo each other; for from an humble wise man no man will snatch an employment that is honourable; but from the proud and from the covetous every man endeavours to wrest it, and thinks it lawful prize.

My time is now done; and, therefore, I cannot speak to the third part of my text, the reward of the good steward and of the bad; I shall only mention it to you in a short exhortation, and so conclude. In the primitive church, a bishop was never admitted to public penance; not only because in them every crime is ten, and he that could discern a public shame, could not deserve a public honour; nor yet only because every such punishment was scandalous, and did more evil by the example of the crime, than it could do good by the example of the punishment; but also because no spiritual power is higher than the episcopal, and therefore they were to be referred to the Divine judgment, which was likely to fall on them very heavily: ἐκκοπήσει ἄχρηστον ὁ Κύριος, "the Lord will cut the evil stewards asunder;" he will suffer schisms and divisions to enter in upon us, and that will sadly cut us asunder; but the evil also shall fall upon their persons, like the punishment of quartering traitors, ἵνα καί σε διαμελεῖστὶ ταμήσῃ, punishment with the circumstances of detestation and exemplarity. Consider, therefore, what is your great duty. Consider what is your great danger. The lines of duty I have already described; only remember how dear and precious souls are to God, since for their salvation Christ gave his blood; and therefore will not easily loose them, whom, though they had sinned against him, yet he so highly valued: remember that you are Christ's deputies in the care of souls, and that you succeed in the place of the apostles. "Non est facile stare loco Pauli, et tenere gradum Petri:" you have undertaken the work of St. Paul, and the office of St. Peter; and what, think you, upon this account, will be required of us? St. Jerome expresses it thus: "The wisdom and skill of a bishop ought to be so great, that his countenance, his gesture, his motion, every thing should be vocal, 'ut quicquid agit, quicquid loquitur, doctrina sit apostolorum:' 'that whatever he does or speaks, be doctrine apostolical.'" The ancient fathers had a pious opinion, that besides the angel-guardian which is appointed to the guard of every man, there is to every bishop a second angel appointed to him at the consecration; and to this Origen alludes, saying that every bishopric hath two angels, the one visible and the other invisible. This is a great matter, and shows what a precious thing that order and those persons are in the eyes of God; but then this also means, that we should live angelic lives, which the church rarely well expresses by saying, that episcopal dignity is the ecclesiastic state of perfection, and supposes the persons to be so far advanced in holiness, as to be in the state of confirmation in grace. But I shall say nothing of these things, because it may be they press too hard; but the use I shall make of it, upon occasion of the reward of the good and bad steward, is to remind you of your great danger. For if it be required of bishops to be so wise and so holy, so industrious and so careful, so busy and so good, up to the height of best examples; if they be anointed of the Lord, and are the husbands of the churches; if they be the shepherds of the flock, and stewards of the household; it is very fit they consider their danger, that they may be careful to do their duty. St. Bernard considers it well in his epistle to Henry, archbishop of Sens:—If I, lying in my cell, and smoking under a bushel, not shining, yet cannot avoid the breath of the winds, but that my light is almost blown out; what will become of my candle, if it were placed on a candlestick, and set upon a hill? I am to look to myself alone, and provide for my own salvation; and yet I offend myself, I am weary of myself, I am my own scandal and my own danger; my own eye, and my own belly, and my own appetite, find me work enough; and therefore God help them, who, besides themselves, are answerable for many others. Jacob kept the sheep of Laban, and we keep the sheep of Christ; and Jacob was to answer for every sheep that was stolen, and every lamb that was torn by the wild beast; and so shall we too, if by our fault one of Christ's sheep perish; and yet it may be, there are one hundred thousand souls committed to the care and conduct of some one shepherd, who yet will find his own soul work enough for all his care and watchfulness. If any man should desire me to carry a frigate into the Indies, in which one hundred men were embarked, I were a madman to undertake the charge without proportionable skill; and, therefore, when there is more danger, and more souls, and rougher seas, and more secret rocks, and horrible storms, and the shipwreck is an eternal loss, the matter will then require great consideration in the undertaking, and greatest care in the conduct.

Upon this account we find many brave persons, in the first and in the middle ages of the church, with great resolution refusing episcopacy. I will not speak of those, who, for fear of martyrdom, declined it, but those who, for fear of damnation, did refuse. St. Bernard was by three rich cities severally called to be their bishop, and by two to be their archbishop, and he refused them; St. Dominicus refused four successively; St. Thomas Aquinas refused the archbishopric of Naples; and Vincentius Ferrarius would not accept of Valentia or Ilerda; and Bernardinus Senensis refused the bishoprics of Sens, Urbin, and Ferrara. They had reason; and yet, if they had done amiss in that office which they declined, it had been something more excusable; but if they that seek it, be as careless in the office as they are greedy of the honour, that will be found intolerable. "Electus episcopus ambulat in disco, recusans volvitur in areâ," said the hermit in St. Jerome; "The bishop walks upon round and trundling stones; but he that refuses it, stands upon a floor." But I shall say no more of it; because I suppose you have read it, and considered it, in St. Chrysostom's six books, "de Sacerdotio;" in the Apologetic of St. Gregory of Nazianzus; in the pastoral of St. Gregory of Rome; in St. Dionysius's eighth epistle to Demophilus; in the letters of Epiphanius to St. Jerome; in St. Austin's epistle to Bishop Valerius; in St. Bernard's life of St. Malachy; in St. Jerome's one hundred and thirty-eighth epistle to Fabiola. These things, I am sure, you could not read without trembling; and certainly, if it can belong to any christian, then—"work out your salvation with fear and trembling"—that is the bishop's burden. For the bishop is like a man that is surety for his friend; he is bound for many, and for great sums; what is to be done in this case, Solomon's answer is the way: "Do this now, my son, deliver thyself, make sure thy friend, give not sleep to thine eyes, nor slumber to thine eye-lids:"[y] that is, be sedulous to discharge thy trust, to perform thy charge; be zealous for souls, and careless of money: and remember this, that even in Christ's family there was one sad example of an apostate apostle; and he fell into that fearful estate merely by the desire and greediness of money. Be warm in zeal, and indifferent in thy temporalities: for he that is zealous in temporals, and cold in the spiritual; he that doth the accessories of his calling by himself, and the principal by his deputies; he that is present at the feast of sheep-shearing, and puts others to feed the flock; hath no sign at all upon him of a good shepherd. "It is not fit for us to leave the word of God, and to serve tables," said the apostles. And if it be a less worthy office to serve the tables even of the poor, to the diminution of our care in the dispensation of God's word,—it must needs be an unworthy employment to leave the word of God, and to attend the rich and superfluous furniture of our own tables. Remember the quality of your charges: "Civitas est, vigilate ad custodiam et concordiam; sponsa est, studete amari; oves sunt, intendite pastui."[z] "The church is a spouse;" the universal church is Christ's spouse, but your own diocess is yours; "behave yourselves so that ye be beloved. Your people are as sheep," and they must be fed, and guided, and preserved, and healed, and brought home. "The church is a city," and you are the watchmen; "take care that the city be kept at unity in itself;" be sure to make peace amongst your people; suffer no hatreds, no quarrels, no suits at law amongst the citizens, which you can avoid; make peace in your diocesses by all the ways of prudence, piety, and authority, that you can; and let not your own corrections of criminals be to any purpose but for their amendment, for the cure of offenders as long as there is hope, and for the security of those who are sound and whole. Preach often, and pray continually; let your discipline be with charity, and your censures slow; let not excommunications pass for trifles, and drive not away the fly from your brother's forehead with a hatchet; give counsel frequently, and dispensations seldom, but never without necessity or great charity; let every place in your diocess say, "Invenerunt me vigiles," "The watchmen have found me out," "hassovelim;" they that walk the city round have sought me out, and found me. "Let every one of us," as St. Paul's[a] expression is, "show himself a workman that shall not be ashamed;" "operarium inconfusibilem," mark that; "such a labourer as shall not be put to shame" for his illness or his unskilfulness, his falseness and unfaithfulness, in that day when the great Bishop of souls shall make his last and dreadful visitation; for, be sure, there is not a carcass, nor a skin, nor a lock of wool, nor a drop of milk of the whole flock, but God shall for it call the idle shepherd to a severe account. And how, think you, will his anger burn, when he shall see so many goats standing at his left hand, and so few sheep at his right? and upon inquiry, shall find that his ministering shepherds were wolves in sheep's clothing? and that, by their ill example or pernicious doctrines, their care of money and carelessness of their flocks, so many souls perish, who, if they had been carefully and tenderly, wisely and conscientiously handled, might have shined as bright as angels? And it is a sad consideration to remember, how many souls are pitifully handled in this world, and carelessly dismissed out of this world; they are left to live at their own rate, and when they are sick they are bidden to be of good comfort, and then all is well; who, when they are dead, find themselves cheated of their precious and invaluable eternity. Oh, how will those souls, in their eternal prisons, for ever curse those evil and false guides! And how will those evil guides themselves abide in judgment, when the angels of wrath snatch their abused people into everlasting torments? For will God bless them, or pardon them, by whom so many souls perish? Shall they reign with Christ, who evacuate the death of Christ, and make it useless to dear souls? Shall they partake of Christ's glories, by whom it comes to pass that there is less joy in heaven itself, even because sinners are not converted, and God is not glorified, and the people is not instructed, and the kingdom of God is not filled? Oh no; the curses of a false prophet will fall upon them, and the reward of the evil steward will be their portion; and they who destroyed the sheep, or neglected them, shall have their portion with goats for ever and ever, in everlasting burnings, in which it is impossible for a man to dwell.

[y] Prov. vi. 3, 4.

[z] S. Bernard. ad. Henr. Episc. Senensem. [a] 2 Tim. ii.

Can any thing be beyond this? beyond damnation? Surely a man would think not: and yet I remember a severe saying of St. Gregory, "Scire debent prælati, quod tot mortibus digni sunt, quot perditionis exempla ad subditos extenderunt:" "One damnation is not enough for an evil shepherd; but for every soul who dies by his evil example or pernicious carelessness, he deserves a new death, a new damnation."—Let us, therefore, be wise and faithful, walk warily, and watch carefully, and rule diligently, and pray assiduously; for God is more propense to rewards than to punishments; and the good steward, that is wise and faithful in his dispensation, shall be greatly blessed. But how? "He shall be made ruler over the household." What is that? for he is so already. True: but he shall be much more: "Ex dispensatore faciet procuratorem;" God will treat him as Joseph was treated by his master; "he was first a steward, and then a procurator;" one that ruled his goods without account and without restraint. Our ministry shall pass into empire, our labour into rest, our watchfulness into fruition, and our bishopric to a kingdom. In the mean time, our bishopries are a great and weighty care, and, in a spiritual sense, our dominion is founded in grace, and our rule is in the hearts of the people, and our strengths are the powers of the Holy Ghost, and the weapons of our warfare are spiritual; and the eye of God watches over us curiously, to see if we watch over our flocks by day and by night. And though the primitive church, as the ecclesiastic histories observe, when they deposed a bishop from his office, ever concealed his crime, and made no record of it, yet remember this, that God does and will call us to a strict and severe account. Take heed that you may never hear that fearful sentence, "I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat." If you suffer Christ's little ones to starve, it will be required severely at your hands. And know this, that the time will quickly come, in which God shall say unto thee, in the words of the prophet, "Where is the flock that was given thee, thy beautiful flock? What wilt thou say when he shall visit thee?" [b]

God, of his mercy, grant unto us all to be so faithful and so wise as to convert souls, and to be so blessed and so assisted, that we may give an account of our charges with joy, to the glory of God, to the edification and security of our flocks, and the salvation of our own souls, in that day when the great Shepherd and Bishop of our souls shall come to judgment, even our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; to whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, love and obedience, now and for evermore. Amen.

SERMON V.

PREACHED AT THE

OPENING OF THE PARLIAMENT OF IRELAND,

May 8, 1661,

BEFORE THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORDS JUSTICES, AND THE LORDS SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL, AND THE COMMONS.

Salus in multitudine consulentium.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

THE LORDS SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL, AND COMMONS OF IRELAND, ASSEMBLED IN PARLIAMENT.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I ought not to dispute your commands for the printing my Sermon of Obedience, lest my sermon should be "protestatio contra factum." Here I know my example would be the best use to this doctrine; and I am sure to find no inconveniency so great, as that of disobedience; neither can I be confident that I am wise in any thing, but when I obey; for then I have the wisdom of my superior for my warrant or my excuse. I remember the saying of Aurelius the emperor, "Æquius est me tot et talium amicorum consilium, quam tot tales meam unius voluntatem sequi." I could easily have pretended excuses: but that day I had taught others the contrary, and I would not shed that chalice, which my own hands had newly filled with waters issuing from the fountains of salvation.

My eyes are almost grown old with seeing the horrid mischiefs, which came from rebellion and disobedience; and I would willingly now be blest with observation of peace and righteousness, plenty and religion, which do already, and I hope shall for ever, attend upon obedience to the best king, and the best church, in the world. I see no objection against my hopes, but that which ought least of all, in this case, to be pretended. Men pretend conscience against obedience, expressly against St. Paul's doctrine, teaching us to "obey for conscience sake;" but to disobey for conscience in a thing indifferent, is never to be found in the books of our religion.

It is very hard, when the prince is forced to say to his rebellious subject, as God did to his stubborn people, "Quid faciam tibi?" I have tried all the ways I can to bring thee home, and "what shall I now do unto thee?" The subject should rather say, "Quid me vis facere?" "What wilt thou have me to do?" This question is the best end of disputations. "Corrumpitur atque dissolvitur imperantis officium, si quis ad id quod facere jussus est, non obsequio debito, sed consilio non considerato, respondeat." said one in A. Gellius: "When a subject is commanded to obey, and he disputes, and says, Nay, but the other is better;" he is like a servant that gives his master necessary counsel, when he requires of him a necessary obedience. "Utilius parere edicto quam efferre consilium:" "He had better obey than give counsel;" by how much it is better to be profitable than to be witty, to be full of goodness rather than full of talk and argument.

But all this is acknowledged true in strong men, but not in the weak; in vigorous, but not in tender consciences; for obedience is strong meat, and will not down with weak stomachs: as if, in the world, any thing were easier than to obey: for we see that the food of children is milk and laws; the breast-milk of their nurses, and the commands of their parents, is all that food and government, by which they are kept from harm and hunger, and conducted to life and wisdom. And, therefore, they that are weak brethren, of all things in the world, have the least reason to pretend an excuse for disobedience; for nothing can secure them but the wisdom of the laws; for they are like children in minority—they cannot be trusted to their own conduct: and, therefore, must live at the public charge; and the wisdom of their superiors is their guide and their security. And this was wisely advised by St. Paul: "Him that is weak in the faith, receive, but not to doubtful disputations;" that is not the way for him; children must not dispute with their fathers and their masters. If old men will dispute, let them look to it; that is meat for the strong indeed, though it be not very nutritive; but the laws and the counsels, the exhortations and the doctrines of our spiritual rulers, are the measures, by which God hath appointed babes in Christ to become men, and the weak to become strong; and they that are not to be received to doubtful disputations, are to be received with the arms of love, into the embraces of a certain and regular obedience.

But it would be considered, that "tenderness of conscience" is an equivocal term, and does not always signify in a good sense. For a child is of tender flesh; but he whose foot is out of joint, or hath a bile in his arm, or hath strained a sinew, is much more tender. The tenderness of age is that weakness, that is in the ignorant and the new beginners: the tenderness of a bile,—that is soreness indeed, rather than tenderness,—is of the diseased, the abused, and the mispersuaded. The first, indeed, are to be tenderly dealt with, and have usages accordingly; but that is the same I have already told; you must teach them, you must command them, you must guide them, you must choose for them, you must be their guardians, and they must comport themselves accordingly. But for that tenderness of conscience, which is the disease and soreness of conscience, it must be cured by anodynes and soft usages, unless they prove ineffective, and that the lancet be necessary. But there are amongst us such tender stomachs that cannot endure milk, but can very well digest iron: consciences so tender, that a ceremony is greatly offensive, but rebellion is not: a surplice drives them away, as a bird affrighted with a man of clouts, but their consciences can suffer them to despise government, and speak evil of dignities, and curse all that are not of their opinion, and disturb the peace of kingdoms, and commit sacrilege, and account schism the character of saints. The true tenderness of conscience is, 1. That which is impatient of a sin: 2. It will not endure any thing that looks like it; and, 3. It will not give offence. Now, since all sin is disobedience, 1. It will be rarely contingent that a man, in a christian commonwealth, shall be tied to disobey, to avoid sin; and certain it is, if such a case should happen, yet, 2. Nothing of our present question is so like a sin, as when we refuse to obey the laws. To stand in a clean vestment is not so ill a sight as to see men stand in separation; and to kneel at the communion, is not so like idolatry, as rebellion is to witchcraft. And then, 3. For the matter of "giving offences," what scandal is greater than that which scandalizes the laws? And who is so carefully to be observed, lest he be offended, as the king? And if that which offends the weak brother is to be avoided, much more that which offends the strong: for this is certainly really criminal: but for the other, it is much odds but it is mistaken. And when the case is so put, between the obedient and the disobedient, which shall be offended, and one will,—I suppose there is no question but the laws will take more care of subjects than of rebels, and not weaken them in their duty, in compliance with those that hate the laws, and will not endure the government.

And after all this in the conduct of government, what remedy can there be to those, that call themselves "tender consciences?" I shall not need to say, that every man can easily pretend it: for we have seen the vilest part of mankind, men that have done things so horrid, worse than which the sun never saw, yet pretend tender consciences against ecclesiastical laws. But I will suppose that they are really such; that they, in the simplicity of their hearts, follow Absalom, and in weakness hide their heads in little conventicles, and places of separation, for a trifle; what would they have done for themselves.

If you make a law of order, and, in the sanction, put a clause of favour for tender consciences, do not you invite every subject to disobedience by impunity, and teach him how to make his own excuse? Is not such a law a law without an obligation? May not every man choose whether he will obey or no? and if he pretends to disobey out of conscience, is not he that disobeys equally innocent with the obedient: altogether as just, as not having done any thing without leave; and yet much more religious and conscientious? "Quicunque vult," is but an ill preface to a law: and it is a strange obligation, that makes no difference between him that obeys and him that refuses to obey.

But what course must be taken with "tender consciences?" Shall the execution of the law be suspended as to all such persons? That will be all one with the former: for if the execution be commanded to be suspended, then the obligation of the law by command is taken away, and then it were better there were no law made. And indeed that is the pretension, that is the secret of the business; they suppose the best way to prevent disobedience is to take away all laws. It is a short way indeed; there shall then be no disobedience; but, at the same time, there shall be no government: but the remedy is worse than the disease; and to take away all wine and strong drink, to prevent drunkenness, would not be half so great a folly.

I cannot, therefore, tell what to advise in this particular, but that every spiritual guide should consider who are tender consciences, and who are weak brethren, and use all the ways of piety and prudence to instruct and to inform them, that they may increase in knowledge and spiritual understanding. But they that will be always learning, and never come to the knowledge of the truth; they that will be children of a hundred years old, and never come to years of discretion: they are very unfit to guide others, and to be curates of souls: but they are most unfit to reprove the laws, and speak against the wisdom of a nation, when it is confessed that they are so weak that they understand not the fundamental liberty which Christ hath purchased for them, but are servants to a scruple, and affrighted at a circumstance, and in bondage under an indifferent thing, and so much idolaters of their sect or opinion, as to prefer it before all their own nobler interests, and the charity of their brother, and the peace of a whole church and nation.

To you, my Lords and Gentlemen, I hope I may say, as Marcus Curius said to a stubborn young man, "Non opus vos habere cive, qui parere nesciret;" "The kingdom hath no need of those, that know not how to obey."* But as for them who have weak and tender consciences, they are in the state of childhood and minority: but then you know that a child is never happy by having his own humour; if you choose for him, and make him to use it, he hath but one thing to do; but if you put him to please himself, he is troubled with every thing, and satisfied with nothing. We find that all christian churches kept this rule: they kept themselves and others close to the rule of faith, and peaceably suffered one another to differ in ceremonies, but suffered no difference amongst their own; they gave liberty to other churches, and gave laws, and no liberty, to their own subjects: and at this day, the churches of Geneva, France, Switzerland, Germany, Low Countries, tie all their people to their own laws, but tie up no man's conscience: if he be not persuaded as they are, let him charitably dissent, and leave that government, and adhere to his own communion: if you be not of their mind, they will be served by them that are; they will not trouble your conscience, and you shall not disturb their government. But when men think they cannot enjoy their conscience unless you give them good livings, and if you prefer them not, you afflict their consciences: they do but too evidently declare, that it is not their consciences, but their profits, they would have secured. Now to these I have only this to say, that their conscience is to be enjoyed by the measures of God's word, but the rule for their estates is the laws of the kingdom; and "I show you yet a more excellent way:" obedience is the best security for both, because this is the best conservatory of charity, and truth, and peace. "Si vis brevi perfectus esse, esto obediens etiam in minimis," was the saying of a saint; and the world uses to look for miracles from them whom they shall esteem saints; but "I had rather see a man truly humble and obedient, than to see him raise a man from the dead," said old Pachomius.

But to conclude: If weak brethren shall still plead for toleration and compliance, I hope my Lords the bishops will consider where it can do good, and do no harm; where they are permitted, and where themselves are bound up by the laws; and in all things where it is safe and holy, to labour to bring them ease and to give them remedy: but to think of removing the disease by feeding the humour, I confess it is a strange cure to our present distempers. He that took clay and spittle to open the blind eyes, can make any thing be collyrium; but he alone can do it. But whether any human power can bring good from so unlikely an instrument, if any man desires yet to be better informed, I desire him, besides the calling to mind the late sad effects of schism, to remember that no church in christendom ever did it. It is neither the way of peace nor government, nor yet a proper remedy for the cure of a weak conscience.

* Val. Max.

I shall, therefore, pray to God, that these men who separate in simplicity, may, by God's mercy, be brought to understand their own liberty, and that they may not, for ever, be babes and neophytes, and wax old in trifles, and for ever stay at the entrances and outsides of religion; but that they would pass in "interiora domûs," and seek after peace and righteousness, holiness and justice, the love of God and evangelical perfections; and then they will understand how ill-advised they are, who think religion consists in zeal against ceremonies, and speaking evil of the laws.

My Lords and Gentlemen, what I said in pursuance of public peace and private duty, and some little incidences to both, I now humbly present to you, more to show my own obedience than to remind you of your duty, which, hitherto, you have so well observed in your amicable and sweet concord of counsels and affections, during this present session. I owe many thanks to you, who heard me patiently, willingly, and kindly; I endeavoured to please God, and I find I did not displease you: but he is the best hearer of a sermon, who first loves the doctrine, and then practises it; and that you have hitherto done, very piously and very prosperously. I pray God continue to direct your counsels, so that you, in all things, may please him, and in all things be blessed by him, that all generations may call you blessed instruments of a lasting peace, the restorers of the old paths, the patrons of the church, friends of religion, and subjects fitted for your prince, who is just up to the greatest example, and merciful beyond all examples; a prince who hath been nourished, and preserved, and restored, and blessed, by miracles; a prince whose virtues and fortunes are equally the greatest.

SERMON.

Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.—1 Sam. xv. latter part of verse 22.

For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry.—First part of verse 23.

In the world, nothing is more easy than to say our prayers, and to obey our superiors; and yet in the world there is nothing to which we are so unwilling as to prayer, and nothing seems so intolerable as obedience; for men esteem all laws to be fetters, and their superiors are their enemies: and when a command is given, we turn into all shapes of excuse, to escape from the imposition: for either the authority is incompetent, or the law itself is "statutum non bonum;" or it is impossible to be kept, or at least very inconvenient, and we are to be relieved in equity; or there is a secret dispensation, and it does not bind in my particular case, or not now; or it is but the law of a man, and was made for a certain end; or it does not bind the conscience, but it was only for political regards; or, if the worst happen, I will obey passively, and then I am innocent. Thus every man snuffs up the wind like "the wild asses in the wilderness," and thinks that authority is an encroachment upon a man's birthright; and in the mean time never considers, that Christ took upon him our nature, that he might learn us obedience, and in that also make us become like unto God. In his justice and his mercy he was inimitable before; but before the incarnation of Christ we could not, in passive graces, imitate God, who was impassible: but he was pleased, at a great rate, to set forward this duty; and when himself became obedient in the hardest point, "obediens usque ad mortem," and is now become to us "the Author and Finisher of our obedience," as well as of our faith,—"admonetur omnis ætas fieri posse quod aliquando factum est." We must needs confess it very possible to obey the severest of the Divine laws, even to die if God commands, because it was already done by a man; and we must needs confess it excellent, because it was done by God himself.

But this great example is of universal influence in the whole matter of obedience: for, that I may speak of that part of this duty, which can be useful, and concerns us; men do not deny but they must obey in all civil things; but in religion they have a supreme God only, and conscience is his interpreter; and, in effect, every man must be the judge, whether he shall obey or no. Therefore it is that I say, the example of our Lord is the great determination of this inquiry; for he did obey and suffer, according to the commands of his superiors, under whose government he was placed; he "gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to the nippers;" he kept the orders of the rulers, and the customs of the synagogues, the law of Moses and the rites of the temple; and by so doing "he fulfilled all righteousness." Christ made no distinctions in his obedience; but obeyed God "in all things," and those that God set over him, "in all things according to God," and in things of religion most of all; because to obey was of itself a great instance of religion; and if ever religion comes to be pretended against obedience, in any thing where our superior can command, it is imposture: for that is the purpose of my text, "obedience is better than sacrifice." Our own judgment, our own opinion, is the sacrifice seldom fit to be offered to God, but most commonly deserving to be consumed by fire: but, take it at the best, it is not half so good as obedience; for that was indeed Christ's sacrifice: and, as David said of Goliah's sword, "Non est alter talis," there is no other sacrifice that can be half so good: and when Abraham had lifted up his sacrificing knife to slay his son, and so expressed his obedience, God would have no more; he had the obedience, and he cared not for the sacrifice.

By sacrifice here, then, is meant the external and contingent actions of religion; by obedience, is meant submission to authority, and observing the command. Obedience is a not choosing our duty, a not disputing with our betters, not to argue, not to delay, not to murmur; it is not only this, but it is much better; for it is love,—and simplicity,—and humility,—and usefulness; and I think these do reductively contain all that is excellent in the whole conjugation of christian graces.

My text is a perfect proposition, and hath no special remark in the words of it; but is only a great representation of the most useful truth to all kingdoms and parliaments, and councils and authorities, in the whole world: it is your charter, and the sanction of your authority, and the stabiliment of your peace, and the honour of your laws, and the great defence of your religion, and the building up and the guarding of the king's throne. It is that by which all the societies in heaven and earth are firm: without this you cannot have a village prosperous, or a ship arrive in harbour: it is that which God hath bound upon us by hope and fear, by wrath and conscience, by duty and necessity. Obedience is the formality of all virtues, and every sin is disobedience: there can no greater thing be said, unless you please to add, that we never read that the earth opened and swallowed up any man alive but a company of rebellious, disobedient people, who rose up against Moses and Aaron, the prince of the people, and the priest of God. For obedience is the most necessary thing in the world, and "corruptio optimi est pessima:" disobedience is the greatest evil in the world, and that alone which can destroy it.[a]

My text is instanced in the matter of obedience to God; but yet the case is so, that though I shall, in the first place, discourse of our obedience to man, I shall not set one foot aside from the main intention of it; because obedience to our superiors is really, and is accounted to be, obedience to God; for they are sent by God; they are his vicegerents, his ministers, and his ambassadors. "Apostolus cujusque est quisque," say the Jews; "Every man's apostle is himself;" and "he that heareth or despiseth you," said Christ, "heareth or despiseth me:" and the reason is very evident,—because it is not to be expected that God should speak to us by himself, but sometimes by angels, sometimes by prophets, once by his Son, and always by his servants.

Now I desire two things to be observed:—

First: We may as well perceive that God speaks to us, when he uses the ministry of men, as when he uses the ministry of angels: one is as much declared and as certain as the other. And if it be said, a man may pretend to come from God, and yet deliver nothing but his own errand, that is no strange thing: but remember also that St. Paul puts this supposition in the case of an angel, "If an angel preach any other gospel;" and we know that many angels come like angels of light, who yet teach nothing but the ways of darkness. So that we are still as much bound to obey our superior as to obey an angel: a man is "paulò minor angelis," "a little lower than the angels;" but we are much lower than the king. Consider, then, with what fear and love we should receive an angel; and so let us receive all those whom God hath sent to us, and set over us; for they are no less; less, indeed, in their persons, but not in their authorities. Nay, the case is nearer yet; for we are not only bound to receive God's deputies as God's angels, but as God himself: for it is the power of God in the hand of a man, and "he that resists, resists God's ordinance." And I pray remember, that there is not only no power greater than God's, but there is no other; for all power is his. The consequent of this is plain enough; I need say no more of it: it is all one to us who commands, God, or God's vicegerent. This was the first thing to be observed.

Secondly: There can be but two things in the world required to make obedience necessary; the greatness of the authority, and the worthiness of the thing. In the first you see the case can have no difference, because the thing itself is but one: there is but one authority in the world, and that is God's; as there is but one sun, whose light is diffused into all kingdoms. But is there not great difference in the thing commanded? Yes, certainly there is some; but nothing to warrant disobedience: for, whatever the thing be, it may be commanded by man, if it be not countermanded by God. For,

1. It is not required that every thing commanded should of itself be necessary;—for God himself oftentimes commands things, which have in them no other excellency than that of obedience. What made Abraham "the friend of God?" and what made his offer to kill his son to be so pleasing to God? It had been naturally no very great good to cut the throat of a little child; but only that it was obedience. What excellency was there in the journeys of the patriarchs from Mesopotamia to Syria, from the land of Canaan into Egypt? and what thanks could the sons of Israel deserve, that they sat still upon the seventh day of the week? and how can a man be dearer unto God by keeping of a feast, or building of a booth, or going to Jerusalem, or cutting off the foreskin of a boy, or washing their hands and garments in fair water? There was nothing in these things but the obedience. And when our blessed Lord himself came to his servant, to take of him the baptism of repentance, alas! he could take nothing but the water and the ceremony; for, as Tertullian observes, he was "nullius pœnitentiæ debitor;" he was, indeed, "a just person, and needed no repentance;" but even so it "became him to fulfil all righteousness:" but yet even then it was that the Holy Spirit did descend upon his holy head, and crowned that obedience, though it were but a ceremony. Obedience, you see, may be necessary, when the law is not so: for in these cases, God's Son and God's servants did obey in things, which were made good only by the commandment: and if we do so in the instances of human laws, there is nothing to be said against it, but that what was not of itself necessary, is made so by the authority of the commander, and the force of the commandment: but there is no more in it than so. For,

2. We pretend to be willing to obey, even in things naturally not necessary, if a Divine command does interpose; but if it be only a commandment of man, and the thing be not necessary of itself, then we desire to be excused. But will we do nothing else? We ourselves will do many things that God hath not commanded; and may not our superiors command us, in many cases, to do what we may lawfully do without a commandment? Can we become a law unto ourselves, and cannot the word and power of our superiors also become a law unto us? hath God given more to a private than to a public hand? But consider the ill consequents of this fond opinion. Are all the practices of Geneva or Scotland recorded in the word of God? are the trifling ceremonies of their public penance recorded in the four Gospels? are all the rules of decency, and all "things that are of good report," and all the measures of prudence, and the laws of peace and war, and the customs of the churches of God, and the lines of public honesty, are all these described to us by the laws of God? If they be, let us see and read them, that we may have an end to all questions and minute cases of conscience: but if they be not, and yet by the word of God these are bound upon us in general, and no otherwise; then it follows, that the particulars of all these, which may be infinite, and are innumerable, yet may be the matter of human laws; and then are bound upon us by the power of God, put into the hands of man. The consequent is this, that whatsoever is commanded by our superiors, according to the will of God, or whatsoever is not against it, is, of necessity, to be obeyed.

3. But what if our princes or our prelates command things against the word of God? What then? Why nothing then, but that we must obey God, and not man; there is no dispute of that. But what then again? Why, therefore, says the papist, "I will not obey the protestant kings, because, against the word of God, they command me to come to church, where heresy is preached;"—"and I will not acknowledge the bishops," saith the presbyterian, "because they are against the discipline and sceptre of Jesus Christ;" and the independent hates parochial meetings, and is wholly for a gathered church, and supposes this to be the practice apostolical; and "I will not bring my child to baptism," saith the anabaptist, "because God calls none but believers to that sacrament;" and "I will acknowledge no clergy, no lord, no master," saith the quaker, "because Christ commands us to "call no man master on the earth, and be not called of men rabbi." And if you call upon these men to obey the authority God hath set over them, they tell you with one voice, with all their hearts, as far as the word of God will give them leave; but God is to be obeyed, and not man; and, therefore, if you put the laws in execution against them, they will obey you passively, because you are stronger; and so long as they know it, they will not stir against you; but they, in the mean time, are little less than martyrs, and you no better than persecutors.

What shall we do now? for here is evidently a great heap of disorder: they all confess that authority must be obeyed, but when you come to the trial, none of them all will do it, and they think they are not bound: but because their opinions, being contrary, cannot all be right, and, it may be, none of them are,—it is certain, that all this while authority is infinitely wronged and prejudiced amongst them, when all fantastic opinions shall be accounted a sufficient reason to despise it. I hope the presbyterian will join with the protestant, and say, that the papist, and the Socinian, and the independent, and the anabaptist, and the quaker, are guilty of rebellion and disobedience, for all their pretence of the word of God to be on their side: and I am more sure that all these will join with the protestant, and say, that the presbyterian hath no reason to disobey authority upon pretence of their new government, concerning which they do but dream dreams, when they think they see visions. Certain it is that the biggest part of dissenters in the whole world are criminally disobedient; and it is a thousand to one but that authority is in the right against them, and ought to be obeyed. It remains now, in the next place, that we inquire what authority is to do in this case, and what these sectaries and recusants are to do; for these are two things worth inquiry.

1. Concerning authority. All disagreeing persons, to cover their foul shame of rebellion or disobedience, pretend conscience for their judge, and the Scripture for their law. Now if these men think, that, by this means, they proceed safely, upon the same ground the superior may do what he thinks to be his duty, and be at least as safe as they. If the rebellious subject can think, that, by God's law, he ought not to obey, the prince may, at the same time, think, that, by God's law, he ought to punish him: and it is as certain that he is justly punished, as he thinks it certain he reasonably disobeys. Or is the conscience of the superior bound to relax his laws, if the inferior tells him so? Can the prince give laws to the people's will, and can the people give measures to the prince's understanding? If any one of the people can prescribe or make it necessary to change the law, then every one can; and by this time every new opinion will introduce a new law, and that law shall be obeyed by him only that hath a mind to it, and that will be a strange law, that binds a man only to do his own pleasure. But because the king's conscience is to him as sure a rule, as the conscience of any disobedient subject can be to himself, the prince is as much bound to do his duty in government, as the other can be to follow his conscience in disagreeing; and the consequent will be, that whether the subject be right or wrong in the disputation, it is certain he hath the just reward of disobedience in the conclusion. If one man's conscience can be the measure of another man's action, why shall not the prince's conscience be the subject's measure? But if it cannot, then the prince is not to depart from his own conscience, but proceed according to the laws which he judges just and reasonable.

2. The superior is tied, by the laws of christian charity, so far to bend in the ministration of his laws, as to pity the invincible ignorance and weakness of his abused people, "qui devoratur à malis pastoribus," as St. Jerome's expression is, "that are devoured by their evil shepherds;" but this is to last no longer than till the ignorance can be cured, and the man be taught his duty; for whatsoever comes after this, looks so like obstinacy, that no laws in the world judge it to be any thing else. And then, secondly, this also is to be understood to be the duty of superiors only in matters of mere opinion, not relating to practice. For no man's opinion must be suffered to do mischief, to disturb the peace, to dishonour the government; not only because every disagreeing person can, to serve his end, pretend his conscience, and so claim impunity for his villany; but also because those things, which concern the good of mankind and the peace of kingdoms, are so plainly taught, that no man who thinks himself so wise as to be fit to oppose authority, can be so foolish as in these things not to know his duty. In other things, if the opinion does neither bite nor scratch, if it dwells at home in the house of understanding, and wanders not in the outhouses of passion and popular orations, the superior imposes no laws, and exacts no obedience, and destroys no liberty, and gives no restraint: this is the part of authority.

2. The next inquiry is, What must the disagreeing subject do, when he supposes the superior's command is against the law of God? I answer, that if he thinks so, and thinks true, he must not obey his superior in that: but because most men that think so, think amiss,—there are many particulars fit, by such persons, to be considered.

1. Let such men think charitably of others, and that all are not fools or madmen, who are not of the same opinion with themselves or their own little party. 2. Let him think himself as fallible and subject to mistake as other men are. 3. But let him by no means think, that every opinion of his is an inspiration from God; for that is the pride and madness of a pretended religion: such a man is to be cured by physic; for he could not enter into that persuasion by reason or experience, and therefore it must enter into him by folly or the anger of God. 4. From whence it will naturally follow, that he ought to think his opinion to be uncertain, and that he ought not to behave himself like the man that is too confident; but because his obedience is duty, and his duty certain, he will find it more wise, and safe, and holy, to leave that which is disputable, and pursue that which is demonstrable; to change his uncertain opinion for his certain duty: for it is twenty to one but he is deceived in his opinion; but if he be, it is certain that whatsoever his conscience be, yet, in his separation from authority, he is a sinner.

2. Every man who, by his opinion, is engaged against authority, should do well to study his doubtful opinion less, and humility and obedience more. But you say, that this concerns not me; for my disagreeing is not in a doubtful matter, but I am sure I am in the right; there are no ifs and ands in my case. Well, it may be so: but were it not better that you did doubt? "A wise man feareth," saith Solomon, "and departeth from evil; but a fool rageth and is confident:" and the difference between a learned man and a novice is this, that the young fellow crieth out, "I am sure it is so;" the better learned answers, ἴσως καὶ τὸ τάχα, "Possibly it may, and peradventure it is so, but I pray inquire:" and he is the best diviner, μάντις ἄριστος ὅστις εἰκάζει καλῶς, "he is the best judge that conjectures best," not he that is most confident; for, as Xenophanes said wisely, "Man does but conjecture, but God only knows;" and it is no disparagement to a wise man to learn, and,—by suspecting the fallibility of things, and his own aptness to mistake,—to walk prudently and safely, with an eye to God, and an ear open to his superior. Some men are drunk with fancy, and mad with opinion. Who believe more strongly than boys and women? who are so hard to be persuaded as fools? and who so readily suspect their teachers as they who are governed by chance, and know not the intrinsic measures of good and evil? "Qui pauca considerat, de facili pronunciat;" "it is a little learning, and not enough, that makes men conclude hastily," and clap fast hold on the conclusion, before they have well weighed the premises; but experience and humility would teach us modesty and fear.

3. In all disputes, he that obeys his superior can never be a heretic in the estimate of law, and he can never be a schismatic in the point of conscience; so that he certainly avoids one great death, and very probably the other. "Res judicata pro veritate accipitur," saith the law: "If the judge have given sentence, that sentence is supposed a truth:" and Cassiodorus said, according to the sentence of the law, "Nimis iniquum est, ut ille patiatur dispendium, qui imperium fecit alienum." Our obedience secures us from the imputation of evil, and error does but seldom go in company with obedience. But, however, there is this advantage to be gotten by obedience; that he who prefers the sentence of the law before his own opinion, does do an act of great humility, and exercises the grace of modesty, and takes the best way to secure his conscience and the public peace, and pleases the government which he is bound to please, and pursues the excellencies of unity, and promotes charity and godly love; whereas on the other side, he that goes by himself, apart from his superior, is always materially a schismatic, and is more likely to be deceived by his own singularity, and prejudice, and weakness, than by following the guides God hath set over him. And if he loses truth, certainly he will get nothing else: for by so doing we lose our peace too, and give public offence, and arm authority against us, and are scandalous in law, and pull evil upon our heads; and all this for a proud singularity, or a trifling opinion, in which we are not so likely to be deceived, if we trust ourselves less, and the public more. "In omnibus falli possum, in obedientiâ non possum," said St. Teresa; "I can in every thing else, but in obedience I can never be deceived." And it is very remarkable in my text, that "rebellion" or "disobedience" is compared to "the sin of witchcraft." Indeed, it seems strange; for the meaning of it is not only that a rebel is as much hated by God as a witch, but it means that the sins are alike in their very natures. "Quasi peccatum divinationis," saith the Vulgar Latin; they that disobey authority, trusting in their own opinions, are but like witches or diviners; that is, they are led by an evil spirit; pride and a lying and deceiving spirit is their teacher, and their answers are seldom true; for though they pretend the truth of God for their disobedience, yet they "fall into the deception of the devil;" and that is the end of their soothsaying. And let me add this, that when a man distrusts his superior, and trusts himself, if he misses truth, it will be greatly imputed to him; he shall feel the evil of his error and the shame of his pride, the reproach of his folly and the punishment of his disobedience, the dishonour of singularity, and the restlessness of schism, and the scorn of the multitude. But, on the other side, if he obey authority, and yet be deceived, he is greatly excused; he erred on the safer side, he is defended by the hands of many virtues, and gets peace and love of the congregation.

You see the blessings of obedience, even in the questions and matters of religion; but I have something more to say, and it is not only of great use to appease the tumultuary disputations and arguings of religion, which have lately disturbed these nations, but is proper to be spoken to, and to be reduced to practice, by this honourable and high court of parliament.

That which I am to say, is this:—You have no other way of peace, no better way to appease and quiet the quarrels in religion which have been too long among us, but by reducing all men to obedience, and all questions to the measures of the laws; for they on both sides pretend Scripture, but one side only can pretend to the laws; and they that do admit no authority above their own to expound Scripture, cannot deny but kings and parliaments are the makers and proper expounders of our laws; and if ever you mean to have "truth and peace kiss each other," let no man dispute against your laws. For did not our blessed Saviour say, that an oath is the end of all questions, and, after depositions are taken, all judges go to sentence? What oaths are to private questions, that laws are to public. And if it be said that laws may be mistaken, it is true; but may not an oath also be a perjury? and yet, because, in human affairs, we have no greater certainty, and greater than God gives we may not look for,—let the laws be the last determination; and, in wise and religious governments, no disputation is to go beyond them.

2. But this is not only true in religious prudence and plain necessity, but this is the way that God hath appointed, and that he hath blessed, and that he hath intended to be the means of ending all questions. This we learn from St. Paul,[b] "I exhort that first of all, prayers, and supplications, and intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for kings, and all that are in authority." For all; for parliaments and for councils, for bishops and for magistrates; it is for all, and for kings above all. Well; to what purpose is all this? "That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty." Mark that: "kings and all that are in authority," are by God appointed to be the means of obtaining unity and peace in godliness, ἐν εὐσεβείαις, "in all the true and godly worshippings" of God; no unity in religion without kings and bishops, and those that are in authority.

3. And, indeed, because this is God's way of ending our controversies, the matter of authority is highly to be regarded. If you suffer the authority of the king to be lessened, to be scrupled, to be denied in ecclesiastical affairs, you have no way left to silence the tongues and hands of gainsaying people. But so it is; the king's authority is appointed and enabled by God to end our questions of religion: "Divinatio in labiis regis" (saith Solomon[c]) "in judicio non errabit os ejus:" "Divination and a wise sentence is in the lips of the king, and his mouth shall not err in judgment." In all Scripture there is not so much for the pope's infallibility, but by this, it appears there is divinity in the king's sentence; for God gives to kings, who are his vicegerents, a peculiar spirit. And when Justinian had, out of the sense of Julian the lawyer, observed that there were many cases, for which law made no provision, he adds: "If any such shall happen,"[d] "Augustum imploretur remedium," "run to the king for remedy;" for therefore God hath set the imperial fortune over human affairs, "ut possit omnia quæ noviter contingunt, et emendare et componere, et modis ac regulis competentibus tradere," "that the king may amend and rule and compose every new arising question." And it is not to be despised, but is a great indication of this truth, that the answers of the Roman princes and judges recorded in the civil law are such, that all nations of the world do approve them, and are a great testimony how the sentences of kings ought to be valued, even in matters of religion, and questions of greatest doubt. "Bona conscientia scyphus est Josephi," said the old abbot of Kells;[e] "A good conscience is like Joseph's cup," in which our lord the king divines. And since God hath blessed us with so good, so just, so religious, and so wise a prince, let the sentence of his laws be our last resort, and no questions be permitted after his judgment and legal determination; for wisdom saith, "By me princes rule, by me they decree justice:" and therefore the spirit of the king is a divine eminency, and is as the spirit of the most high God.

4. Let no man be too busy in disputing the laws of his superiors; for a man by that seldom gets good to himself, but seldom misses to do mischief unto others: Μὴ ἔριζε γονεῦσι κἂν δίκαια λέγῃς, said one in Laertius. Will a son contend with his father? that is not decent, though the son speak that which is right; he may, possibly, say well enough, but he does do very ill; not only because he does not pay his duty and reverential fear, but because it is in itself very often unreasonable to dispute concerning the command of our superior, whether it be good or no; for the very commandment can make it not only good, but a necessary good. "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay on you no greater burden than these necessary things," said the council of Jerusalem; and yet these things were not necessary, but as they were commanded: to abstain from a strangled hen or a bloody pudding, could not of themselves be necessary; but the commandment came, authority did interpose, and then they were made so.

5. But then besides the advantages, both of the spirit and the authority of kings, in matter of question, the laws and decrees of a national church ought, upon the account of their own advantages, to be esteemed as a final sentence in all things disputed. The thing is a plain command: "Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God."[f] This tells what rulers he means; rulers ecclesiastical; and what of them? "whose faith follow," they must "præire in articulis;" they are not masters of your faith, but guides of it; and "they that sit in Moses's chair" must be heard and obeyed, said our blessed Saviour. These words were not said for nothing; and they were nothing, if their authority were nothing.

For between the laws of a church and the opinion of a subject, the comparison is the same as between a public spirit and a private. The public is far the better; the daughter of God, and the mother of a blessing, and always dwells in light. The public spirit hath already passed the trial, it hath been "subjected to the prophets," tried and searched and approved: the private is yet to be examined. The public spirit is uniform and apt to be followed; the private is various and multiform as chance, and no man can follow him that hath it; for if he follows one, he is reproved by a thousand; and if he changes, he may get a shame but no truth; and he can never rest but in the arms and conduct of his superior. When Aaron and Miriam murmured against Moses, God told them they were prophets of an inferior rank than Moses was. God communicated himself to them in dreams and visions; but the ruach hakkodesh, רוח הקודש "the public spirit" of Moses their prince, that was higher: and what then? "Wherefore, then," (God said,[g]) "were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses?" plainly teaching us, that where there is a more excellent spirit, they that have a spirit less excellent, ought to be afraid to speak against it. And this is the full case of the private and public spirit; that is, of a subject speaking against the spirit and the laws of the church. In heaven, and in the air, and in all the regions of spirits, the spirit of a lower order dares not speak against the spirit of a higher; and, therefore, for a private spirit to oppose the public, is a disorder greater than is in hell itself.

To conclude this point: let us consider whether it were not an intolerable mischief, if the judges should give sentence in causes of instance by the measures of their own fancy, and not by the laws; who would endure them? and yet why may they not do that as well as any ecclesiastic person preach religion, not which the laws allow, but what is taught him by his own private opinion? but he that hath the laws on his side, hath ever something of true religion to warrant him, and can never want a great measure of justification: νόμος καὶ χώρα, "the laws and the customs of the country," are the results of wise counsels or long experience; they ever comply with peace and public benefit; and nothing of this can be said of private religions; for they break the peace, and trouble the conscience, and undo government, and despise the laws, and offend princes, and dishonour the wisdom of parliaments, and destroy obedience.

Well; but in the last place: but if we cannot do what the laws command, we will suffer what they impose; and then all is well again. But, first, who ever did so that could help it? And, secondly, this talking of passive obedience is but a mockery; for what man did ever say the laws were not good, but he also said the punishment was unjust? And, thirdly, which of all the recusants did not endeavour to get ground upon the laws, and secretly or openly asperse the authority that put him to pain for doing that which he calls his duty? and can any man boast of his passive obedience that calls it persecution? He may think to please himself, but he neither does nor says any thing that is for the reputation of the laws: such men are like them that sail in a storm; they may possibly be thrown into a harbour, but they are very sick all the way.

But after all this, I have one thing to observe to such persons, that such a passive obedience as this does not acquit a man before God; and he that suffers what the law inflicts, is not discharged in the court of conscience, but there is still a sinner and a debtor: for "the law is not made for the righteous, but for sinners;" that is, the punishment appointed by the law falls on him only that hath sinned; but an offending subject cannot, "with the fruit of his body, pay for the sin of his soul:" when he does evil, he must suffer evil; but if he does not repent besides, a worse thing will happen to him; for we are not tied to obey only for wrath, but also for conscience. Passive obedience is only the correspondent of wrath, but it is the active obedience that is required by conscience: and whatever the subject suffers for his own fault, it matters nothing as to his duty; but this also God will exact at the hands of every man, that is placed under authority.

I have now told you the sum of what I had to say concerning obedience to laws and to your own government; and it will be to little purpose to make laws in matter of religion, or in any thing else, if the end of it be, that every man shall choose whether he will obey or no: and if it be questioned whether you be deceived or no, though the suffering such a question is a great diminution to your authority, yet it is infinitely more probable that you are in the right than that the disobedient subject is; because you are conducted with a public spirit, you have a special title and peculiar portions of the promise of God's assistance,—you have all the helps of counsel and the advantages of deliberation,—you have the Scriptures and the laws,—you are as much concerned to judge according to truth as any man,—you have the principal of all capacities and states of men to assist your consultations,—you are the most concerned for peace,—and to please God also is your biggest interest: and, therefore, it cannot be denied to be the most reasonable thing in the world which is set down in the law, "Præsumptio est pro auctoritate imponentis," the presumption of truth ought to be on your side; and since this is the most likely way for truth, and the most certain way for peace, you are to insist in this, and it is not possible to find a better.

[f] Heb. xiii. 7.

[g] Num. xii. 6, 7, 8.

I have another part or sense of my text yet to handle; but because I have no more time of my own, and I will not take any of yours, I shall only do it in a short exhortation to this honourable auditory, and so conclude.

God hath put a royal mantle, and fastened it with a golden clasp upon the shoulder of the king, and he hath given you the judge's robe; the king holds the sceptre, and he hath now permitted you to touch the golden ball, and to take it awhile into your handling, and make obedience to your laws to be duty and religion: but then remember that the first in every kind is to be the measure of the rest; you cannot reasonably expect that the subjects should obey you, unless you obey God. I do not speak this only in relation to your personal duty; though in that also it would be considered, that all the bishops and ministers of religion are bound to teach the same doctrines by their lives as they do by their sermons; and what we are to do in the matters of doctrine, you are also to do in matter of laws; what is reasonable for the advantages of religion, is also the best method for the advantages of government; we must preach by our good example, and you must govern by it; and your good example in observing the laws of religion, will strangely endear them to the affections of the people. But I shall rather speak to you as you are in a capacity of union and government; for as now you have a new power, so there is incumbent upon you a special duty.

1. Take care that all your power and your counsels be employed in doing honour and advantages to piety and holiness. Then you obey God in your public capacity, when by holy laws, and wise administrations, you take care that all the land be an obedient and a religious people. For then you are princely rulers indeed, when you take care of the salvation of a whole nation. "Nihil aliud est imperium nisi cura salutis alienæ," said Ammianus; "Government is nothing but a care that all men be saved." And, therefore, take care that men do not destroy their souls by the abominations of an evil life: see that God be obeyed; take care that the breach of the laws of God may not be unpunished. The best way to make men to be good subjects to the king, is to make them good servants of God. Suffer not drunkenness to pass with impunity; let lust find a public shame; let the sons of the nobility and gentry no more dare to dishonour God, than the meanest of the people shall; let baseness be basely esteemed; that is, put such characters of shame upon dishonourable crimes, that it be esteemed more against the honour of a gentleman to be drunk than to be kicked, more shame to fornicate than to be caned: and for honour's sake, and the reputation of christianity, take some course, that the most unworthy sins of the world have not reputation added to them, by being the practice of gentlemen and persons of good birth and fortunes. Let not them who should be examples of holiness, have an impunity and a license to provoke God to anger; lest it be said, that in Ireland it is not lawful for any man to sin, unless he be a person of quality. "Optimus est reipublicæ status, ubi nihil deest nisi licentia pereundi:" "In a commonwealth, that is the best state of things where every thing can be had but a leave to sin, a license to be undone." [h]

2. As God is thus to be obeyed, and you are to take care that he be, so God also must be honoured, by paying that reverence and religious obedience which is due to those persons, whom he hath been pleased to honour, by admitting them to the dispensation of his blessings, and the ministries of your religion. For certain it is, this is a right way of giving honour and obedience to God. The church is, in some very peculiar manner, the "portion," and the "called," the "care" of God; and it will concern you, in pursuance of your obedience to God, to take care that they, in whose hands religion is to be ministered and conducted, be not discouraged. For what your judges are to the ministry of laws, that your bishops are in the ministries of religion; and it concerns you that the hands of neither of them be made weak: and so long as you make religion your care, and holiness your measure, you will not think that authority is the more to be despised, because it is in the hands of the church; or that it is a sin to "speak evil of dignities," unless they be ecclesiastical; but that they may be reviled, and that though nothing is baser than for a man to be a thief, yet sacrilege is no dishonour; and indeed, to be an oppressor is a great and crying sin, yet to oppress the church, to diminish her rents, to make her beggarly and contemptible, that is no offence; and that though it is not lawful "to despise government," yet if it be church-government, that then the case is altered. Take heed of that; for then God is dishonoured, when any thing is the more despised by how much it relates nearer unto God. No religion ever did despise their chiefest ministers; and the christian religion gives them the greatest honour. For honourable priesthood is like a shower from heaven, it causes blessings every where: but a pitiful, a disheartened, a discouraged clergy, waters the ground with a water-pot, here and there a little good, and for a little while. But every evil man can destroy all that work, whenever he pleases. Take heed; in the world there is not a greater misery can happen to any man, than to be an enemy to God's church. All histories of christendom and the whole book of God have sad records, and sad threatenings, and sad stories of Korah, and Doeg, and Balaam, and Jeroboam, and Uzzah, and Ananias, and Sapphira, and Julian, and of heretics and schismatics, and sacrilegious; and after all, these men could not prevail finally, but paid for the mischief they did, and ended their days in dishonour, and left nothing behind them but the memory of their sin, and the record of their curse.

3. In the same proportion, you are to take care of all inferior relatives of God and of religion. Find out methods to relieve the poor, to accommodate and well dispose of the cures of souls; let not the churches lie waste and in ruinous heaps, to the diminution of religion, and the reproach of the nation, lest the nations abroad say, that the Britons are a kind of christians that have no churches; for churches, and courts of judicature, and the public defences of an imperial city, are "res sacræ;" they are venerable in law, and honourable in religion.

But that which concerns us most is, that we all keep close to our religion. "Ad magnas reipublicæ utilitates retinetur religio in civitatibus," said Cicero; by religion, and the strict preserving of it, ye shall best preserve the interests of the nation: and according to the precept of the apostle, "Mark them which cause divisions amongst you, contrary to the doctrine that ye have received, and avoid them."[i] For I beseech you to consider, all you that are true protestants; do you not think that your religion is holy, and apostolical, and taught by Christ, and pleasing unto God? If you do not think so, why do you not leave it? but if you do think so, why are ye not zealous for it? Is not the government a part of it? It is that which immures, and adorns, and conducts all the rest, and is established in the thirty-sixth article of the church, in the public service-book, and in the book of consecration: it is, therefore, a part of our religion, and is not all of it worth preserving? If it be, then they which make schisms against this doctrine, by the rule of the apostle, are to be avoided. "Beatus qui prædicat verbum inauditum;" "Blessed is he that preaches a word that was never heard before;" so said the Spanish Jesuit: but Christ said otherwise: "No man having drunk old wine straight desires new, for he saith the old is better." And so it is in religion, "Quod primum verum," "truth is always first;" and since episcopacy hath been of so lasting an abode, of so long a blessing, since it hath ever combined with government, and hath been taught by that Spirit that hath so long dwelt in God's church, and hath now, according to the promise of Jesus, that says "The gates of hell shall not prevail against the church," been restored amongst us by a heap of miracles; and as it went away, so it returned again in the hand of monarchy, and in the bosom of our fundamental laws. Suffer no evil tongue to speak against this truth, which hath had so long a testimony from God, and from experience, and from the wisdom of so many ages, of all your ancestors and all your laws, lest ye be found to speak against God, and neglect the things that belong unto your peace, and get nothing by it but news and danger, and what other effects ye know not. But Leontinus, bishop of Antioch, stroked his old white beard, and said, "When this snow is dissolved, a great deal of dirty weather will follow:" meaning, that when the old religion should be questioned and discountenanced, the new religion would bring nothing but trouble and unquietness: and we have found it so by a sad experience.

4. Ye cannot obey God unless ye do justice: for this also is "better than sacrifice," said Solomon.[k] For Christ, who is "the Sun of righteousness," is a Sun and Shield to them that do righteously. The Indian was not immured sufficiently by the Atlantic sea, nor the Bosphoran by the walls of ice, nor the Arabian by his meridian sun; the christian justice of the Roman princes brake through all enclosures, and, by justice, set up Christ's standard, and gave to all the world a testimony how much could be done by prudence and valour, when they were conducted by the hands of justice. And now you will have a great trial of this part of your obedience to God.

For you are to give sentence in the causes of half a nation: and he had need be a wise and a good man, that divides the inheritance amongst brethren; that he may not be abused by contrary pretences,—nor biassed by the interest of friends,—nor transported with the unjust thoughts even of a just revenge,—nor allured by the opportunities of spoil,—nor turned aside by partiality in his own concerns,—nor blinded by gold, which puts out the eyes of wise men,—nor cozened by pretended zeal,—nor wearied with the difficulty of questions,—nor directed by a general measure in cases not measurable by it—nor borne down by prejudice,—nor abused by resolutions taken before the cause be heard,—nor overruled by national interests. For justice ought to be the simplest thing in the world, and is to be measured by nothing but by truth and by laws, and by the decrees of princes. But whatever you do, let not the pretence of a different religion make you think it lawful to oppress any man in his just rights: for opinions are not, but laws only, and "doing as we would be done to," are the measures of justice: and though justice does alike to all men, Jew and christian, Lutheran and Calvinist; yet to do right to them that are of another opinion, is the way to win them; but if you, for conscience sake, do them wrong, they will hate you and your religion.

Lastly: As "obedience is better than sacrifice," so God also said, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice;" meaning, that mercy is the best obedience. "Perierat totum quod Deus fecerat, nisi misericordia subvenisset," said Chrysologus: "All the creatures both of heaven and earth would perish, if mercy did not relieve us all." Other good things, more or less, every man expects according to the portion of his fortune: "Ex clementia omnes idem sperant;"[l] but from mercy and clemency all the world alike do expect advantages. And which of us all stands here this day, that does not need God's pardon and the king's? Surely no man is so much pleased with his own innocence, as that he will be willing to quit his claim to mercy: and if we all need it, let us all show it.

[i] Rom. xvi. 17.

[k] Prov. xxi. 3.

> Naturæ imperio gemimus, cum funus adultæ
> Virginis occurrit, vel terrâ clauditur infans,
> Et minor igne rogi ——— JUVEN.

"If you do but see a maiden carried to her grave a little before her intended marriage, or an infant die before the birth of reason, nature hath taught us to pay a tributary tear." Alas! your eyes will behold the ruin of many families, which though they sadly have deserved, yet mercy is not delighted with the spectacle; and therefore God places a watery cloud in the eye, that when the light of heaven shines upon it, it may produce a rainbow to be a sacrament, and a memorial, that God and the sons of God do not love to see a man perish. God never rejoices "in the death of him that dies;" and we also esteem it indecent to have music at a funeral. And as religion teaches us to pity a condemned criminal, so mercy intercedes for the most benign interpretation of the laws. You must, indeed, be as just as the laws; and you must be as merciful as your religion: and you have no way to tie these together, but to follow the pattern in the Mount; do as God does, who "in judgment remembers mercy."

To conclude: If every one in this honourable assembly would join together, to promote christian religion, in its true notion, that is, peace and holiness, the love of God and the love of our brother, christianity in all its proper usefulness, and would not endure in the nation any thing against the laws of the holy Jesus; if they were all zealous for the doctrines of righteousness, and impatient of sin, in yourselves and in the people, it is not to be imagined what a happy nation we should be. But if ye divide into parties, and keep up useless differences of names or interests; if ye do not join in the bands of peace, that is, the king and the church, religion and the good of the nation, you can never hope to see a blessing to be the end of your labours. Remember the words of Solomon,[m] "Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people:" but when righteousness is advanced in the hearts and lives of the nation, who shall dare to reprove your faith? who can find fault with your religion?

God, of his mercy, grant, that in all your consultations the word of God may be your measure, the Spirit of God may be your guide, and the glory of God may be your end. He, of his mercy, grant, that moderation may be your limit, and peace may be within your walls, as long as you are there, and in all the land for ever after. But remember, that since the honour and service of his majesty, and the peace and prosperity of the church, the perpetuity of our fundamental laws, public justice, and the honour of all legal authority, the advancement of trade, and the wealth of the nation, is your design; —remember, I pray, what warranty you have to expect all this; no less than the words of our blessed Saviour; but it is upon these terms: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof; and all these things shall be added to you." Amen.

TO THE READER.

Peace is so great a blessing, and disputations and questions in religion are so little friends to peace, that I have thought no man's time can be better spent than in propositions and promotions of peace, and consequently in finding expedients, and putting periods to all contentious learning. I have already, in a Discourse before the Right Honourable the Lords and Commons assembled in this Parliament, proved that obedience is the best medium of peace and true religion; and laws are the only common term and certain rule and measure of it. "Vocatâ ad concionem multitudine, quæ coalescere in populi unius corpus nulla re, præterquam legibus, poterat," said Livy. Obedience to man is the external instrument, and the best in the world. To which I now add, that obedience to God is the best internal instrument; and I have proved it in this Discourse. Peace and holiness are twin-sisters; after which because every man is bound to follow, and he that does not, shall never see God, I concluded that the office of a bishop is in nothing so signally to be exhibited, as in declaring by what means these great duties and blessings are to be acquired. This way I have here described, is an old way; for it was Christ's way, and therefore it is truth and life; but it hath been so little regarded, and so seldom taught, that when I first spake my thoughts of it, in the following words, before the little but excellent University of Dublin, they consented to it so perfectly, and so piously entertained it, that they were pleased, with some earnestness, to desire me to publish it to the world, and to consign it to them as a perpetual memorial of their duty, and of my regards to them, and care over them in my station. I was very desirous to serve and please them in all their worthy desires, but had found so much reason to distrust my own abilities, that I could not resolve to do what I fain would have done, till by a second communication of those thoughts, though in differing words, I had published it also to my clergy, at the metropolitical visitation of the most Reverend and Learned Lord Primate of Armagh, in my own diocess. But when I found that they also thought it very reasonable and pious, and joined in the desire of making it public, I consented perfectly, and now only pray to God it may do that work I intended. I have often thought of those excellent words of Mr. Hooker, in his very learned Discourse of Justification: "Such is the untoward constitution of our nature, that we do neither so perfectly understand the way and knowledge of the Lord, nor so stedfastly embrace it when it is understood, nor so graciously utter it when it is embraced, nor so peaceably maintain it when it is uttered, but that the best of us are overtaken, sometimes through blindness, sometimes through hastiness, sometimes through impatience, sometimes through other passions of the mind, whereunto (God knows) we are too subject." That I find by true experience; the best way of learning and peace, is that which cures all these evils, as far as in the world they are curable, and that is the ways of holiness, which are, therefore, the best and only way of truth. In disputations there is no end, and but very little advantage; but the way of godliness hath in it no error and no doubtfulness. By this, therefore, I hoped best to apply the counsel of the wise man: "Stand thou fast in thy sure understanding, in the way and knowledge of the Lord, and have but one manner of word, and follow the word of peace and righteousness."* I have reason to be confident that they who desired me to publish this Discourse, will make use of it, and find benefit by it: and if any others do so too, both they and I shall still more and more give God all thanks, and praise, and glory.

* Ecclus. v. 10. Vulg. Edit. Lat.

SERMON.

If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself.—John vii. 17.

THE ancients, in their mythological learning, tell us, that when Jupiter espied the men of the world striving for Truth, and pulling her in pieces to secure her to themselves, he sent Mercury down amongst them; and he, with his usual arts, dressed Error up in the imagery of Truth, and thrust her into the crowd, and so left them to contend still: and though then, by contention, men were sure to get but little truth, yet they were as earnest as ever, and lost peace too, in their importune contentions for the very image of truth. And this, indeed, is no wonder; but when truth and peace are brought into the world together, and bound up in the same bundle of life; when we are taught a religion by the Prince of peace, who is the truth itself; to see men contending for this truth, to the breach of that peace; and when men fall out, to see that they should make christianity their theme, that is one of the greatest wonders in the world. For christianity is ἥμερος καὶ φιλάνθρωπος νομοθεσία, "a soft and gentle institution;" ὑγρὸν καὶ μείλιχον ἦθος· it was brought into the world to soften the asperities of human nature, and to cure the barbarities of evil men, and the contentions of the passionate. The eagle, seeing her breast wounded, and espying the arrow that hurt her to be feathered, cried out, Πτερόν με τὸν πτερωτον ὀλλύει, "The feathered nation is destroyed by their own feathers;" that is, a christian fighting and wrangling with a christian; and, indeed, that is very sad: but wrangling about peace too, that peace itself should be the argument of a war, that is unnatural; and if it were not that there are many, who are "homines multæ religionis, nullius penè pietatis," "men of much religion and little godliness,"—it would not be that there should be so many quarrels in and concerning that religion, which is wholly made up of truth and peace, and was sent amongst us to reconcile the hearts of men, when they were tempted to uncharitableness by any other unhappy argument. Disputation cures no vice, but kindles a great many, and makes passion evaporate into sin: and though men esteem it learning, yet it is the most useless learning in the world. When Eudamidas, the son of Archidamus, heard old Xenocrates disputing about wisdom, he asked very soberly, "If the old man be yet disputing and inquiring concerning wisdom, what time will he have to make use of it?" Christianity is all for practice; and so much time as is spent in quarrels about it, is a diminution to its interest. Men inquire so much what it is, that they have but little time left to be christians. I remember a saying of Erasmus, "that when he first read the New Testament, with fear and a good mind, with a purpose to understand it and obey it, he found it very useful and very pleasant; but when, afterwards, he fell on reading the vast differences of commentaries, then he understood it less than he did before, then he began not to understand it:" for, indeed, the truths of God are best dressed in the plain culture and simplicity of the Spirit; but the truths that men commonly teach, are like the reflections of a multiplying-glass; for one piece of good money, you shall have forty that are fantastical; and it is forty to one if your finger hit upon the right. Men have wearied themselves in the dark, having been amused with false fires; and instead of going home, have wandered all night ἐν ὁδοῖς ἀβάταις, "in untrodden, unsafe, uneasy ways;" but have not found out what their soul desires. But, therefore, since we are so miserable, and are in error, and have wandered very far, we must do as wandering travellers used to do, go back just to that place from whence they wandered, and begin upon a new account. Let us go to the truth itself, to Christ; and he will tell us an easy way of ending all our quarrels: for we shall find christianity to be the easiest and the hardest thing in the world: it is like a secret in arithmetic, infinitely hard till it be found out by a right operation, and then it is so plain, we wonder we did not understand it earlier.

Christ's way of finding out of truth, is by "doing the will of God." We will try that by and by, if possibly we may find that easy and certain: in the mean time, let us consider what ways men have propounded to find out truth, and upon the foundation of that to establish peace in christendom.

1. That there is but one true way, is agreed upon; and therefore almost every church of one denomination that lives under government, propounds to you a system or collective body of articles, and tells you that is the true religion, and they are the church, and the peculiar people of God: like Brutus and Cassius, of whom one says, "Ubicunque ipsi essent, prætexebant esse rempublicam," "They supposed themselves were the commonwealth;" and these are the church, and out of this church they will hardly allow salvation: but of this there can be no end; for divide the church into twenty parts, and in what part soever your lot falls, you and your party are damned by the other nineteen; and men on all hands almost keep their own proselytes by affrighting them with the fearful sermons of damnation: but, in the mean time, here is no security to them, that are not able to judge for themselves, and no peace for them that are.

2. Others cast about to cure this, and conclude, that it must be done by submission to an infallible guide; this must do it or nothing; and this is the way of the church of Rome; follow but the pope and his clergy, and you are safe, at least as safe as their warrant can make you. Indeed, this were a very good way, if it were a way at all; but it is none; for this can never end our controversies: not only because the greatest controversies are about this infallible guide; but also because, 1. We cannot find, that there is, upon earth, any such guide at all. 2. We do not find it necessary that there should. 3. We find that they who pretend to be this infallible guide, are themselves infinitely deceived. 4. That they do not believe themselves to be infallible, whatever they say to us; because they do not put an end to all their own questions that trouble them. 5. Because they have no peace, but what is constrained by force and government. 6. And lastly: Because if there were such a guide, we should fail of truth by many other causes: for, it may be, that guide would not do his duty; or we are fallible followers of this infallible leader; or we should not understand his meaning at all times, or we should be perverse at some times, or something as bad; because we all confess, that God is an infallible guide, and that some way or other he does teach us sufficiently, and yet it does come to pass, by our faults, that we are as far to seek for peace and truth as ever.

3. Some very wise men, finding this to fail, have undertaken to reconcile the differences of christendom, by a way of moderation. Thus they have projected to reconcile the papists and the Lutherans and the Calvinists, the remonstrants and contra-remonstrants, and project, that each side should abate of their asperities, and pare away something of their propositions, and join in common terms and phrases of accommodation,—each of them sparing something, and promising they shall have a great deal of peace for the exchange of a little of their opinion. This was the way of Cassander, Modrevius, Andreas Frisius, Erasmus, Spalato, Grotius, and, indeed, of Charles the Fifth, in part, but something more heartily of Ferdinand the Second. This device produced the conferences at Poissy, at Montpelier, at Ratisbon, at the Hague, at many places more: and what was the event of these? Their parties, when their delegates returned, either disclaimed their moderation,—or their respective princes had some other ends to serve,—or they permitted the meetings upon uncertain hopes, and a trial if any good might come; or, it may be, they were both in the wrong, and their mutual abatement was nothing but a mutual quitting of what they could not get, and the shaking hands of false friends; or, it may be, it was all of it nothing but hypocrisy and arts of craftiness, and, like Lucian's man, every one could be a man and a pestle when he pleased. And the council of Trent, though under another cover, made use of the artifice, but made the secret manifest and common: for at this day the Jesuits, in the questions "de auxiliis Divinæ gratiæ," have prevailed with the Dominicans to use their expressions, and yet they think they still keep the sentence of their own order. From hence can succeed nothing but folly and a fantastic peace: this is but the skinning of an old sore; it will break out upon all occasions.

4. Others, who understand things beyond the common rate, observing that many of our controversies and peevish wranglings are kept up by the ill stating of the question, endeavour to declare things wisely, and make the matter intelligible, and the words clear; hoping, by this means, to cut off all disputes. Indeed this is a very good way, so far as it can go; and would prevail very much, if all men were wise, and would consent to those statings, and would not fall out upon the main inquiry, when it were well stated: but we find, by a sad experience, that few questions are well stated; and when they are, they are not consented to; and when they are agreed on by both sides that they are well stated, it is nothing else but a drawing up the armies in battalia with great skill and discipline; the next thing they do is, they thrust their swords into one another's sides.

5. What remedy after all this? Some other good men have propounded one way yet; but that is a way of peace, rather than truth; and that is, that all opinions should be tolerated, and none persecuted, and then all the world will be at peace. Indeed, this relies upon a great reasonableness; not only because opinions cannot be forced, but because if men receive no hurt, it is to be hoped they will do none. But we find that this alone will not do it; for besides that all men are not so just as not to do any injury,—for some men begin the evil; besides this, I say, there are very many men amongst us, who are not content that you permit them; for they will not permit you, but "rule over your faith," and say that their way is not only true, but necessary; and therefore the truth of God is at stake, and all indifference and moderation is carnal wisdom, and want of zeal for God; nay, more than so, they preach for toleration when themselves are under the rod, who, when they got the rod into their own hands, thought toleration itself to be intolerable. Thus do the papists, and thus the Calvinists; and, for their cruelty, they pretend charity. They will, indeed, force you to come in, but it is in true zeal for your soul; and if they do you violence, it is no more than if they pull your arm out of joint, when, to save you from drowning, they draw you out of a river; and if you complain, it is no more to be regarded than the outcries of children against their rulers, or sick men against physicians. But as to the thing itself, the truth is, it is better in contemplation than practice; for reckon all that is got by it when you come to handle it, and it can never satisfy for the infinite disorders happening in the government; the scandal to religion, the secret dangers to public societies, the growth of heresy, the nursing up of parties to a grandeur so considerable, as to be able, in their own time, to change the laws and the government. So that if the question be, whether mere opinions are to be persecuted,—it is certainly true, they ought not. But if it be considered how, by opinions, men rifle the affairs of kingdoms, it is also as certain, they ought not to be made public and permitted. And what is now to be done? Must truth be for ever in the dark, and the world for ever be divided, and societies disturbed, and governments weakened, and our spirits debauched with error, and the uncertain opinions and the pedantry of talking men? Certainly there is a way to cure all this evil; and the wise Governor of all the world hath not been wanting in so necessary a matter as to lead us into all truth. But the way hath not yet been hit upon, and yet I have told you all the ways of man, and his imaginations, in order to truth and peace; and you see these will not do; we can find no rest for the soles of our feet, amidst all the waters of contention and disputations, and little artifices of divided schools. "Every man is a liar," and his understanding is weak, and his propositions uncertain, and his opinions trifling, and his contrivances imperfect, and neither truth nor peace does come from man. I know I am in an auditory of inquisitive persons, whose business is to study for truth, that they may find it for themselves, and teach it unto others. I am in a school of prophets and prophets' sons, who all ask Pilate's question, "What is truth?" You look for it in your books, and you tug hard for it in your disputations, and you derive it from the cisterns of the fathers, and you inquire after the old ways, and sometimes are taken with new appearances, and you rejoice in false lights, or are delighted with little umbrages and peep of day. But where is there a man, or a society of men, that can be at rest in his inquiry, and is sure he understands all the truths of God? Where is there a man, but the more he studies and inquires, still he discovers nothing so clearly as his own ignorance? This is a demonstration that we are not in the right way, that we do not inquire wisely, that our method is not artificial. If men did fall upon the right way, it were impossible so many learned men should be engaged in contrary parties and opinions. We have examined all ways but one, all but God's way. Let us, having missed in all the other, try this; let us go to God for truth; for truth comes from God only, and his ways are plain, and his sayings are true, and his promises "Yea and Amen;" and if we miss the truth, it is because we will not find it; for certain it is, that all that truth which God hath made necessary, he hath also made legible and plain; and if we will open our eyes, we shall see the sun, and if "we will walk in the light, we shall rejoice in the light;" only let us withdraw the curtains, let us remove the "impediments, and the sin that doth so easily beset us;" that is God's way. Every man must, in his station, do that portion of duty, which God requires of him, and then he shall be taught of God all that is fit for him to learn. There is no other way for him but this. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and a good understanding have all they that do thereafter."[a] And so said David of himself, "I have more understanding than my teachers; because I keep thy commandments."[b] And this is the only way which Christ hath taught us. If you ask, "What is truth?" you must not do as Pilate did—ask the question, and then go away from him that only can give you an answer; for as God is the author of truth, so he is the teacher of it; and the way to learn it is this of my text; for so saith our blessed Lord, "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God or no."

My text is simple as truth itself, but greatly comprehensive, and contains a truth that alone will enable you to understand all mysteries, and to expound all prophecies, and to interpret all scriptures, and to search into all secrets; all, I mean, which concern our happiness and our duty; and, it being an affirmative hypothetical, is plainly to be resolved into this proposition,—"The way to judge of religion is by doing of our duty; and theology is rather a Divine life than a Divine knowledge." In heaven, indeed, we shall first see, and then love; but here on earth, we must first love, and love will open our eyes as well as our hearts; and we shall then see, and perceive, and understand.

In the handling of which proposition, I shall first represent to you, that—the certain causes of our errors are nothing but direct sins,—nothing makes us fools and ignorants but living vicious lives; and then I shall proceed to the direct demonstration of the article in question, that—holiness is the only way of truth and understanding.

1. No man understands the word of God, as it ought to be understood, unless he lays aside all affections to sin; of which because we have taken very little care, the product hath been, that we have had very little wisdom, and very little knowledge, in the ways of God. Κακία ἐστὶ φθαρτικὴ τῆς ἀρχῆς, said Aristotle; "Wickedness does corrupt a man's reasoning;" it gives him false principles and evil measures of things; the sweet wine that Ulysses gave to the Cyclops, put his eye out; and a man that hath contracted evil affections, and made a league with sin, sees only by those measures. A covetous man understands nothing to be good that is not profitable; and a voluptuous man likes your reasoning well enough, if you discourse of "bonum jucundum," the pleasures of the sense, the ravishments of lust, the noises and inadvertencies, the mirth and songs of merry company; but if you talk to him of the melancholy lectures of the cross, the content of resignation, the peace of meekness, and the joys of the Holy Ghost, and of rest in God, after your long discourse, and his great silence, he cries out, "What is the matter?" He knows not what you mean. Either you must fit his humour, or change your discourse.

I remember that Arrian tells of a gentleman that was banished from Rome, and in his sorrow visited the philosopher, and he heard him talk wisely, and believed him, and promised him to leave all the thoughts of Rome, and splendours of the court, and retire to the course of a severe philosophy; but before the good man's lectures were done, there came πινακίδες ἀπὸ τοῦ Καίσαρος, "letters from Cæsar," to recall him home, to give him pardon, and promise him great employment. He presently grew weary of the good man's sermon, and wished he would make an end, thought his discourse was dull and flat; for his head and heart were full of another story and new principles; and by these measures he could hear only, and he could understand.

Every man understands by his affections more than by his reason: and when the wolf in the fable went to school to learn to spell, whatever letters were told him, he could never make any thing of them but "agnus;" he thought of nothing but his belly: and if a man be very hungry, you must give him meat, before you give him counsel. A man's mind must be like your proposition, before it can be entertained; for whatever you put into a man, it will smell of the vessel; it is a man's mind that gives the emphasis, and makes your argument to prevail.

[a] Psal. cxi. 10.

[b] Psal. cxix.

And upon this account it is, that there are so many false doctrines in the only article of repentance. Men know they must repent, but the definition of repentance they take from the convenience of their own affairs: what they will not part with, that is not necessary to be parted with; and they will repent, but not restore: they will say, "Nollem factum," "they wish they had never done it;" but since it is done, you must give them leave to rejoice in their purchase: they will ask forgiveness of God; but they sooner forgive themselves, and suppose that God is of their mind: if you tie them to hard terms, your doctrine is not to be understood, or it is but one doctor's opinion,—and therefore they will fairly take their leave, and get them another teacher.

What makes these evil, these dangerous and desperate doctrines? Not the obscurity of the thing, but the cloud upon the heart; for say you what you will, he that hears must be the expounder, and we can never suppose but a man will give sentence in behalf of what he passionately loves. And so it comes to pass, that, as Rabbi Moses observed, as God for the greatest sin imposed the least oblation, as a she-goat for the sin of idolatry; for a woman accused of adultery, a barley cake: so do most men; they think to expiate the worst of their sins with a trifling, with a pretended, little, insignificant repentance. God, indeed, did so, that the cheapness of the oblation might teach them to hope for pardon, not from the ceremony, but from a severe internal repentance: but men take any argument to lessen their repentance, that they may not lessen their pleasures or their estates,—and that repentance may be nothing but a word,—and mortification signify nothing against their pleasures, but be a term of art only, fitted for the schools or for the pulpit,—but nothing relative to practice, or the extermination of their sin. So that it is no wonder we understand so little of religion: it is because we are in love with that which destroys it; and as a man does not care to hear what does not please him, so neither does he believe it; he cannot, he will not understand it.

And the same is the case in the matter of pride; the church hath extremely suffered by it in many ages. Arius missed a bishopric, and therefore turned heretic; ἐτάραττε τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, saith the story; "he disturbed and shaked the church;" for he did not understand this truth,—that the peace of the church was better than the satisfaction of his person, or the promoting his foolish opinion.—And do not we see and feel, that at this very day, the pride of men makes it seem impossible for many persons to obey their superiors? and they do not see what they can read every day, that it is a sin "to speak evil of dignities."

A man would think it a very easy thing to understand the thirteenth chapter to the Romans, "Whosoever resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God:" and yet we know a generation of men to whom these words were so obscure, that they thought it lawful to fight against their king. A man would think it easy to believe, that those who were "in the gainsaying of Korah," who rose up against the high priest, were in a very sad condition: and yet there are too many amongst us, who are in the gainsaying of Korah, and think they do very well; that they are the godly party, and the good people of God. Why? What is the matter? In the world there can be nothing plainer than these words, "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers;" and that you need not make a scruple who are these higher powers, it is as plainly said, "There is no power but of God;" all that are set over you by the laws of your nation, these "are over you in the Lord:" and yet men will not understand these plain things; they deny to do their notorious duty, and yet believe they are in the right; and if they sometimes obey "for wrath," they oftener disobey for "conscience sake." Where is the fault? The words are plain, the duty is certain, the book lies open; but, alas! "it is sealed within," that is, "men have eyes and will not see, ears and will not hear." But the wonder is the less; for we know when God said to Jonah, "Doest thou well to be angry?" he answered God to his face, "I do well to be angry even unto the death." Let God declare his mind never so plainly, if men will not lay aside the evil principle that is within, their open love to their secret sin, they may kill an apostle, and yet be so ignorant as to "think they do God good service;" they may disturb kingdoms, and break the peace of a well-ordered church, and rise up against their fathers, and be cruel to their brethren, and stir up the people to sedition; and all this with a cold stomach and a hot liver, with a hard heart and a tender conscience, with humble carriage and a proud spirit. For thus men hate repentance, because they scorn to confess an error; they will not return to peace and truth, because they fear to lose the good opinion of the people, whom themselves have cozened; they are afraid to be good, lest they should confess they have formerly done amiss: and he,—that observes how much evil is done, and how many heresies are risen, and how much obstinacy and unreasonable perseverance in folly dwells in the world upon the stock of pride,—may easily conclude, that no learning is sufficient to make a proud man understand the truth of God, unless he first learn to be humble. But "Obedite et intelligetis," saith the prophet; "Obey," and be humble, leave the foolish affections of sin, "and then ye shall understand." That is the first particular: all remaining affections to sin hinder the learning and understanding of the things of God.

2. He that means to understand the will of God and the truth of religion, must lay aside all inordinate affections to the world. St. Paul complained that there was at "that day a veil upon the hearts of the Jews, in the reading of the Old Testament;"[d] they looked for a temporal prince to be their Mes-sias, and their affections and hopes dwelt in secular advantages; and so long as that veil was there, they could not see, and they would not accept the poor despised Jesus.

For the things of the world, besides that they entangle one another, and make much business, and spend much time, they also take up the attentions of a man's mind, and spend his faculties, and make them trifling and secular with the very handling and conversation. And, therefore, the Pythagoreans taught their disciples χωρισμὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ σώματος, εἰς τὸ καλῶς φιλοσοφεῖν, "a separation from the things of the body, if they would purely find out truth and the excellencies of wisdom." Had not he lost his labour, that would have discoursed wisely to Apicius, and told him of the books of fate and the secrets of the other world, the abstractions of the soul, and its brisker immortality, that saints and angels eat not, and that the spirit of a man lives for ever upon wisdom, and holiness, and contemplation? The fat glutton would have stared awhile upon the preacher, and then have fallen asleep. But if you had discoursed well and knowingly of a lamprey, a large mullet, or a boar, "animal propter convivia natum," and have sent him a cook from Asia to make new sauces, he would have attended carefully, and taken in your discourses greedily. And so it is in the questions and secrets of christianity: which made St. Paul, when he intended to convert Felix, discourse first with him about "temperancê, righteousness, and judgment to come." He began in the right point; he knew it was to no purpose to preach Jesus Christ crucified to an intemperate person, to a usurper of other men's rights, to one whose soul dwelt in the world, and cared not for the sentence of the last day. The philosophers began their wisdom with the meditation of death, and St. Paul his with the discourse of the day of judgment: to take the heart off from this world and the amabilities of it, which dishonour and baffle the understanding, and made Solomon himself become a child, and fooled into idolatry, by the prettiness of a talking woman. Men, now-a-days, love not a religion that will cost them dear. If your doctrine calls upon men to part with any considerable part of their estates, you must pardon them if they cannot believe you; they understand it not. I shall give you one great instance of it.

When we consider the infinite unreasonableness that is in the popish religion, how against common sense their doctrine of transubstantiation is, how against the common experience of human nature is the doctrine of the pope's infallibility, how against Scripture is the doctrine of indulgences and purgatory; we may well think it a wonder, that no more men are persuaded to leave such unlearned follies. But then, on the other side, the wonder will cease, if we mark how many temporal ends are served by these doctrines. If you destroy the doctrine of purgatory and indulgences, you take away the priest's income, and make the see apostolic to be poor; if you deny the pope's infallibility, you will despise his authority, and examine his propositions, and discover his failings, and put him to answer hard arguments, and lessen his power: and, indeed, when we run through all the propositions of difference between them and us, and see that, in every one of them, they serve an end of money or of power; it will be very visible that the way to confute them is not by learned disputations,—for we see they have been too long without effect, and without prosperity: the men must be cured of their affections to the world, "ut nudi nudum sequantur crucifixum," "that with naked and divested affections they might follow the naked crucified Jesus;" and then they would soon learn the truths of God, which, till then, will be impossible to be apprehended. Ἐν προσποιήσει ἐξηγήσεως τὰ ἑαυτῶν παρεισάγουσιν, "Men," as St. Basil says, "when they expound Scripture, always bring in something of themselves:" but till there be, as one said, ἀνάβασις ἐκ τοῦ σπηλαίου, "a rising out" from their own seats, until they go out "from their dark dungeons," they can never see the light of heaven. And how many men are there amongst us, who are, therefore, enemies to the religion, because it seems to be against their profit? The argument of Demetrius is unanswerable: "By this craft they get their livings:" leave them in their livings, and they will let your religion alone; if not, they think they have reason to speak against it. When men's souls are possessed with the world, their souls cannot be invested with holy truths. Χρὴ ἀπὸ τούτων αὐτὴν ψυχὴν ψυχοῦσθαι, as St. Isidore said: "the soul must be" informed, "ensouled," or animated with the propositions that you put in; or you shall never do any good, or get disciples to Christ. Now because a man cannot serve two masters; because he cannot vigorously attend two objects: because there can be but one soul in any living creature; if the world have got possession, talk no more of your questions, shut your Bibles, and read no more of the words of God to them, for they cannot tell of "the doctrine, whether it be of God, or of the world." That is the second particular: worldly affections hinder true understandings in religion.

3. No man, how learned soever, can understand the word of God, or be at peace in the questions of religion, unless he be a master over his passions:

> Tu quoque si vis lumine claro
> Cernere verum, gaudia pelle,
> Pelle timorem; nubila mens est
> Vinctaque frænis, hæc ubi regnant:

said the wise Boethius; a man must first learn himself before he can learn God. "Tua te fallit imago:" nothing deceives a man so soon as a man's self; when a man is (that I may use Plato's expression) συμπεφυρμένος τῇ γενέσει, "mingled with his nature," and his congenial infirmities of anger and desire, he can never have any thing but ἀμυδρὸν δόξαν, "a knowledge partly moral and partly natural:" his whole life is but imagination; his knowledge is inclination and opinion; he judges of heavenly things by the measures of his fears and his desires, and his reason is half of it sense, and determinable by the principles of sense. Εὖγε ὅτι φιλοσοφεῖς ἐν πάθεσι, then "a man learns well, when he is a philosopher in his passions."[e] Passionate men are to be taught the first elements of religion; and let men pretend to as much learning as they please, they must begin again at Christ's cross; they must learn true mortification and crucifixion of their anger and desires, before they can be good scholars in Christ's school,—or be admitted into the more secret inquiries of religion,—or profit in spiritual understanding. It was an excellent proverb of the Jews, "In passionibus Spiritus Sanctus non habitat," "The Holy Ghost never dwells in the house of passion." Truth enters into the heart of man, when it is empty, and clean, and still; but when the mind is shaken with passion as with a storm, you can never hear the "voice of the charmer, though he charm very wisely:" and you will very hardly sheath a sword, when it is held by a loose and a paralytic arm. He that means to learn the secrets of God's wisdom, must be, as Plato says, τὴν λογικὴν ζωὴν οὐσιωμένος, "his soul must be consubstantiated with reason," not invested with passion: to him that is otherwise, things are but in the dark, his notion is obscure, and his sight troubled; and, therefore, though we often meet with passionate fools, yet we seldom or never hear of a very passionate wise man.

I have now done with the first part of my undertaking, and proved to you that our evil life is the cause of our controversies and ignorances in religion and of the things of God. You see what hinders us from becoming good divines. But all this while, we are but in the preparation to the mysteries of godliness: when we have thrown off all affections to sin, when we have stripped ourselves from all fond adherences to the things of the world, and have broken the chains and dominion of our passions; then we may say with David, "Ecce paratum est cor meum, Deus;" "My heart is ready, O God, my heart is ready:" then we may say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth:" but we are not yet instructed. It remains, therefore, that we inquire what is that immediate principle or means, by which we shall certainly and infallibly be led into all truth, and be taught the mind of God, and understand all his secrets; and this is worth our knowledge. I cannot say that this will end your labours, and put a period to your studies, and make your learning easy; it may possibly increase your labour, but it will make it profitable; it will not end your studies, but it will direct them; it will not make human learning easy, but it will make it "wise unto salvation," and conduct it into true notices and ways of wisdom.

I am now to describe to you the right way of knowledge: "Qui facit voluntatem Patris mei," saith Christ; that is the way; do God's will, and you shall understand God's word. And it was an excellent saying of St. Peter, "Add to your faith virtue,"[f] &c. "If these things be in you and abound, ye shall not be unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ." For in this case, it is not enough that our hinderances of knowledge are removed; for that is but the opening of the covering of the book of God; but when it is opened, it is written with a hand that every eye cannot read. Though the windows of the east be open, yet every eye cannot behold the glories of the sun: Ὀφθαλμὸς μὴ ἡλιοειδὴς γινόμενος ἥλιον οὐ βλέπει, saith Plotinus; "The eye that is not made solar, cannot see the sun;"—the eye must be fitted to the splendour; and it is not the wit of the man, but the spirit of the man; not so much his head as his heart, that learns the Divine philosophy.

1. Now, in this inquiry, I must take one thing for a "præcognitum," that every good man is θεοδίδακτος, he is "taught of God:" and, indeed, unless he teach us, we shall make but ill scholars ourselves, and worse guides to others. "Nemo potest Deum scire, nisi à Deo doceatur," said St. Irenæus.[g] If God teaches us, then all is well; but if we do not learn wisdom at his feet, from whence should we have it? it can come from no other spring. And, therefore, it naturally follows, that by how much nearer we are to God, by so much better we are like to be instructed.

But this being supposed, as being most evident, we can easily proceed, by wonderful degrees and steps of progression, in the economy of this Divine philosophy: For,

2. There is, in every righteous man, a new vital principle; the Spirit of grace is the Spirit of wisdom, and teaches us by secret inspirations, by proper arguments, by actual persuasions, by personal applications, by effects and energies: and as the soul of a man is the cause of all his vital operations, so is the Spirit of God the life of that life, and the cause of all actions and productions spiritual: and the consequence of this is what St. John tells us of, "Ye have received the unction from above, and that anointing teacheth you all things:"[h] All things of some one kind; that is, certainly,—all things that pertain to life and godliness;—all that by which a man is wise and happy. We see this by common experience. Unless the soul have a new life put into it, unless there be a vital principle within, unless the Spirit of life be the informer of the spirit of the man,—the word of God will be as dead in the operation, as the body in its powers and possibilities. "Sol et homo generant hominem," saith our philosophy; "A man alone does not beget a man, but a man and the sun;" for without the influence of the celestial bodies, all natural actions are ineffective: and so it is in the operations of the soul.

Which principle divers fanatics, both among us and in the church of Rome, misunderstanding, look for new revelations, and expect to be conducted by ecstasy, and will not pray but in a transfiguration, and live upon raptures and extravagant expectations, and separate themselves from the conversation of men, by affectations, by new measures and singularities, and destroy order, and despise government, and live upon illiterate phantasms and ignorant discourses. These men do ψεύδεσθαι τὸ ἅγιον Πνεῦμα, "they belie the Holy Ghost:" for the Spirit of God makes men wise: it is an evil spirit that makes them fools. The Spirit of God makes us "wise unto salvation;" it does not spend its holy influences in disguises and convulsions of the understanding: God's Spirit does not destroy reason, but heightens it; he never disorders the beauties of government, but is a God of order; it is the Spirit of humility, and teaches no pride; he is to be found in churches and pulpits, upon altars, and in the doctors' chairs; not in conventicles, and mutinous corners of a house: he goes in company with his own ordinances, and makes progressions by the measures of life; his infusions are just as our acquisitions, and his graces pursue the methods of nature: that which was imperfect, he leads on to perfection; and that which was weak, he makes strong: he opens the heart, not to receive murmurs, or to attend to secret whispers, but to hear the word of God; and then he opens the heart, and creates a new one; and without this new creation, this new principle of life, we may hear the word of God, but we can never understand it; we hear the sound, but are never the better; unless there be in our hearts a secret conviction by the Spirit of God, the gospel itself is a dead letter, and worketh not in us the light and righteousness of God.

Do not we see this by daily experience? Even those things which a good man and an evil man know, they do not know them both alike. A wicked man does know that good is lovely, and sin is of an evil and destructive nature; and when he is reproved, he is convinced; and when he is observed, he is ashamed; and when he has done, he is unsatisfied; and when he pursues his sin, he does it in the dark: tell him he shall die, and he sighs deeply, but he knows it as well as you: proceed, and say, that after death comes judgment, and the poor man believes and trembles; he knows that God is angry with him; and if you tell him, that for aught he knows he may be in hell to-morrow, he knows that it is an intolerable truth, but it is also undeniable: and yet, after all this, he runs to commit his sin with as certain an event and resolution as if he knew no argument against it: these notices of things terrible and true pass through his understanding, as an eagle through the air; as long as her flight lasted, the air was shaken, but there remains no path behind her.

Now since, at the same time, we see other persons, not so learned, it may be, not so much versed in Scriptures,—yet they say a thing is good and lay hold of it; they believe glorious things of heaven, and they live accordingly, as men that believe themselves; half a word is enough to make them understand; a nod is a sufficient reproof; the crowing of a cock, the singing of a lark, the dawning of the day, and the washing their hands, are to them competent memorials of religion, and warnings of their duty. What is the reason of this difference? They both read the Scriptures, they read and hear the same sermons, they have capable understandings, they both believe what they hear and what they read, and yet the event is vastly different. The reason is that which I am now speaking of; the one understands by one principle, the other by another; the one understands by nature, and the other by grace; the one by human learning, and the other by Divine; the one reads the Scriptures without, and the other within; the one understands as a son of man, the other as a son of God; the one perceives by the proportions of the world, and the other by the measures of the Spirit; the one understands by reason, and the other by love; and, therefore, he does not only understand the sermons of the Spirit, and perceives their meaning, but he pierces deeper, and knows the meaning of that meaning; that is, the secret of the Spirit, that which is spiritually discerned, that which gives life to the proposition, and activity to the soul. And the reason is, because he hath a divine principle within him, and a new understanding; that is, plainly, he hath love, and that is more than knowledge; as was rarely well observed by St. Paul, "Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth;" that is, charity makes the best scholars. No sermons can edify you, no Scriptures can build you up a holy building to God, unless the love of God be in your hearts, and "purify your souls from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit."

But so it is in the regions of stars, where a vast body of fire is so divided by eccentric motions, that it looks as if Nature had parted them into orbs and round shells of plain and purest materials: but where the cause is simple, and the matter without variety, the motions must be uniform; and in heaven we should either espy no motion, or no variety. But God, who designed the heavens to be the causes of all changes and motions here below, hath placed his angels in their houses of light, and given to every one of his appointed officers a portion of the fiery matter to circumagitate and roll; and now the wonder ceases: for if it be inquired why this part of the fire runs eastward, and the other to the south, they being both indifferent to either,—it is because an angel of God sits in the centre, and makes the same matter turn, not by the bent of its own mobility and inclination, but in order to the needs of man, and the great purposes of God: and so it is in the understandings of men; when they all receive the same notions, and are taught by the same master, and give full consent to all the propositions, and can, of themselves, have nothing to distinguish them in the events, it is because God has sent his Divine Spirit, and kindles a new fire, and creates a braver capacity, and applies the actives to the passives, and blesses their operation; for there is, in the heart of man, such a dead sea, and an indisposition to holy flames, like as in the cold rivers in the north, so as the fires will not burn them, and the sun itself will never warm them, till God's Holy Spirit does, from the temple of the New Jerusalem, bring a holy flame, and make it shine and burn.

"The natural man," saith the holy apostle,[1] "cannot perceive the things of the Spirit; they are foolishness unto him; for they are spiritually discerned:" for he that discourses of things by the measures of sense, thinks nothing good but that which is delicious to the palate, or pleases the brutish part of man; and therefore, while he estimates the secrets of religion by such measures, they must needs seem as insipid as cork, or the uncondited mushroom; for they have nothing at all of that in their constitution. A voluptuous person is like the dogs of Sicily, so filled with the deliciousness of plants that grow in every furrow and hedge, that they can never keep the scent of their game. Ἀδύνατον ἀνάμιξαι ὕδατι πῦρ· οὕτως οἶμαι τρυφὴν καὶ κατάνυξιν, said St. Chrysostom: "The fire and water can never mingle; so neither can sensuality and the watchfulness and wise discerning of the spirit."—"Pilato interroganti de veritate, Christus non respondit;" "When the wicked governor asked of Christ concerning truth, Christ gave him no answer." He was not fit to hear it.

He, therefore, who so understands the words of God, that he not only believes, but loves the proposition; he who consents with all his heart, and, being convinced of the truth, does also apprehend the necessity, and obeys the precept, and delights in the discovery, and lays his hand upon his heart, and reduces the notices of things to the practice of duty; he who dares trust his proposition, and drives it on to the utmost issue, resolving to go after it whithersoever it can invite him; this man walks in the Spirit; at least thus far he is gone towards it; his understanding is brought "in obsequium Christi," "into the obedience of Christ." This is a "loving God with all our mind;" and whatever goes less than this, is but memory, and not understanding; or else such notice of things, by which a man is neither the wiser nor the better.

3. Sometimes God gives to his choicest, his most elect and precious servants, a knowledge even of secret things, which he communicates not to others. We find it greatly remarked in the case of Abraham, "And the Lord said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing that I do?"[k] Why not from Abraham?—God tells us: "For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment."[l] And though this be irregular and infrequent, yet it is a reward of their piety, and the proper increase also of the spiritual man. We find this spoken by God to Daniel, and promised to be the lot of the righteous man in the days of the Messias:[m] "Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly:"—and what then?—"None of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand." Where, besides that the wise man and the wicked are opposed, plainly signifying that the wicked man is a fool and an ignorant; it is plainly said, that "None of the wicked shall understand" the wisdom and mysteriousness of the kingdom of the Messias.

4. A good life is the best way to understand wisdom and religion, because, by the experiences and relishes of religion, there is conveyed to them such a sweetness, to which all wicked men are strangers: there is in the things of God, to them which practise them, a deliciousness that makes us love them, and that love admits us into God's cabinet, and strangely clarifies the understanding by the purification of the heart. For when our reason is raised up by the Spirit of Christ, it is turned quickly into experience; when our faith relies upon the principles of Christ, it is changed into vision; and so long as we know God only in the ways of man, by contentious learning, by arguing and dispute,—we see nothing but the shadow of him; and in that shadow we meet with many dark appearances, little certainty, and much conjecture: but when we know him λόγῳ ἀποφαντικῷ, γαλήνῃ νοερᾷ, with the eyes of holiness, and the intuition of gracious experiences, with a quiet spirit and the peace of enjoyment; then we shall hear what we never heard, and see what our eyes never saw; then the mysteries of godliness shall be opened unto us, and clear as the windows of the morning: and this is rarely well expressed by the apostle, "If we stand up from the dead, and awake from sleep, then Christ shall give us light."[n]

For although the Scriptures themselves are written by the Spirit of God, yet they are written within and without; and besides the light that shines upon the face of them, unless there be a light shining within our hearts, unfolding the leaves, and interpreting the mysterious sense of the Spirit, convincing our consciences and preaching to our hearts, to look for Christ in the leaves of the gospel, is to "look for the living amongst the dead." There is a life in them, but that life is, according to St. Paul's expression, "hid with Christ in God:" and, unless the Spirit of God be the "promo-condus," we shall never draw it forth.

Human learning brings excellent ministries towards this; it is admirably useful for the reproof of heresies, for the detection of fallacies, for the letter of the Scripture, for collateral testimonies, for exterior advantages; but there is something beyond this, that human learning, without the addition of Divine, can never reach. Moses was learned in all the learning of the Egyptians; and the holy men of God contemplated the glories of God in the admirable order, motion, and influences of the heavens; but besides all this, they were taught of God something far beyond these prettinesses. Pythagoras read Moses's books, and so did Plato; and yet they became not proselytes of the religion, though they were learned scholars of such a master. The reason is, because that, which they drew forth from thence, was not the life and secret of it.

Tradidit arcano quodcunque volumine Moses. JUV.

There is a secret in these books, which few men, none but the godly, did understand; and though much of this secret is made manifest in the gospel, yet even here, also, there is a letter, and there is a spirit; still there is a reserve for God's secret ones, even all those deep mysteries which the Old Testament covered in figures, and stories, and names, and prophecies, and which Christ hath, and by his Spirit will yet reveal more plainly to all that will understand them by their proper measures. For, although the gospel is infinitely more legible and plain than the obscurer leaves of the law, yet there is a seal upon them also; "which seal no man shall open, but he that is worthy." We may understand something of it by the three children of the captivity; they were all skilled in all the wisdom of the Chaldees, and so was Daniel: but there was something beyond that in him; "the wisdom of the most high God was in him;" and that taught him a learning beyond his learning.

In all Scripture there is a spiritual sense, a spiritual cabala, which, as it tends directly to holiness, so it is best and truest understood by the sons of the Spirit, who love God, and therefore know him. Γνῶσις ἑκάστων δι' ὁμοιότητα γίνεται, "Every thing is best known by its own similitudes and analogies."

But I must take some other time to speak fully of these things; I have but one thing more to say, and then I shall make my applications of this doctrine, and so conclude.

5. Lastly: there is a sort of God's dear servants who walk in perfectness, who "perfect holiness in the fear of God;" and they have a degree of clarity and Divine knowledge more than we can discourse of, and more certain than the demonstrations of geometry, brighter than the sun, and indeficient as the light of heaven. This is called by the apostle the ἀπαύγασμα τοῦ Θεοῦ· Christ is this "brightness of God," manifested in the hearts of his dearest servants.

Ἀλλ' ἐγὼ ἐς καθαρῶν μερόπων φρένα πυρσὸν ἀνάπτω
Εὐμαθίης. ———

But I shall say no more of this at this time, for this is to be felt, and not to be talked of; and they that never touched it with their finger, may secretly, perhaps, laugh at it in their heart, and be never the wiser. All that I shall now say of it is, that a good man is united unto God, κέντρον κέντρῳ σύναψας, as a flame touches a flame, and combines into splendour and to glory: so is the spirit of a man united unto Christ by the Spirit of God. These are the friends of God, and they best know God's mind, and they only that are so, know how much such men do know. They have a special unction from above: so that now you are come to the top of all; this is the highest round of the ladder, and the angels stand upon it: they dwell in love and contemplation, they worship and obey, but dispute not: and our quarrels and impertinent wranglings about religion are nothing else but the want of the measures of this state. Our light is like a candle; every wind of vain doctrine blows it out, or spends the wax, and makes the light tremulous; but the lights of heaven are fixed and bright, and shine for ever.

But that we may speak not only things mysterious, but thing intelligible; how does it come to pass, by what means and what economy is it effected, that a holy life is the best determination of all questions, and the surest way of knowledge? Is it to be supposed, that a godly man is better enabled to determine the questions of purgatory or transubstantiation? is the gift of chastity the best way to reconcile Thomas and Scotus? and is a temperate man always a better scholar than a drunkard? To this I answer, that in all things in which true wisdom consists, holiness, which is the best wisdom, is the surest way of understanding them. And this,

1. Is effected by holiness as a proper and natural instrument: for naturally every thing is best discerned by its proper light and congenial instrument.

Γαίῃ μὲν γὰρ γαῖαν ὀπώπαμεν, ὕδατι δ' ὕδωρ.

For as the eye sees visible objects, and the understanding perceives the intellectual; so does the Spirit the things of the Spirit. "The natural man," saith St. Paul, "knows not the things of God, for they are spiritually discerned:" that is, they are discovered by a proper light, and concerning these things an unsanctified man discourses pitifully, with an imperfect idea, as a blind man does of light and colours, which he never saw.

A good man, though unlearned in secular notices, is like the windows of the temple, narrow without and broad within: he sees not so much of what profits not abroad, but whatsoever is within, and concerns religion and the glorifications of God, that he sees with a broad inspection: but all human learning, without God, is but blindness and ignorant folly.

But when it is δικαιοσύνη βεβαμμένη εἰς βάθος τῆς ἀληθείας, "righteousness dipped in the wells of truth;" it is like an eye of gold in a rich garment, or like the light of heaven, it shows itself by its own splendour. What learning is it to discourse of the philosophy of the sacrament, if you do not feel the virtue of it? and the man that can with eloquence and subtilty discourse of the instrumental efficacy of baptismal waters, talks ignorantly in respect of him who hath "the answer of a good conscience" within, and is cleansed by the purifications of the Spirit. If the question concern any thing that can perfect a man and make him happy, all that is the proper knowledge and notice of the good man. How can a wicked man understand the purities of the heart? and how can an evil and unworthy communicant tell what it is to have received Christ by faith, to dwell with him, to be united to him, to receive him in his heart? The good man only understands that: the one sees the colour, and the other feels the substance; the one discourses of the sacrament, and the other receives Christ; the one discourses for or against transubstantiation, but the good man feels himself to be changed, and so joined to Christ, that he only understands the true sense of transubstantiation, while he becomes to Christ bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh, and of the same spirit with his Lord.

We talk much of reformation, and (blessed be God) once we have felt the good of it; but of late we have smarted under the name and pretension: the woman that lost her groat, "everrit domum," not "evertit;" "she swept the house, she did not turn the house out of doors." That was but an ill reformation, that untiled the roof and broke the walls, and was digging down the foundation.

Now among all the pretensions of reformation, who can tell better what is, and what is not, true reformation, than he that is truly reformed himself?

He knows what pleases God, and can best tell by what instruments he is reconciled. "The mouth of the just bringeth forth wisdom; and the lips of the righteous know what is acceptable," saith Solomon.[o] He cannot be cozened by names of things, and feels that reformation to be imposture that is sacrilegious: himself is humble and obedient, and therefore knows that is not truth that persuades to schism and disobedience: and most of the questions of christendom are such which either are good for nothing, and therefore to be laid aside; or if they be complicated with action, and are ministries of practice, no man can judge them so well as the spiritual man. That which best pleases God, that which does good to our neighbour, that which teaches sobriety, that which combines with government, that which speaks honour of God, and does him honour,—that only is truth. Holiness, therefore, is a proper and natural instrument of Divine knowledge, and must needs be the best way of instruction in the questions of christendom, because, in the most of them, a duty is complicated with the proposition.

No man that intends to live holily, can ever suffer any pretences of religion to be made to teach him to fight against his king. And when the men of Geneva turned their bishop out of doors, they might easily have considered, that the same person was their prince too; and that must needs be a strange religion, that rose up against Moses and Aaron at the same time: but that hath been the method ever since. There was no church till then ever governed without an apostle or a bishop: and since then, they who go from their bishop, have said very often to their king too, "Nolumus hunc regnare:" and when we see men pretending religion, and yet refuse to own the king's supremacy, they may, upon the stock of holiness, easily reprove their own folly, by considering that such recusancy does introduce into our churches the very worst, the most intolerable parts of popery: for perfect submission to kings is the glory of the protestant cause: and really the reprovable doctrines of the church of Rome are by nothing so much confuted, as that they destroy good life by consequent and evident deduction; as by an induction of particulars were easy to make apparent, if this were the proper season for it.

2. Holiness is not only an advantage to the learning all wisdom and holiness, but for the discerning that which is wise and holy from what is trifling, and useless, and contentious; and to one of these heads all questions will return: and therefore, in all, from holiness we have the best instructions. And this brings me to the next particle of the general consideration. For that which we are taught by the Holy Spirit of God, this new nature, this vital principle within us, it is that which is worth our learning; not vain and empty, idle and insignificant notions, in which when you have laboured till your eyes are fixed in their orbs, and your flesh unfixed from its bones, you are no better and no wiser. If the Spirit of God be your teacher, he will teach you such truths as will make you know and love God, and become like to him, and enjoy him for ever, by passing from similitude to union and eternal fruition. But what are you the better, if any man should pretend to teach you whether every angel makes a species? and what is the individuation of the soul in the state of separation? what are you the wiser, if you should study and find out what place Adam should for ever have lived in, if he had not fallen? and what is any man the more learned, if he hears the disputes, whether Adam should have multiplied children in the state of innocence, and what would have been the event of things, if one child had been born before his father's sin?

Too many scholars have lived upon air and empty notions for many ages past, and troubled themselves with tying and untying knots, like hypochondriacs in a fit of melancholy, thinking of nothing, and troubling themselves with nothing, and falling out about nothings, and being very wise and very learned in things that are not and work not, and were never planted in paradise by the finger of God. Men's notions are too often like the mules, begotten by equivocal and unnatural generations; but they make no species; they are begotten, but they can beget nothing; they are the effects of long study, but they can do no good when they are produced; they are not that which Solomon calls "viam intelligentiæ," "the way of understanding." If the Spirit of God be our teacher, we shall learn to avoid evil, and to do good, to be wise and to be holy, to be profitable and careful; and they that walk in this way, shall find more peace in their consciences, more skill in the Scriptures, more satisfaction in their doubts, than can be obtained by all the polemical and impertinent disputations of the world. And if the Holy Spirit can teach us how vain a thing it is to do foolish things, he also will teach us how vain a thing it is to trouble the world with foolish questions, to disturb the church for interest or pride, to resist government in things indifferent, to spend the people's zeal in things unprofitable, to make religion to consist in outsides, and opposition to circumstances, and trifling regards. No, no; the man that is wise, he that is conducted by the Spirit of God,—knows better in what Christ's kingdom does consist, than to throw away his time and interest, and peace and safety—for what? for religion? no: for the body of religion? not so much: for the garment of the body of religion? no, not for so much; but for the fringes of the garment of the body of religion; for such, and no better, are the disputes that trouble our discontented brethren; they are things, or rather circumstances and manners of things, in which the soul and spirit is not at all concerned.

3. Holiness of life is the best way of finding out truth and understanding; not only as a natural medium, nor only as a prudent medium, but as a means by way of Divine blessing. "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me; and he that loveth me, shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him."[p] Here we have a promise for it; and upon that we may rely.

[p] John xiv. 21.

The old man that confuted the Arian priest by a plain recital of his creed, found a mighty power of God effecting his own work by a strange manner, and by a very plain instrument; it wrought a Divine blessing just as sacraments use to do; and this lightening sometimes comes in a strange manner, as a peculiar blessing to good men. For God kept the secrets of his kingdom from the wise heathens and the learned Jews, revealing them to babes; not because they had less learning, but because they had more love; they were children and babes in malice; they loved Christ, and so he became to them a light and a glory. St. Paul had more learning than they all; and Moses was instructed in all the learning of the Egyptians; yet because he was the meekest man upon earth, he was also the wisest; and to his human learning, in which he was excellent, he had a Divine light and excellent wisdom superadded to him, by way of spiritual blessings. And St. Paul, though he went very far to the knowledge of many great and excellent truths by the force of human learning, yet he was far short of perfective truth and true wisdom, till he learned a new lesson in a new school, at the feet of one greater than his Gamaliel: his learning grew much greater, his notions brighter, his skill deeper, —by the love of Christ, and his desires, his passionate desires after Jesus.

The force and use of human learning, and of this Divine learning I am now speaking of, are both well expressed by the prophet Isaiah; "And the vision of all is become unto you as the words of a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot, for it is sealed. And the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee; and he saith, I am not learned."[q] He that is no learned man, who is not bred up in the schools of the prophets, cannot read God's book for want of learning. For human learning is the gate and first entrance of Divine vision; not the only one indeed, but the common gate. But beyond this, there must be another learning; for he that is learned, bring the book to him, and you are not much the better as to the secret part of it, if the book be sealed, if his eyes be closed, if his heart be not opened, if God does not speak to him in the secret way of discipline. Human learning is an excellent foundation; but the top-stone is laid by love and conformity to the will of God. For we may further observe, that blindness, error, and ignorance, are the punishments which God sends upon wicked and ungodly men. "Etiamsi propter nostræ intelligentiæ tarditatem et vitæ demeritum, veritas nondum se apertissime ostenderit," was St. Austin's expression: "The truth hath not yet been manifested fully to us, by reason of our demerits:" our sins have hindered the brightness of the truth from shining upon us. And St. Paul observes, that when the heathens gave themselves "over to lusts, God gave them over to strong delusions, and to believe a lie."[r] But "God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy," said the wise preacher.[s] But this is most expressly promised in the New Testament, and particularly in that admirable sermon, which our blessed Saviour preached a little before his death: "The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things."[t] Well, there is our teacher told of plainly: but how shall we obtain this teacher, and how shall we be taught? Christ will pray for us that we may have this Spirit.[u] That is well: but shall all christians have the Spirit? Yes, all that will live like christians: for so said Christ, "If ye love me, keep my commandments; and I will pray the Father, and he will give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him." Mark these things. The Spirit of God is our teacher:—he will abide with us for ever to be our teacher:—he will teach us all things;—but how? "If ye love Christ," if ye keep his commandments, but not else: if ye be of the world, that is, of worldly affections, ye cannot see him, ye cannot know him. And this is the particular I am now to speak to; the way by which the Spirit of God teaches us in all the ways and secrets of God, is love and holiness.

"Secreta Dei Deo nostro et filiis domus ejus," "God's secrets are to himself and the sons of his house," saith the Jewish proverb. Love is the great instrument of Divine knowledge, that is the ὕψωμα τῶν διδασκομένων, "the height of all that is to be taught or learned." Love is obedience, and we learn his words best when we practise them; Ἃ γὰρ δεῖ μανθάνοντας ποιεῖν, ταῦτα ποιοῦντες μανθάνομεν, said Aristotle;[x] "those things which they that learn ought to practise,—even while they practise they will best learn."—"Quisquis non venit, profectò nec didicit: ita enim Dominus docet per Spiritûs gratiam, ut quod quisque didicerit, non tantum cognoscendo videat, sed etiam volendo appetat et agendo perficiat;" St. Austin:[y] "Unless we come to Christ, we shall never learn: for so our blessed Lord teaches us by the grace of his Spirit, that what any one learns, he not only sees it by knowledge, but desires it by choice, and perfects it by practice."

4. When this is reduced to practice and experience, we find not only in things of practice, but even in deepest mysteries, not only the choicest and most eminent saints, but even every good man can best tell what is true, and best reprove an error.

He that goes about to speak of and to understand the mysterious Trinity, and does it by words and names of man's invention, or by such which signify contingently, if he reckons this mystery by the mythology of numbers, by the cabala of letters, by the distinctions of the school, and by the weak inventions of disputing people; if he only talks of essences and existences, hypostasies and personalities, distinctions without difference, and priority in coequalities, and unity in pluralities, and of superior predicates of no larger extent than the inferior subjects;—he may amuse himself, and find his understanding will be like St. Peter's upon the mount of Tabor at the transfiguration: he may build three tabernacles in his head, and talk something, but he knows not what. But the good man that feels the "power of the Father," and he to whom "the Son" is become "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption;" he in "whose heart the love of the Spirit of God is spread;" to whom God hath communicated the "Holy Ghost, the Comforter;"—this man, though he understands nothing of that which is unintelligible, yet he only understands the mysteriousness of the holy Trinity. No man can be convinced well and wisely of the article of the holy, blessed, and undivided Trinity, but he that feels the mightiness of "the Father begetting him to a new life," the wisdom of "the Son building him up in a most holy faith," and the "love of the Spirit of God making him to become like unto God."

He that hath passed from his childhood in grace, under the spiritual generation of the Father, and is gone forward to be a young man in Christ, strong and vigorous in holy actions and holy undertakings, and from thence is become an old disciple, and strong and grown old in religion, and the conversation of the Spirit; this man best understands the secret and undiscernible economy, he feels this unintelligible mystery, and sees with his heart what his tongue can never express, and his metaphysics can never prove. In these cases faith and love are the best knowledge, and Jesus Christ is best known by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; and if the kingdom of God be in us, then we know God, and are known of him; and when we communicate of the Spirit of God, when we pray for him, and have received him, and entertained him, and dwelt with him, and warmed ourselves by his holy fires,—then we know him too: but there is no other satisfactory knowledge of the blessed Trinity but this: and, therefore, whatever thing is spoken of God metaphysically, there is no knowing of God theologically, and as he ought to be known, but by the measures of holiness, and the proper light of the Spirit of God.

But in this case experience is the best learning, and christianity is the best institution, and the Spirit of God is the best teacher, and holiness is the greatest wisdom; and he that sins most, is the most ignorant,—and the humble and obedient man is the best scholar: "For the Spirit of God is a loving Spirit, and will not enter into a polluted soul: but he that keepeth the law, getteth the understanding thereof; and the perfection of the fear of the Lord is wisdom," said the wise Ben-Sirach.[z] And now give me leave to apply the doctrine to you, and so I shall dismiss you from this attention.

Many ways have been attempted to reconcile the differences of the church in matters of religion, and all the counsels of man have yet proved ineffective: let us now try God's method, let us betake ourselves to live holily, and then the Spirit of God will lead us into all truth. And indeed—it matters not what religion any man is of, if he be a villain;—the opinion of his sect, as it will not save his soul, so neither will it do good to the public: but this is a sure rule, if the holy man best understands wisdom and religion, then by the proportions of holiness we shall best measure the doctrines, that are obtruded to the disturbance of our peace, and the dishonour of the gospel. And, therefore,

1. That is no good religion, whose principles destroy any duty of religion. He that shall maintain it to be lawful to make a war for the defence of his opinion, be it what it will, his doctrine is against godliness. Any thing that is proud, any thing that is peevish and scornful, any thing that is uncharitable, is against the ὑγιαίνουσα διδασκαλία, that "form of sound doctrine" which the apostle speaks of. And I remember that Ammianus Marcellinus, telling of George, a proud and factious minister, that he was an informer against his brethren, he says, he did it "oblitus professionis suæ, quæ nil nisi justum suadet et lene;" "He forgot his profession, which teaches nothing but justice and meekness, kindnesses and charity."—And however Bellarmine and others are pleased to take but indirect and imperfect notice of it, yet goodness is the best note of the church.

2. It is but an ill sign of holiness when a man is busy in troubling himself and his superior in little scruples and fantastic opinions, about things not concerning the life of religion, or the pleasure of God, or the excellencies of the Spirit. A good man knows how to please God, how to converse with him, how to advance the kingdom of the Lord Jesus, to set forward holiness, and the love of God and of his brother; and he knows also that there is no godliness in spending our time and our talk, our heart and our spirits, about the garments and outsides of religion: and they can ill teach others, that do not know that religion does not consist in these things; but obedience may, and reductively that is religion: and he that, for that which is no part of religion, destroys religion directly, by neglecting that duty that is adopted into religion,—is a man of fancy and of the world; but he gives but an ill account, that he is a man of God and a son of the Spirit.

Spend not your time in that which profits not; for your labour and your health, your time and your studies are very valuable; and it is a thousand pities to see a diligent and a hopeful person spend himself in gathering cockle-shells and little pebbles, in telling sands upon the shores, and making garlands of useless daisies. Study that which is profitable, that which will make you useful to churches and commonwealths, that which will make you desirable and wise. Only I shall add this to you, that in learning there are variety of things, as well as in religion: there is mint and cummin, and there are the weighty things of the law: so there are studies more and less useful, and every thing that is useful will be required in its time: and I may in this also use the words of our blessed Saviour, "These things ought you to look after, and not to leave the other unregarded." But your great care is to be in the things of God and of religion, in holiness and true wisdom, remembering the saying of Origen, "That the knowledge that arises from goodness is θειότερόν τι πάσης ἀποδείξεως, 'something that is more certain and more divine than all demonstration,' than all other learnings of the word."

3. That is no good religion that disturbs government, or shakes a foundation of public peace. Kings and bishops are the foundations and the great principles of unity, of peace, and government; like Rachel and Leah, they build up the house of Israel: and those blind Samsons that shake these pillars, intend to pull the house down. "My son, fear God and the king," saith Solomon; "and meddle not with them that are given to change." That is not truth that loves changes; and the new nothings of heretical and schismatical preachers are infinitely far from the blessings of truth.

In the holy language, truth hath a mysterious name, אמת "emet;" it consists of three letters, the first and the last and the middlemost of the Hebrew letters; implying to us, that truth is first, and will be last, and it is the same all the way, and combines and unites all extremes; it ties all ends together.—"Truth is lasting, and ever full of blessing:"—For the Jews observe that those letters which signify truth, are both in the figure and the number quadrate, firm, and cubical; these signify a foundation, and an abode for ever. Whereas, on the other side, the word which in Hebrew signifies a lie, שחר "secher," is made of letters whose numbers are imperfect, and their figure pointed and voluble; to signify that a lie hath no foundation.

And this very observation will give good light in our questions and disputes: and I give my instance in episcopal government, which hath been of so lasting an abode, of so long a blessing, hath its firmament by the principles of christianity, hath been blest by the issues of that stabiliment; it hath for sixteen hundred years combined with monarchy, and hath been taught by the Spirit which hath so long dwelt in God's church, and hath now—according to the promise of Jesus, that says, "the gates of hell shall never prevail against the church"—been restored amongst us by a heap of miracles; and as it went away, so now it is returned again in the hand of monarchy, and in the bosom of our fundamental laws. Now that doctrine must needs be suspected of error, and an intolerable lie, that speaks against this truth, which hath had so long a testimony from God, and from the wisdom and experience of so many ages, of all our ancestors, and all our laws.

When the Spirit of God wrote in Greek, Christ is called A and Ω; if he had spoken Hebrew, he had been called א and ת, that is, אמת "emet;" he is "truth," "the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever:" and whoever opposes this holy sanction, which Christ's Spirit hath sanctified, his word hath warranted, his blessings have endeared, his promises have ratified, and his church hath always kept; he fights against this אמת "emet," and "secher" is his portion; his lot is a "lie;" his portion is there, where holiness can never dwell.

And now to conclude: to you, fathers and brethren, you who are or intend to be of the clergy; you see here the best compendium of your studies, the best abbreviature of your labours, the truest method of wisdom, and the infallible, the only way of judging concerning the disputes and questions in christendom. It is not by reading multitudes of books, but by studying the truth of God: it is not by laborious commentaries of the doctors that you can finish your work, but by the expositions of the Spirit of God: it is not by the rules of metaphysics, but by the proportions of holiness: and when all books are read, and all arguments examined, and all authorities alleged, nothing can be found to be true that is unholy. "Give yourselves to reading, to exhortation, and to doctrine," saith St. Paul. Read all good books you can; but exhortation unto good life is the best instrument, and the best teacher of true doctrine, of that which is "according to godliness."

And let me tell you this, the great learning of the fathers was more owing to their piety than to their skill; more to God than to themselves: and to this purpose is that excellent ejaculation of St. Chrysostom,[a] with which I will conclude: "O blessed and happy men, whose names are in the book of life, from whom the devils fled, and heretics did fear them, who (by holiness) have stopped the mouths of them that spake perverse things! But I, like David, will cry out, 'Where are thy loving-kindnesses which have been ever of old?' Where is the blessed quire of bishops and doctors, who shined like lights in the world, and contained the word of life? 'Dulce est meminisse;' 'their very memory is pleasant.' Where is that Evodias, the sweet savour of the church, the successor and imitator of the holy apostles? Where is Ignatius, in whom God dwelt? Where is St. Dionysius the Areopagite, that bird of Paradise, that celestial eagle? Where is Hippolytus, that good man, ἀνὴρ χρηστὸς, 'that gentle sweet person?' Where is great St. Basil, a man almost equal to the apostles? Where is Athanasius, rich in virtue? Where is Gregory Nyssen, that great divine? And Ephrem the great Syrian, that stirred up the sluggish, and awakened the sleepers, and comforted the afflicted, and brought the young men to discipline; the looking-glass of the religious, the captain of the penitents, the destruction of heresies, the receptacle of graces, the habitation of the Holy Ghost?" These were the men that prevailed against error, because they lived according to truth: and whoever shall oppose you, and the truth you walk by, may better be confuted by your lives than by your disputations. Let your adversaries have no evil thing to say of you, and then you will best silence them: for all heresies and false doctrines are but like Myron's counterfeit cow, it deceived none but beasts; and these can cozen none but the wicked and the negligent, them that love a lie, and live according to it. But if ye become burning and shining lights; if ye do not detain the truth in unrighteousness; if ye walk in light, and live in the Spirit; your doctrines will be true, and that truth will prevail. But if ye live wickedly and scandalously, every little schismatic shall put you to shame, and draw disciples after him, and abuse your flocks, and feed them with colocynths and hemlock, and place heresy in the chairs appointed for your religion.

I pray God give you all grace to follow this wisdom, to study this learning, to labour for the understanding of godliness; so your time and your studies, your persons and your labours, will be holy and useful, sanctified and blessed, beneficial to men and pleasing to God, through him who is the wisdom of the Father, who is made to all that love him wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: "To whom with the Father," &c.

PREACHED

IN CHRIST'S CHURCH, DUBLIN,

AT THE FUNERAL

OF THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

JOHN

LATE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH, AND PRIMATE OF ALL IRELAND,

July 16, 1663:

WITH A SUCCINCT NARRATIVE OF HIS WHOLE LIFE.

But every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming.—1 Cor. xv. 23.

THE condition of man, in this world, is so limited and depressed, so relative and imperfect, that the best things he does, he does weakly,—and the best things he hath, are imperfections in their very constitution. I need not tell how little it is that we know: the greatest indication of this is, that we can never tell how many things we know not; and we may soon span our own knowledge, but our ignorance we can never fathom. Our very will, in which mankind pretends to be most noble and imperial, is a direct state of imperfection; and our very liberty of choosing good and evil is permitted to us, not to make us proud, but to make us humble; for it supposes weakness of reason and weakness of love. For if we understood all the degrees of amability in the service of God, or if we had such love to God as he deserves, and so perfect a conviction as were fit for his services, we could no more deliberate: for liberty of will is like the motion of a magnetic needle toward the north, full of trembling and uncertainty till it were fixed in the beloved point; it wavers as long as it is free, and is at rest when it can choose no more. And truly what is the hope of man? It is indeed the resurrection of the soul in this world from sorrow and her saddest pressures, and like the twilight to the day, and the harbinger of joy; but still it is but a conjugation of infirmities, and proclaims our present calamity, only because it is uneasy here, it thrusts us forward toward the light and glories of the resurrection.

For as a worm creeping with her belly on the ground, with her portion and share of Adam's curse, lifts up its head to partake a little of the blessings of the air, and opens the junctures of her imperfect body, and curls her little rings into knots and combinations, drawing up her tail to a neighbourhood of the head's pleasure and motion; but still it must return to abide the fate of its own nature, and dwell and sleep upon the dust: so are the hopes of a mortal man; he opens his eyes, and looks upon fine things at distance, and shuts them again with weakness, because they are too glorious to behold; and the man rejoices because he hopes fine things are staying for him; but his heart aches, because he knows there are a thousand ways to fail and miss of those glories; and though he hopes, yet he enjoys not; he longs, but he possesses not, and must be content with his portion of dust; and being "a worm, and no man," must lie down in this portion, before he can receive the end of his hopes, the salvation of his soul in the resurrection of the dead. For as death is the end of our lives, so is the resurrection the end of our hopes; and as we die daily, so we daily hope: but death, which is the end of our life, is the enlargement of our spirits from hope to certainty, from uncertain fears to certain expectations, from the death of the body to the life of the soul; that is, to partake of the light and life of Christ, to rise to life as he did; for his resurrection is the beginning of ours: he died for us alone, not for himself; but he rose again for himself and us too. So that if he did rise, so shall we; the resurrection shall be universal; good and bad, all shall rise, but not altogether: first Christ, then we that are Christ's; and yet there is a third resurrection, though not spoken of here; but thus it shall be, "The dead of Christ shall rise first;" that is, next to Christ; and after them, the wicked shall rise to condemnation.

So that you see here is the sum of affairs treated of in my text: not whether it be lawful to eat a tortoise or a mushroom, or to tread with the foot bare upon the ground within the octaves of Easter. It is not here inquired, whether angels be material or immaterial; or whether the dwellings of dead infants be within the air or in the regions of the earth? the inquiry here is, whether we are to be christians or no? whether we are to live good lives or no? or whether it be permitted to us to live with lust or covetousness, acted with all the daughters of rapine and ambition? whether there be any such thing as sin, any judicatory for consciences, any rewards of piety, any difference of good and bad, any rewards after this life? This is the design of these words by proper interpretation: for if men shall die like dogs and sheep, they will certainly live like wolves and foxes; but he that believes the article of the resurrection, hath entertained the greatest demonstration in the world, that nothing can make us happy but the knowledge of God, and conformity to the life and death of the holy Jesus. Here, therefore, are the great hinges of all religion: 1. Christ is already risen from the dead. 2. We also shall rise in God's time and our order. Christ is the first-fruits. But there shall be a full harvest of the resurrection, and all shall rise. My text speaks only of the resurrection of the just, of them that belong to Christ; explicitly, I say, of these; and, therefore, directly of resurrection to life eternal. But because he also says there shall be an order for every man; and yet every man does not belong to Christ; therefore, indirectly also, he implies the more universal resurrection unto judgment: but this shall be the last thing that shall be done; for, according to the proverb of the Jews, Michael flies but with one wing, and Gabriel with two: God is quick in sending angels of peace, and they fly apace; but the messengers of wrath come slowly: God is more hasty to glorify his servants than to condemn the wicked. And, therefore, in the story of Dives and Lazarus, we find that the beggar died first; the good man, Lazarus, was first taken away from his misery to his comfort, and afterwards the rich man died; and as the good, many times, die first, so all of them rise first, as if it were a matter of haste: and as the mother's breasts swell and shoot, and long to give food to her babe, so God's bowels did yearn over his banished children, and he longs to cause them to eat and drink in his kingdom. And at last the wicked shall rise unto condemnation, for that must be done too; every man in his own order: first Christ, then Christ's servants, and, at last, Christ's enemies. The first of these is the great ground of our faith; the second is the consummation of all our hopes: the first is the foundation of God, that stands sure; the second is that superstructure that shall never perish: by the first we believe in God unto righteousness; by the second we live in God unto salvation: but the third, for that also is true, and must be considered, is the great affrightment of all them that live ungodly. But in the whole, Christ's resurrection and ours is the A and Ω of a christian; that as "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, and to-day, and the same for ever," so may we in Christ become the morrow of the resurrection, the same or better than yesterday in our natural life; the same body and the same soul, tied together in the same essential union, with this only difference, that not nature, but grace and glory, with an hermetic seal, give us a new signature, whereby we shall no more be changed, but like unto Christ our Head, we shall become the same for ever. Of these I shall discourse in order. 1. That Christ, who is "the first-fruits," is the first in this order: he is already risen from the dead. 2. We shall all take our turns, we shall die, and, as sure as death, we shall all rise again. And, 3. This very order is effective of the thing itself. That Christ is first risen, is the demonstration and certainty of ours; for because there is an order in this economy, the first in the kind is the measure of the rest. If Christ be the first-fruits, we are the whole vintage; and we shall all die in the order of nature, and shall rise again in the order of Christ: "They that are Christ's," and are found so "at his coming," shall partake of his resurrection. But Christ first, then they that are Christ's: that is the order.

1. Christ is the first-fruits; he is already risen from the dead: for he alone could not be held by death. "Free among the dead."

> Φρίξεν σε γέρων τότε
> Αἰδὴς ὁ παλαιγενὴς
> Καὶ λαοβόρος κύων
> Ἀνεχάσατο βηλοῦ. SYNES. 6. Hym.

Death was sin's eldest daughter, and the grave-clothes were her first mantle; but Christ was Conqueror over both, and came to take that away, and to disarm this. This was a glory fit for the Head of mankind, but it was too great and too good to be easily believed by incredulous and weak-hearted man. It was at first doubted by all that were concerned; but they that saw it had no reason to doubt any longer. But what is that to us, who saw it not? Yes, very much: "Valde dubitatum est ab illis, ne dubitaretur à nobis," saith St. Austin; "They doubted very much, that, by their confirmation, we might be established, and doubt no more." Mary Magdalene saw him first, and she ran with joy, and said "she had seen the Lord, and that he was risen from the dead; but they believed her not:—After that, divers women together saw him," and they told it, but had no thanks for their pains, and obtained no credit among the disciples: the two disciples that went to Emmaus, saw him, talked with him, ate with him, and they ran and told it: they told true, but nobody believed them: then St. Peter saw him, but he was not yet got into the chair of the catholic church, they did not think him infallible, and so they believed him not at all. Five times in one day he appeared; for after all this, he appeared to the eleven; they were indeed transported with joy and wonder; but they would scarce believe their own eyes, and though they saw him, they doubted. Well, all this was not enough; he was seen also of James, and suffered Thomas to thrust his hand into his side, and appeared to St. Paul, and was seen by "five hundred brethren at once." So that there is no capacity of mankind, no time, no place, but had an ocular demonstration of his resurrection. He appeared to men and women, to the clergy and the laity, to sinners of both sexes; to weak men and to criminals, to doubters and deniers at home and abroad, in public and in private, in their houses and their journeys, unexpected and by appointment, betimes in the morning and late at night, to them in conjunction and to them in dispersion, when they did look for him and when they did not; he appeared upon earth to many, and to St. Paul and to St. Stephen from heaven; so that we can require no greater testimony then all these are able to give us; and they saw for themselves and for us too, that the faith and certainty of the resurrection of Jesus might be conveyed to all that shall die, and follow Christ in their own order.

Now this being matter of fact, cannot be supposed infinite, but limited to time and place, and, therefore, to be proved by them who, at that time, were upon the place; good men and true, simple and yet losers by the bargain, many and united, confident and constant, preaching it all their life, and stoutly maintaining it at their death; men that would not deceive others, and men that could not be deceived themselves, in a matter so notorious, and so proved, and so seen: and if this be not sufficient credibility in a matter of fact, as this was, then we can have no story credibly transmitted to us, no records kept, no acts of courts, no narratives of the days of old, no traditions of our fathers, no memorials of them in the third generation. Nay, if from these we have not sufficient causes and arguments of faith, how shall we be able to know the will of Heaven upon earth? unless God do not only tell it once, but always, and not only always to some men, but always to all men: for if some men must believe others, they can never do it in any thing more reasonably than in this; and if we may not trust them in this, then, without a perpetual miracle, no man could have faith; for faith could never come by hearing, by nothing but by seeing. But if there be any use of history, any faith in men, any honesty in manners, any truth in human intercourse; if there be any use of apostles or teachers, of ambassadors or letters, of ears or hearing; if there be any such thing as the grace of faith, that is less than demonstration or intuition; then we may be as sure that Christ, the first-fruits, is already risen, as all these credibilities can make us. But let us take heed; as God hates a lie, so he hates incredulity; an obstinate, a foolish, and pertinacious understanding. What we do every minute of our lives, in matters of little and great concernment, if we refuse to do it in religion, which yet is to be conducted, as all human affairs are, by human instruments, and arguments of persuasion proper to the nature of the thing, it is an obstinacy as cross to human reason, as it is to Divine faith.

But this article was so clearly proved, that presently it came to pass that men were no longer ashamed of the cross, but it was worn upon breasts, printed in the air, drawn upon foreheads, carried upon banners, put upon crowns imperial; presently it came to pass that the religion of the despised Jesus did infinitely prevail; a religion that taught men to be meek and humble, apt to receive injuries, but unapt to do any; a religion that gave countenance to the poor and pitiful, in a time when riches were adored, and ambition and pleasure had possessed the heart of all mankind; a religion that would change the face of things, and the hearts of men, and break vile habits into gentleness and counsel; that such a religion, in such a time, by the sermons and conduct of fishermen, men of mean breeding and illiberal arts, should so speedily triumph over the philosophy of the world, and the arguments of the subtle, and the sermons of the eloquent; the power of princes and the interests of states, the inclinations of nature and the blindness of zeal, the force of custom and the solicitation of passions, the pleasures of sin and the busy arts of the devil; that is, against wit and power, superstition and wilfulness, fame and money, nature and empire, which are all the causes in this world that can make a thing impossible; this, this is to be ascribed to the power of God, and is the great demonstration of the resurrection of Jesus. Every thing was an argument for it, and improved it; no objection could hinder it, no enemies destroy it; whatsoever was for them, it made the religion to increase; whatsoever was against them, made it to increase; sun-shine and storms, fair weather or foul, it was all one as to the event of things: for they were instruments in the hands of God, who could make what himself should choose to be the product of any cause; so that if the christians had peace, they went abroad and brought in converts: if they had no peace but persecution, the converts came in to them. In prosperity, they allured and enticed the world by the beauty of holiness; in affliction and trouble, they amazed all men with the splendour of their innocence and the glories of their patience; and quickly it was that the world became disciple to the glorious Nazarene, and men could no longer doubt of the resurrection of Jesus, when it became so demonstrated by the certainty of them that saw it, and the courage of them that died for it, and the multitude of them that believed it; who, by their sermons and their actions, by their public offices and discourses, by festivals and eucharists, by arguments of experience and sense, by reason and religion, by persuading rational men, and establishing believing christians, by their living in the obedience of Jesus, and dying for the testimony of Jesus, have greatly advanced his kingdom, and his power, and his glory, into which he entered after his resurrection from the dead. For he is the first-fruits; and if we hope to rise through him, we must confess that himself is first risen from the dead. That is the first particular.

2. There is an order for us also: we also shall rise again:

> Combustusque senex tumulo procedit adultus;
> Consumens dat membra rogus;———

The ashes of old Camillus shall stand up spritely from his urn; and the funeral fires shall produce a new warmth to the dead bones of all those, who died under the arms of all the enemies of the Roman greatness. This is a less wonder than the former; for "admonetur omnis ætas jam fieri posse quod aliquando factum est." If it was done once, it may be done again: for since it could never have been done but by a Power that is infinite, that infinite must also be eternal and indeficient. By the same almighty Power, which restored life to the dead body of our living Lord, we may all be restored to a new life in the resurrection of the dead.

When man was not, what power, what causes made him to be? Whatsoever it was, it did then as great a work as to raise his body to the same being again; and because we know not the method of nature's secret changes, and how we can be fashioned beneath "in secreto terræ," and cannot handle and discern the possibilities and seminal powers in the ashes of dissolved bones, must our ignorance in philosophy be put in balance against the articles of religion, the hopes of mankind, the faith of nations, and the truth of God? And are our opinions of the power of God so low, that our understanding must be his measure; and he shall be confessed to do nothing, unless it be made plain in our philosophy? Certainly we have a low opinion of God, unless we believe he can do more things than we can understand; but let us hear St. Paul's demonstration; if the corn dies and lives again; if it lays its body down, suffers alteration, dissolution, and death,—but at the spring, rises again in the verdure of a leaf, in the fulness of the ear, in the kidneys of wheat; if it proceeds from little to great, from nakedness to ornament, from emptiness to plenty, from unity to multitude, from death to life: be a Sadducee no more, shame not thy understanding, and reproach not the weakness of thy faith, by thinking that corn can be restored to life, and man cannot; especially since in every creature, the obediential capacity is infinite, and cannot admit degrees; for every creature can be any thing under the power of God, which cannot be less than infinite.

But we find no obscure footsteps of this mystery even amongst the heathens: Pliny reports that Apion the grammarian, by the use of the plant osiris, called Homer from his grave; and in Valerius Maximus we find that Ælius Tubero returned to life, when he was seated in his funeral pile; and in Plutarch, that Soleus, after three days' burial, did live; and in Valerius, that Eris Pamphylius did so after ten days.[z] And it was so commonly believed that Glaucus, who was choked in a vessel of honey, did rise again, that it grew to a proverb: "Glaucus, poto melle, surrexit;" "Glaucus, having tasted honey, died and lived again." I pretend not to believe these stories to be true; but from these instances it may be concluded, that they believed it possible that there should be a resurrection from the dead; and natural reason, and their philosophy, did not wholly destroy their hopes and expectation to have a portion in this article.

For God, knowing that the great hopes of man, that the biggest endearment of religion, the sanction of private justice, the band of piety and holy courage,—does wholly derive from the article of the resurrection,—was pleased not only to make it credible, but easy and familiar to us; and so we converse every night with the image of death, that every morning we find an argument of the resurrection. Sleep and death have but one mother, and they have one name in common.

> Soles occidere et redire possunt;
> Nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux,
> Nox est perpetua una dormienda. CATULL.

Charnel-houses are but κοιμητήρια, "cemeteries" or sleeping-places; and they that die, are fallen asleep, and the resurrection is but an awakening and standing up from sleep: but in sleep our senses are as fast bound by nature, as our joints are by the grave-clothes; and unless an angel of God awaken us every morning, we must confess ourselves as unable to converse with men, as we now are afraid to die and to converse with spirits. But, however, death itself is no more; it is but darkness and a shadow, a rest and a forgetfulness. What is there more in death? What is there less in sleep? For do we not see by experience that nothing of equal loudness does awaken us sooner than a man's voice, especially if he be called by name? and thus also it shall be in the resurrection: we shall be awakened by the voice of a man, and he that called Lazarus by name from his grave, shall also call us: for although St. Paul affirms, "that the trumpet shall sound, and there shall be the voice of an archangel;" yet this is not a word of nature, but of office and ministry: Christ himself is that archangel, and he shall "descend with a mighty shout," saith the apostle;[a] "and all that are in the grave shall hear his voice," saith St. John:[b] so that we shall be awakened by the voice of a man, because we are only fallen asleep by the decree of God; and when the cock and the lark calls us up to prayer and labour, the first thing we see is an argument of our resurrection from the dead. And when we consider what the Greek church reports,—that amongst them the bodies of those that die excommunicate, will not return to dust till the censure be taken off;—we may, with a little faith and reason, believe, that the same power that keeps them from their natural dissolution, can recall them to life and union. will not now insist upon the story of the rising bones seen every year in Egypt, nor the pretences of the chemists, that they, from the ashes of flowers, can reproduce, from the same materials, the same beauties in colour and figure; for he that proves a certain truth from an uncertain argument, is like him that wears a wooden leg, when he hath two sound legs already; it hinders his going, but helps him not: the truth of God stands not in need of such supporters; nature alone is a sufficient preacher:

> Quæ nunc herba fuit, lignum jacet, herba futura,
> Aeriæ nudantur aves cum penna vetusta,
> Et nova subvestit reparatas pluma volucres.[c]

Night and day; the sun returning to the same point of east; every change of species in the same matter; generation and corruption; the eagle renewing her youth, and the snake her skin; the silk-worm and the swallows; the care of posterity, and the care of an immortal name; winter and summer; the fall and spring; the Old Testament and the New; the words of Job; and the visions of the prophets; the prayer of Ezekiel for the resurrection of the men of Ephraim; and the return of Jonas from the whale's belly; the histories of the Jews and the narratives of christians; the faith of believers and the philosophy of the reasonable;—all join in the verification of this mystery. And amongst these heaps, it is not of the least consideration, that there was never any good man, who having been taught this article, but if he served God, he also relied upon this. If he believed God, he believed this; and therefore St. Paul says, that they who were ἐλπίδα μὴ ἔχοντες, were also ἄθεοι ἐν κόσμῳ, "they who had no hope" (meaning of the resurrection) "were also atheists, and without God in the world." And it is remarkable what St. Austin observes, that when the world saw the righteous Abel destroyed, and that the murderer outlived his crime, and built up a numerous family, and grew mighty upon earth,—they neglected the service of God upon that account, till God, in pity of their prejudice and foolish arguings, took Enoch up to heaven to recover them from their impieties, by showing them that their bodies and souls should be rewarded for ever in an eternal union. But Christ, the first-fruits, is gone before, and himself did promise, that when himself was lifted up, he would draw all men after him: "Every man in his own order; first Christ, then they that are Christ's at his coming."—And so I have done with the second particular; not Christ only, but we also shall rise in God's time and our order.

But concerning this order I must speak a word or two, not only for the fuller handling the text, but because it will be matter of application of what hath been already spoken of the article of the resurrection.

3. First Christ, and then we; and we, therefore, because Christ is already risen: but you must remember, that the resurrection and exaltation of Christ was the reward of his perfect obedience and purest holiness; and he calling us to an imitation of the same obedience, and the same perfect holiness, prepares a way for us to the same resurrection. If we, by holiness, become the sons of God, as Christ was, we shall also, as he was, become the sons of God in the resurrection: but upon no other terms. So said our blessed Lord himself: "Ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon thrones judging the tribes of Israel."[d] For as it was with Christ the first-fruits, so it shall be with all christians in their own order: as with the head, so it shall be with the members. He was the Son of God by love and obedience, and then became the Son of God by resurrection from the dead to life eternal, and so shall we; but we cannot be so in any other way. To them that are Christ's, and to none else, shall this be given: for we must know that God hath sent Christ into the world to be a great example and demonstration of the economy and dispensation of eternal life. As God brought Christ to glory, so he will bring us, but by no other method. He first obeyed the will of God, and patiently suffered the will of God; he died and rose again, and entered into glory; and so must we. Thus Christ is made "via, veritas, et vita," "the way, the truth, and the life;" that is, the true way to eternal life: he first trod this winepress, and we must insist in the same steps, or we shall never partake of this blessed resurrection. He was made the Son of God in a most glorious manner, and we by him, by his merit, by his grace, and by his example; but other than this there is no way of salvation for us: that is the first and great effect of this glorious order.

4. But there is one thing more in it yet: "Every man in his own order; first Christ, and then they that are Christ's:" but what shall become of them that are not Christ's? why there is an order for them too: first, "they that are Christ's; and then they that are not his:" "Blessed and holy is he that hath his part in the first resurrection:"[e] there is a first and a second resurrection even after this life; "The dead in Christ shall rise first:"[f] now blessed are they that have their portion here; "for upon these the second death shall have no power." As for the recalling the wicked from their graves, it is no otherwise in the sense of the Spirit to be called a resurrection, than taking a criminal from the prison to the bar is a giving of liberty. When poor Attilius Aviola had been seized on by an apoplexy, his friends, supposing him dead, carried him to his funeral pile; but when the fire began to approach, and the heat to warm the body, he revived, and seeing himself encircled with funeral flames, called out aloud to his friends to rescue, not the dead, but the living Aviola from that horrid burning: but it could not be, he only was restored from his sickness to fall into death, and from his dull disease to a sharp and intolerable torment.[g] Just so shall the wicked live again; they shall receive their souls, that they may be a portion for devils; they shall receive their bodies, that they may feel the everlasting burning; they shall see Christ, that they may "look on him whom they have pierced;" and they shall hear the voice of God passing upon them the intolerable sentence; they shall come from their graves, that they may go into hell; and live again, that they may die for ever. So have we seen a poor condemned criminal, the weight of whose sorrows, sitting heavily upon his soul, hath benumbed him into a deep sleep, till he hath forgotten his groans, and laid aside his deep sighings; but, on a sudden, comes the messenger of death, and unbinds the poppy garland, scatters the heavy cloud that encircled his miserable head, and makes him return to acts of life, that he may quickly descend into death and be no more. So is every sinner that lies down in shame, and makes his grave with the wicked; he shall indeed rise again, and be called upon by the voice of the archangel; but then he shall descend into sorrows greater than the reason and the patience of a man, weeping and shrieking louder than the groans of the miserable children in the valley of Hinnom.

These, indeed, are sad stories, but true as the voice of God, and the sermons of the holy Jesus. They are God's words, and God's decrees; and I wish that all who profess the belief of these, would consider sadly what they mean. If ye believe the article of the resurrection, then you know, that, in your body, you shall receive what you did in the body, whether it be good or bad. It matters not now very much, whether our bodies be beauteous or deformed; for if we glorify God in our bodies, God shall make our bodies glorious. It matters not much, whether we live in ease and pleasure, or eat nothing but bitter herbs; the body that lies in dust and ashes, that goes stooping and feeble, that lodges at the foot of the cross, and dwells in discipline, shall be feasted at the eternal supper of the Lamb. And ever remember this, that beastly pleasures, and lying lips, and a deceitful tongue, and a heart that sendeth forth proud things, are no good dispositions to a blessed resurrection.

Οὐ καλὸν ἁρμονίην ἀναλύεμεν ἀνθρώποιο.

"It is not good, that in the body we live a life of dissolution, for that is no good harmony with that purpose of glory which God designs the body."

Καὶ τάχα δ' ἐκ γαίης ἐλπίζομεν εἰς φάος ἐλθεῖν, Λείψαν' ἀτοιχομένων· ὀπίσω δὲ θεοὶ τελέθονται,

said Phocylides; "for we hope that from our beds of darkness we shall rise into regions of light, and shall become like unto God:" they shall partake of a resurrection to life; and what this can infer is very obvious: for if it be so hard to believe a resurrection from one death, let us not be dead in trespasses and sins; for a resurrection from two deaths will be harder to be believed, and harder to be effected. But if any of you have lost the life of grace, and so forfeited all your title to a life of glory, betake yourselves to an early and an entire piety, that when, by this first resurrection, you have made this way plain before your face, you may with confidence expect a happy resurrection from your graves: for if it be possible that the Spirit, when it is dead in sin, can arise to a life of righteousness; much more it is easy to suppose, that the body, after death, is capable of being restored again: and this is a consequent of St. Paul's argument: "If, when ye were enemies, ye were reconciled by his death, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life;"[h] plainly declaring, that it is a harder and more wonderful thing for a wicked man to become the friend of God, than for one that is so, to be carried up to heaven and partake of his glory. The first resurrection is certainly the greater miracle: but he that hath risen once, may rise again; and this is as sure as that he that dies once may die again, and die for ever. But he who partakes of the death of Christ by mortification, and of his resurrection by holiness of life and a holy faith, shall, according to the expression of the prophet Isaiah, "Enter into his chamber of death;"[i] when nature and God's decree "shall shut the doors upon him, and there he shall be hidden for a little moment:" but then shall they that dwell in dust awake and sing; with Christ's dead body shall they arise; all shall rise, but "every man in his own order; Christ, the first-fruits, then they that are Christ's at his coming." Amen.

I have now done with my meditation of the resurrection; but we have a new and a sadder subject to consider. It is glorious and brave when a christian contemplates those glories, which stand at the foot of the account of all God's servants; but when we consider, that before all or any thing of this happens, every christian must twice "exuere hominem," "put off the old man," and then lie down in dust and the dishonours of the grave; it is "vinum myrrhatum," there is "myrrh put into our wine;" it is wholesome, but it will allay all our pleasures of that glorious expectation; but no man can escape it. After that the great Cyrus had ruled long in a mighty empire, yet there came a message from heaven, not so sad it may be, yet as decretory as the hand-writing on the wall that arrested his successor Darius, Σὺ σκευάζου, ὦ Κῦρε. ἤδη γὰρ εἰς Ξεοὺς ἄπει, "Prepare thyself, O Cyrus, and then go unto the gods;"[k] he laid aside his tire and his beauteous diadem, and covered his face with a cloth, and in a single linen laid his honoured head in a poor humble grave: and none of us all can avoid this sentence; for if wit and learning, great fame and great experience; if wise notices of things, and an honourable fortune; if courage and skill, if prelacy and an honourable age, if any thing that could give greatness and immunity to a wise and prudent man, could have been put in bar against a sad day, and have gone for good plea, this sad scene of sorrows had not been the entertainment of this assembly. But tell me, where are those great masters, who while they lived, flourished in their studies? "Jam eorum præbendas alii possident, et nescio utrum de iis cogitant;" "other men have got their prebends and their dignities, and who knows whether ever they remember them or no?" While they lived, they seemed nothing; when they are dead, every man for a while speaks of them what they please; and afterwards they are as if they had not been. But the piety of the christian church hath made some little provision towards an artificial immortality for brave and worthy persons; and the friendships which our dead contracted while they were alive, require us to continue a fair memory as long as we can; but they expire in monthly minds, or at most in a faint and declining anniversary;

——— ἐπεὶ φίλος, ὅστις ἑταίρου
Μέμνηται κταμένοιο καὶ ἄχνυται οὐκ ἔτ' ἐόντος.

And we have great reason so to do in this present sad accident of the death of our late most reverend primate, whose death the church of Ireland hath very great reason to deplore; and we have great obligation to remember his very many worthy deeds, done for this poor afflicted and despised church. St. Paul made an excellent funeral oration, as it were instituting a feast of all saints, who all died "having obtained a good report:" and that excellent preacher, in the eleventh chapter of the Hebrews, made a sermon of their commemoration. For since good men, while they are alive, have their conversation in heaven; when they are in heaven, it is also fit that they should, in their good names, live upon earth. And as their great examples are an excellent sermon to the living, and the praising them, when envy and flattery can have no interest to interpose, as it is the best and most vigorous sermon and incentive to great things; so to conceal what good God hath wrought by them, is great unthankfulness to God and to good men.

When Dorcas died, the apostle came to see the dead corpse, and the friends of the deceased expressed their grief and their love, by showing the coats that she, whilst she lived, wrought with her own hands; she was a good needle-woman and a good housewife, and did good to mankind in her little way, and that itself ought not to be forgotten; and the apostle himself was not displeased with their little sermons, and that εὐφήμισμος which the women made upon that sad interview. But if we may have the same liberty to record the worthy things of this our most venerable father and brother, and if there remains no more of that envy which usually obscures the splendour of living heroes; if you can with your charitable though weeping eyes behold the great gifts of God with which he adorned this great prelate, and not object the failings of humanity to the participation of the graces of the Spirit, or think that God's gifts are the less because they are born in earthen vessels, πάντες γὰρ κλύτα ὄῶρα κερασσάμενοι φορέουσιν, for all men bear mortality about them, and the cabinet is not so beauteous as the diamond that shines within its bosom; then we may, without interruption, pay this duty to piety, and friendship, and thankfulness; and deplore our sad loss by telling a true and sad story of this great man, whom God hath lately taken from our eyes.

He was bred in Cambridge, in Sidney College, under Mr. Hulet, a grave and a worthy man; and he showed himself not only a fruitful plant by his great progress in his studies, but made him another return of gratitude, taking care to provide a good employment for him in Ireland, where he then began to be greatly interested. It was spoken as an honour to Augustus Cæsar, that he gave his tutor an honourable funeral; and Marcus Antoninus erected a statue unto his; and Gratian the emperor made his master Ausonius to be consul; and our worthy primate, knowing the obligation which they pass upon us, who do "obstetricare gravidæ animæ," "help the parturient soul" to bring forth fruits according to its seminal powers, was careful not only to reward the industry of such persons, so useful to the church in the cultivating "infantes palmarum," "young plants," whose joints are to be stretched and made straight; but to demonstrate that his scholar knew how to value learning, when he knew so well how to reward the teacher.

Having passed the course of his studies in the university, and done his exercise with that applause which is usually the reward of pregnant wit and hard study, he was removed into Yorkshire, where first, in the city of York, he was an assiduous preacher; but, by the disposition of the Divine Providence, he happened to be engaged at Northallerton in disputation with three pragmatical Romish priests of the Jesuits' order, whom he so much worsted in the conference, and so shamefully disadvantaged by the evidence of truth, represented wisely and learnedly, that the famous primate of York, Archbishop Matthews, a learned and an excellent prelate, and a most worthy preacher, hearing of that triumph, sent for him, and made him his chaplain; in whose service he continued till the death of the primate, but, in that time, had given so much testimony of his dexterity in the conduct of ecclesiastical and civil affairs, that he grew dear to his master. In that employment he was made prebendary of York, and then of Rippon, the dean of which church having made him his sub-dean, he managed the affairs of that church so well, that he soon acquired a greater fame, and entered into the possession of many hearts, and admiration to those many more that knew him. There and at his parsonage he continued long to do the duty of a learned and good preacher, and by his wisdom, eloquence, and deportment, so gained the affections of the nobility, gentry, and commons of that country, that at his return thither upon the blessed restoration of his most sacred majesty, he knew himself obliged enough, and was so kind as to give them a visit; so they, by their coming in great numbers to meet him, their joyful reception of him, their great caressing of him when he was there, their forward hopes to enjoy him as their bishop, their trouble at his departure, their unwillingness to let him go away, gave signal testimonies that they were wise and kind enough to understand and value his great worth.

But while he lived there, he was like a diamond in the dust, or Lucius Quinctius at the plough; his low fortune covered a most valuable person, till he became observed by Sir Thomas Wentworth, lord president of York, whom we all knew for his great excellencies, and his great but glorious misfortunes.

This rare person espied the great abilities of Doctor Bramhall, and made him his chaplain, and brought him into Ireland, as one who, he believed, would prove the most fit instrument to serve in that design, which, for two years before his arrival here, he had greatly meditated and resolved, the reformation of religion, and the reparation of the broken fortunes of the church. The complaints were many, the abuses great, the causes of the church vastly numerous; but as fast as they were brought in, so fast they were by the lord deputy referred back to Dr. Bramhall, who, by his indefatigable pains, great sagacity, perpetual watchfulness, daily and hourly consultations, reduced things to a more tolerable condition, than they had been left in by the schismatical principles of some, and the unjust prepossessions of others, for many years before: for at the reformation, the popish bishops and priests seemed to conform, and did so, that keeping their bishoprics they might enrich their kindred and dilapidate the revenues of the church, which by pretended offices, false informations, fee-farms at contemptible rents, and ungodly alienations, were made low as poverty itself, and unfit to minister to the needs of them that served the altar, or the noblest purposes of religion: for hospitality decayed, and the bishops were easy to be oppressed by those that would; and they complained, but for a long time had no helper, till God raised up that glorious instrument the Earl of Strafford, who brought over with him as great affections to the church and to all public interests, and as admirable abilities, as ever before his time did invest and adorn any of the king's vicegerents; and God fitted his hand with an instrument good as his skill was great: for the first specimen of his abilities and diligence in recovery of some lost tithes, being represented to his late majesty, of blessed and glorious memory, it pleased his majesty, upon the death of Bishop Downham, to advance the Doctor to the bishopric of Derry, which he not only adorned with an excellent spirit and a wise government, but did more than double the revenue, not by taking any thing from them to whom it was due, but by resuming something of the churches' patrimony, which by undue means was detained in unfitting hands.

But his care was beyond his diocess, and his zeal broke out to warm all his brethren; and, though by reason of the favour and piety of king James, the escheated counties were well provided for their tithes, yet the bishoprics were not so well, till the primate, then bishop of Derry by the favour of the lord lieutenant and his own incessant and assiduous labour and wise conduct, brought in divers impropriations, cancelled many unjust alienations, and did restore them to a condition much more tolerable; I say much more tolerable; for though he raised them above contempt, yet they were not near to envy; but he knew there could not in all times be wanting too many, that envied to the church every degree of prosperity: so Judas did to Christ the expense of ointment; and so Dionysius told the priest, when himself stole the golden cloak from Apollo, and gave him one of Arcadian home-spun, that it was warmer for him in winter and cooler in summer. And for ever since, the church, by God's blessing and the favour of religious kings and princes, and pious nobility, hath been endowed with fair revenues, "inimicus homo," "the enemy" hath not been wanting, by pretences of religion, to take away God's portion from the church, as if his word were intended as an instrument to rob his houses. But when the Israelites were governed by a θεοκρατία, and "God was their king," and Moses his lieutenant, and things were of his management,—he was pleased, by making great provisions for them that ministered in the service of the tabernacle, to consign this truth for ever;—that men, as they love God, at the same rate are to make provisions for his priests. For when himself did it, he not only gave the forty-eight cities, with a mile of glebe round about their city every way, and yet the whole country was but a hundred and forty miles long, or thereabouts, from Dan to Beersheba; but besides this they had the tithe of all increase, the first-fruits, offerings, vows, redemptions, and in short, they had twenty-four sorts of dues, as Buxtorf relates; and all this either brought to the barn home to them without trouble, or else, as the nature of the thing required, brought to the temple; the first to make it more profitable, and the second to declare that they received it not from the people, but from God, not the people's kindness but the Lord's inheritance: insomuch that this small tribe of Levi, which was not the fortieth part of the people, as the Scripture computes them, had a revenue almost treble to any of the largest of the tribes.[m] I will not insist on what Villalpandus observes,[n] it may easily be read in the forty-fifth of Ezekiel, concerning that portion which God reserves for himself and his service; but whatsoever it be, this I shall say, that it is confessedly a prophecy of the gospel; but this I add, that they had as little to do, and much less than a christian priest; and yet in all the twenty-four courses the poorest priest among them might be esteemed a rich man.[o] I speak not this to upbraid any man, or any thing but sacrilege and murmur, nor to any other end but to represent upon what great and religious grounds the then bishop of Derry did, with so much care and assiduous labour, endeavour to restore the church of Ireland to that splendour and fulness; which as it is much conducing to the honour of God and of religion, God himself being the judge, so it is much more necessary for you than it is for us; and so this wise prelate rarely well understood it; and having the same advantage and blessing as now we have, a gracious king, and a lieutenant patron of religion and the church, he improved the "deposita pietatis," as Origen[p] calls them, "the gages of piety," which the religion of the ancient princes and nobles of this kingdom had bountifully given to such a comfortable competency, that though there be place left for present and future piety to enlarge itself, yet no man hath reason to be discouraged in his duty; insomuch that as I have heard from a most worthy hand, that at his going into England he gave account to the archbishop of Canterbury of 30,000*l.* a year, in the recovery of which he was greatly and principally instrumental. But the goods of this world are called "waters" by Solomon: stolen waters are sweet, and they are too unstable to be stopped: some of these waters did run back from their proper channel, and return to another course than God and the laws intended; yet his labours and pious counsels were not the less acceptable to God and good men, and therefore by a thankful and honourable recognition, the convocation of the church of Ireland has transmitted in record to posterity their deep resentment of his singular services and great abilities in this whole affair. And this honour will for ever remain to that bishop of Derry; he had a Zerubbabel who repaired the temple and restored its beauty; but he was the Joshua, the high priest, who under him ministered this blessing to the congregations of the Lord.

But his care was not determined in the exterior part only, and accessaries of religion; he was careful, and he was prosperous in it, to reduce that divine and excellent service of our church to public and constant exercise, to unity and devotion; and to cause the articles of the church of England to be accepted as the rule of public confessions and persuasions here, that they and we might be "populus unius labii," "of one heart and one lip," building up our hopes of heaven on a most holy faith; and taking away that Shibboleth which made this church lisp too indecently, or rather, in some little degree, to speak the speech of Ashdod, and not the language of Canaan; and the excellent and wise pains he took in this particular, no man can dehonestate or reproach, but he that is not willing to confess, that the church of England is the best reformed church in the world. But when the brave Roman infantry, under the conduct of Manlius, ascended up to the capitol to defend religion and the altars from the fury of the Gauls, they all prayed to God, "Ut quemadmodum ipsi ad defendendum templum ejus concurrissent, ita ille virtutem eorum numine suo tueretur:" "That as they came to defend his temple by their arms, so he would defend their persons and that cause with his power and divinity. "And this excellent man in the cause of religion found the like blessing which they prayed for; God, by the prosperity of his labours and a blessed effect, gave testimony not only of the piety and wisdom of his purposes, but that he loves to bless a wise instrument, when it is vigorously employed in a wise and religious labour. He overcame the difficulty in defiance of all such pretences, as were made even from religion itself, to obstruct the better procedure of real and material religion.

These were great things and matter of great envy, and, like the fiery eruptions of Vesuvius, might, with the very ashes of consumption, have buried another man. At first indeed, as his blessed Master, the most holy Jesus, had, so he also had his "annum acceptabilem." At first the product was nothing but great admiration at his stupendous parts, and wonder at his mighty diligence and observation of his unusual zeal in so good and great things; but this quickly passed into the natural daughters of envy, suspicion, and detraction, the spirit of obloquy and slander. His zeal for recovery of the church-revenues was called oppression and rapine, covetousness and injustice; his care of reducing religion to wise and justifiable principles was called popery and Arminianism, and I know not what names, which signify what the authors are pleased to mean, and the people to construe and to hate. The intermedial prosperity of his person and fortune, which he had as an earnest of a greater reward to so well-meant labours, was supposed to be the production of illiberal arts and ways of getting; and the necessary refreshment of his wearied spirits, which did not always supply all his needs, and were sometimes less than the permissions even of prudent charity, they called intemperance: "Dederunt enim malum Metelli Nævio poetæ;" their own surmises were the bills of accusation; and the splendour of his great ἀγαθοεργία, or "doing of good works," was the great probation of all their calumnies. But if envy be the accuser, what can be the defences of innocence?

> Saucior invidiæ morsu, quærenda medela est;
> Dic quibus in terris sentiet æger opem?

Our blessed Saviour, knowing the unsatisfiable angers of men if their money or estates were meddled with, refused to divide an inheritance amongst brethren: it was not to be imagined that this great person (invested, as all his brethren were, with the infirmities of mortality, and yet employed in dividing, and recovering, and apportioning of lands) should be able to bear all that reproach, which jealousy, and suspicion, and malicious envy could invent against him. But ἀπ' ἐχθρῶν πολλὰ μανθάνουσιν οἱ σοφοὶ, said Sophocles: and so did he; the affrightments brought to his great fame and reputation made him to walk more warily, and do justly, and act prudently, and conduct his affairs by the measures of laws, as far as he understood, and indeed that was a very great way: but there was "aperta justitia, clausa manus," "justice was open, but his hand was shut;" and, though every slanderer could tell a story, yet none could prove that ever he received "a bribe to blind his eyes, to the value of a pair of gloves:" it was his own expression, when he gave glory to God who had preserved him innocent. But, because every man's cause is right in his own eyes, it was hard for him so to acquit himself, that in the intrigues of law and difficult cases, some of his enemies should not seem (when they were heard alone) to speak reason against him. But see the greatness of truth and prudence, and how greatly God stood with him. When the numerous armies of vexed people, > Turba gravis paci, placidæque inimica quieti. MART.

heaped up catalogues of accusations, when the parliament of Ireland, imitating the violent procedures of the then disordered English, when his glorious patron was taken from his head, and he was disrobed of his great defences; when petitions were invited and accusations furnished, and calumny was rewarded and managed with art and power, when there were above two hundred petitions put in against him, and himself denied leave to answer by word of mouth; when he was long imprisoned, and treated so that a guilty man would have been broken into affrightment and pitiful and low considerations; yet then he himself, standing almost alone, like Callimachus at Marathon, invested with enemies and covered with arrows, defended himself beyond all the powers of guiltiness, even with the defences of truth and the bravery of innocence, and answered the petitions in writing, sometimes twenty in a day, with so much clearness, evidence of truth, reality of fact, and testimony of law, that his very enemies were ashamed and convinced; they found they had done like Æsop's viper, they licked the file till their tongues bled; but himself was wholly invulnerable. They were therefore forced to leave their muster-rolls and decline the particulars, and fall to their ἓν μέγα, to accuse him for going about to subvert the fundamental laws: the way by which great Strafford and Canterbury fell; which was a device, when all reasons failed, to oppress the enemy by the bold affirmation of a conclusion they could not prove: they did like those "gladiators" whom the Romans called "retiarii," when they could not stab their enemy with their daggers, they threw nets over him, and covered him with a general mischief. But the martyr King Charles the First, of most glorious and eternal memory, seeing so great a champion likely to be oppressed with numbers and despair, sent what rescue he could, his royal letter for his bail, which was hardly granted to him; and when it was, it was upon such hard terms, that his very delivery was a persecution. So necessary it was for them, who intended to do mischief to the public, to take away the strongest pillars of the house. This thing I remark to acquit this great man from the tongue of slander, which had so boldly spoken, that it was certain something would stick; yet was so impotent and unarmed, that it could not kill that great fame, which his greater worthiness had procured him. It was said of Hippasus the Pythagorean, that being asked how and what he had done, he answered, "Nondum nihil; neque enim adhuc mihi invidetur;" "I have done nothing yet, for no man envies me." He that does great things, cannot avoid the tongues and teeth of envy; but if calumnies must pass for evidences, the bravest heroes must always be the most reproached persons in the world.

> Nascitur Ætolicus, pravum ingeniosus ad omne;
> Qui facere assuerat, patriæ non degener artis,
> Candida de nigris, et de candentibus atra.

Every thing can have an ill name and an ill sense put upon it; but God who takes care of reputations as he does of lives, by the orders of his Providence confutes the slander, "ut memoria justorum sit in benedictionibus," "that the memory of the righteous man might be embalmed with honour:" and so it happened to this great man; for by a public warranty, by the concurrent consent of both houses of parliament, the libellous petitions against him, the false records and public monuments of injurious shame, were cancelled, and he was restored, "in integrum," to that fame where his great labours and just procedures had first estated him; which though it was but justice, yet it was also such honour, that it is greater than the virulence of tongues, which his worthiness and their envy had armed against him.

But yet the great scene of his troubles was but newly opened. I shall not refuse to speak yet more of his troubles, as remembering that St. Paul, when he discourses of the glories of the saints departed, he tells more of their sufferings than of their prosperities, as being that laboratory and crucible, in which God makes his servants vessels of honour to his glory. The storm quickly grew high; "et transitum est à linguis ad gladios;" and that was indeed ἀδικία ἔχουσα ὅπλα, "Iniquity had put on arms;" when it is "armata nequitia," then a man is hard put to it. The rebellion breaking out, the bishop went to his charge at Derry; and because he was within the defence of walls, the execrable traitor, Sir Phelim O'Neale, laid a snare to bring him to a dishonourable death; for he wrote a letter to the bishop, pretending intelligence between them, desired that according to their former agreement such a gate might be delivered to him. The messenger was not advised to be cautious, nor at all instructed in the art of secrecy; for it was intended that he should be searched, intercepted, and hanged for aught they cared: but the arrow was shot against the bishop, that he might be accused for base conspiracy, and die with shame and sad dishonour. But here God manifested his mighty care of his servants; he was pleased to send into the heart of the messenger such an affrightment, that he directly ran away with the letter, and never durst come near the town to deliver it. This story was published by Sir Phelim himself, who added, that if he could have thus insnared the bishop, he had good assurance the town should have been his own: "Sed bonitas Dei prævalitura est super omnem malitiam hominis;" "The goodness of God is greater than all the malice of men;" and nothing could so prove how dear that sacred life was to God, as his rescue from the dangers. "Stantia non poterant tecta probare Deos:"[q] "To have kept him in a warm house had been nothing, unless the roof had fallen upon his head; that rescue was a remark of Divine favour and providence." But it seems Sir Phelim's treason against the life of this worthy man had a correspondent in the town; and it broke out speedily; for what they could not effect by malicious stratagem, they did in part by open force; they turned the bishop out of the town, and upon trifling and unjust pretences searched his carriages, and took what they pleased, till they were ashamed to take more: they did worse than divorce him from his church; for in all the Roman divorces they said, "Tuas tibi res habeto," "Take your goods and be gone;" but plunder was religion then. However, though the usage was sad, yet it was recompensed to him by his taking sanctuary in Oxford, where he was graciously received by that most incomparable and divine prince; but having served the king in Yorkshire, by his pen, and by his counsels, and by his interests, he returned back to Ireland, where, under the excellent conduct of his Grace the now lord lieutenant, he ran the risk and fortune of oppressed virtue.

But God having still resolved to afflict us, the good man was forced into the fortune of the patriarchs, to leave his country and his charges, and seek for safety and bread in a strange land; for so the prophets were used to do, wandering up and down in sheep's clothing; but poor as they were, the world was not worthy of them: and this worthy man, despising the shame, took up his cross and followed his Master.

> Exilium causa ipsa jubet sibi dulce videri,
> Et desiderium dulce levat patriæ.

He was not ashamed to suffer, where the cause was honourable and glorious; but so God provided for the needs of his banished, and sent a man who could minister comfort to the afflicted, and courage to the persecuted, and resolutions to the tempted, and strength to that religion for which they all suffered.

And here this great man was indeed triumphant; this was one of the last and best scenes of his life: ἡμέραι γὰρ ἐπίλογοι μάρτυρες σοφώτατοι, "The last days are the best witnesses of a man." But so it was, that he stood up in public and brave defence for the doctrine and discipline of the church of England; first, by his sufferings and great example; for, "Verbis tantùm philosophari, non est doctoris, sed histrionis;" "To talk well and not to do bravely, is for a comedian, not a divine:" but this great man did both; he suffered his own calamity with great courage, and by his wise discourses strengthened the hearts of others.

For there wanted not diligent tempters in the church of Rome, who taking advantage of the afflictions of his sacred majesty, in which state men commonly suspect every thing, and like men in sickness are willing to change from side to side, hoping for ease and finding none, flew at royal game, and hoped to draw away the king from that religion which his most royal father, the best man and the wisest prince in the world, had sealed with the best blood in christendom, and which himself sucked in with his education, and had confirmed by choice and reason, and confessed publicly and bravely, and hath since restored prosperously. Millitiere was the man, witty and bold enough to attempt a zealous and a foolish undertaking, who addressed himself with ignoble, indeed, but witty arts, to persuade the king to leave what was dearer to him than his eyes. It is true, it was a wave dashed against a rock, and an arrow shot against the sun, it could not reach him; but the bishop of Derry turned it also, and made it fall upon the shooter's head; for he made so ingenious, so learned, and so acute reply to that book; he so discovered the errors of the Roman church, retorted the arguments, stated the questions, demonstrated the truth, and shamed their procedures, that nothing could be a greater argument of the bishop's learning, great parts, deep judgment, quickness of apprehension, and sincerity in the catholic and apostolic faith; or of the follies and prevarications of the church of Rome. He wrote no apologies for himself, though it were much to be wished that, as Junius wrote his own life, or Moses his own story, so we might have understood from himself how great things God had done for him and by him: but all that he permitted to God, and was silent in his own defences; "Gloriosius enim est injuriam tacendo fugere, quàm respondendo superare:" but when the honour and conscience of his king, and the interest of a true religion was at stake, the fire burned within him, and at last he spake with his tongue; he cried out like the son of Crœsus, Ἄνθρωπε, μὴ κτείνε Κροῖσον,[r] Take heed and meddle not with the king: his person is too sacred, and religion too dear to him, to be assaulted by vulgar hands. In short, he acquitted himself in this affair with so much truth and piety, learning and judgment, that in those papers his memory will last until very late succeeding generations.

But this most reverend prelate found a nobler adversary, and a braver scene for his contention: he found that the Roman priests, being wearied and baffled by the wise discourses and pungent arguments of the English divines, had studiously declined any more to dispute the particular questions against us, but fell at last upon a general charge, imputing to the church of England the great crime of schism; and by this they thought they might with most probability deceive unwary and unskilful readers; for they saw the schism, and they saw we had left them; and because they considered not the causes, they resolved to out-face us in the charge: but now it was that "dignum nactus argumentum," "having an argument fit" to employ his great abilities,

> Consecrat hic præsul calamum calamique labores,
> Ante aras Domino læta trophæa suo;

"the bishop now dedicates his labours to the service of God" and of his church, undertook the question, and in a full discourse proves the church of Rome not only to be guilty of the schism, by making it necessary to depart from them; but they did actuate the schisms, and themselves made the first separation in the great point of the pope's supremacy, which was the palladium for which they principally contended. He made it appear that the popes of Rome were usurpers of the rights of kings and bishops; that they brought in new doctrines in every age, that they imposed their own devices upon christendom as articles of faith, that they prevaricated the doctrines of the apostles, that the church of England only returned to her primitive purity, that she joined with Christ and his apostles, that she agreed in all the sentiments of the primitive church. He stated the questions so wisely, and conducted them so prudently, and handled them so learnedly, that I may truly say, they were never more materially confuted by any man, since the questions have so unhappily disturbed christendom. "Verum hoc eos malè ussit:" and they finding themselves smitten under the fifth rib, set up an old champion of their own, a Goliah to fight against the armies of Israel; the old bishop of Chalcedon, known to many of us, replied to this excellent book; but was so answered by a rejoinder made by the lord bishop of Derry, in which he so pressed the former arguments, refuted the cavils, brought in so many impregnable authorities and probations, and added so many moments and weights to his discourse, that the pleasures of reading the book would be the greatest, if the profit to the church of God were not greater.

> Flumina jam lactis, jam flumina nectaris ibant, > Flavaque de viridi stillabant ilice mella. OVID.

For so Samson's riddle was again expounded, "Out of the strong came meat, and out of the eater came sweetness." His arguments were strong, and the eloquence was sweet and delectable; and though there started up another combatant against him, yet he had only the honour to fall by the hands of Hector: still "hæret lateri lethalis arundo;" the headed arrow went in so far, that it could not be drawn out, but the barbed steel stuck behind: and whenever men will desire to be satisfied in those great questions, the bishop of Derry's book shall be his oracle.

I will not insist upon his other excellent writings; but it is known every where with what piety and acumen he wrote against the Manichean doctrine of "fatal necessity," which a late witty man had pretended to adorn with a new vizor: but this excellent person washed off the ceruse and the meretricious paintings, rarely well asserted the economy of the Divine Providence, and having once more triumphed over his adversary, "plenus victoriarum et tropæorum," betook himself to the more agreeable attendance upon sacred offices; and having usefully and wisely discoursed of the sacred rite of confirmation, imposed his hands upon the most illustrious princes, the dukes of York and Gloucester, and the princess royal, and ministered to them the promise of the Holy Spirit, and ministerially established them in the religion and service of the holy Jesus. And one thing more I shall remark; that at his leaving those parts upon the king's return, some of the remonstrant ministers of the Low Countries coming to take their leaves of this great man, and desiring that by his means the church of England would be kind to them, he had reason to grant it, because they were learned men, and in many things of a most excellent belief; yet he reproved them, and gave them caution against it, that they approached too near and gave too much countenance to the great and dangerous errors of the Socinians.

He thus having served God and the king abroad, God was pleased to return to the king and to us all, as in the days of old, and we sung the song of David, "In convertendo captivitatem Sion," when king David and all his servants returned to Jerusalem. This great person having trod in the winepress, was called to drink of the wine, and, as an honorary reward of his great services and abilities, was chosen primate of this national church, in which time we are to look upon him, as the king and the king's great vicegerent did, as a person concerning whose abilities the world had too great testimony ever to make a doubt. It is true he was in the declension of his age and health; but his very ruins were goodly; and they who saw the broken heaps of Pompey's theatre, and the crushed obelisks, and the old face of beauteous Philænium, could not but admire the disordered glories of such magnificent structures, which were venerable in their very dust.

He ever was used to overcome all difficulties, only mortality was too hard for him; but still his virtues and his spirit were immortal; he still took great care, and still had new and noble designs, and proposed to himself admirable things. He governed his province with great justice and sincerity;

> Unus amplo consulens pastor gregi,
> Somnos tuetur omnium solus vigil.

And had this remark in all his governments, that as he was a great hater of sacrilege, so he professed himself a public enemy to non-residence, and often would declare wisely and religiously against it, allowing it, in no case but of necessity, or the greater good of the church. There are great things spoken of his predecessor, St. Patrick, that he founded seven hundred churches and religious convents, that he ordained five thousand priests, and, with his own hands, consecrated three hundred and fifty bishops. How true the story is I know not; but we were all witnesses that the late primate, whose memory we now celebrate, did, by an extraordinary contingency of Providence, in one day, consecrate two archbishops and ten bishops; and did benefit to almost all the churches in Ireland, and was greatly instrumental to the re-endowments of the whole clergy; and in the greatest abilities and incomparable industry, was inferior to none of his most glorious antecessors.

Since the canonization of saints came into the church, we find no Irish bishop canonized, except St. Laurence of Dublin, and St. Malachias of Down; indeed Richard of Armagh's canonization was propounded, but not effected; but the character which was given of that learned primate by Trithemius,[1] does exactly fit this our late father: "Vir in Divinis Scripturis eruditus, secularis philosophiæ jurisque canonici non ignarus, clarus ingenio, sermone scholasticus, in declamandis sermonibus ad populum excellentis industriæ:" "He was learned in the Scriptures, skilled in secular philosophy, and not unknowing in the civil and canon laws, (in which studies I wish the clergy were, with some carefulness and diligence, still more conversant,) he was of an excellent spirit, a scholar in his discourses, an early and industrious preacher to the people." And as if there were a more particular sympathy between their souls, our primate had so great a veneration to his memory, that he purposed, if he had lived, to have restored his monument in Dundalk, which time, or impiety, or unthankfulness, had either omitted or destroyed. So great a lover he was of all true and inherent worth, that he loved it in the very memory of the dead, and to have such great examples transmitted to the intuition and imitation of posterity.

At his coming to the primacy, he knew he should at first espy little besides the ruins of discipline, a harvest of thorns, and heresies prevailing in the hearts of the people, the churches possessed by wolves and intruders, men's hearts greatly estranged from true religion; and, therefore, he set himself to weed the fields of the church; he treated the adversaries sometimes sweetly, sometimes he confuted them learnedly, sometimes he rebuked them sharply. He visited his charges diligently and in his own person, not by proxies and instrumental deputations: "Quærens non nostra, sed nos, et quæ sunt Jesu Christi:" "He designed nothing that we knew of but the redintegration of religion," the honour of God and the king, the restoring of collapsed discipline, and the renovation of faith and the service of God in the churches. And still he was indefatigable, and, even at the last scene of his life, intended to undertake a regal visitation. "Quid enim vultis me otiosum à Domino comprehendi?" said one, "He was not willing that God should take him unemployed:" but, good man, he felt his tabernacle ready to fall in pieces, and could go no further,—for God would have no more work done by that hand; he, therefore, espying this, put his house in order, and had lately visited his diocess, and done what he then could, to put his charge in order; for he had, a good while since, received the sentence of death within himself, and knew he was shortly to render an account of his stewardship; he, therefore, upon a brisk alarm of death, which God sent him the last January, made his will; in which, besides the prudence and presence of spirit manifested in making just and wise settlement of his estate, and provisions for his descendants; at midnight, and in the trouble of his sickness and circumstances of addressing death, still kept a special sentiment, and made confession of God's admirable mercies, and gave thanks that God had permitted him to live to see the blessed restoration of his majesty and the church of England, confessed his faith to be the same as ever, gave praises to God that he was born and bred up in this religion, and prayed to God, and hoped he should die in the communion of this church, which he declared to be the most pure and apostolical church in the whole world.

He prayed to God to pardon his frailties and infirmities, relied upon the mercies of God and the merits of Jesus Christ, and, with a singular sweetness, resigned up his soul into the hands of his Redeemer.

But God, who is the great Choragus and Master of the scenes of life and death, was not pleased then to draw the curtains; there was an epilogue to his life yet to be acted and spoken. He returned to actions and life, and went on in the methods of the same procedure as before; was desirous still to establish the affairs of the church, complained of some disorders which he purposed to redress, girt himself to the work; but though his spirit was willing, yet his flesh was weak; and as the apostles in the vespers of Christ's passion, so he in the eye of his own dissolution, was heavy, not to sleep, but heavy unto death; and looked for the last warning, which seized on him in the midst of business; and though it was sudden, yet it could not be unexpected, or unprovided by surprise, and therefore, could be no other than that εὐθανασία which Augustus used to wish unto himself, a civil and well-natured death, without the amazement of troublesome circumstances, or the great cracks of a falling house, or the convulsions of impatience. Seneca tells that Bassus Aufidius was wont to say, "Sperare se nullum dolorem esse in illo extremo anhelitu; si tamen esset, habere aliquantum in ipsâ brevitate solatii:"[t] "He hoped that the pains of the last dissolution were little or none; or if they were it was full of comfort that they could be but short." It happened so to this excellent man; his passive fortitude had been abundantly tried before, and therefore there was the less need of it now; his active graces had been abundantly demonstrated by the great and good things he did; and therefore, his last scene was not so laborious, but God called him away something after the manner of Moses, which the Jews express by "osculum oris Dei," "the kiss of God's mouth;" that is, a death indeed fore-signified, but gentle and serene, and without temptation.

To sum up all: he was a wise prelate, a learned doctor, a just man, a true friend, a great benefactor to others, a thankful beneficiary where he was obliged himself. He was a faithful servant to his masters, a loyal subject to the king, a zealous assertor of his religion against popery on the one side, and fanaticism on the other. The practice of his religion was not so much in forms and exterior ministries, though he was a great observer of all the public rites and ministries of the church, as it was in doing good for others. He was like Myson, whom the Scythian Anacharsis so greatly praised, ὁ Μύσων ἦν οἶκον οἰκῆσας καλῶς, "he governed his family well," he gave to all their due of maintenance and duty; he did great benefit to mankind; he had the fate of the apostle St. Paul, he passed "through evil report and good report, as a deceiver, and yet true." He was a man of great business and great resort: "Semper aliquis in Cydonis domo," as the Corinthians said; "There was always somebody in Cydon's house." He was μερίζων τὸν βιὸν ἔργῳ καὶ βίβλῳ,[u] "he divided his life into labour and his book." He took care of his churches when he was alive, and even after his death, having left five hundred pounds for the repair of his cathedral of Armagh and St. Peter's church in Drogheda. He was an excellent scholar, and rarely well accomplished; first instructed to great excellency by natural parts, and then consummated by study and experience. Melancthon was used to say, that himself was a logician, Pomeranus a grammarian, Justus Jonas an orator, but that Luther was all these. It was greatly true of him, that the single perfections which make many men eminent, were united in this primate, and made him illustrious.

[t] Epist. 30.

[u] Synes. Ep. 57.

> At, at, Quinctilium perpetuus sopor
> Urget? cui Pudor, et, Justitiæ soror,
> Incorrupta Fides, nudaque Veritas,
> Quando ullum invenient parem?

It will be hard to find his equal in all things: "Fortasse tanquam Phœnix anno quingentesimo nascitur," (that I may use the words of Seneca,) "nec est mirum ex intervallo magna generari; mediocria et in turbam nascentia sæpe fortuna producit: eximia vero ipsâ raritate commendat." For in him were visible the great lines of Hooker's judiciousness, of Jewel's learning, of the acuteness of bishop Andrews. He was skilled in more great things than one: and as one said of Phidias, he could not only make excellent statues of ivory, but he could work in stone and brass. He showed his equanimity in poverty, and his justice in riches; he was useful in his country, and profitable in his banishment; for, as Paræus was at Anvilla, Luther at Wittenburg, St. Athanasius and St. Chrysostom in their banishment, St. Jerome in his retirement at Bethlehem, they were oracles to them that needed it: so was he in Holland and France, where he was abroad; and beside the particular endearments which his friends received from him, for he did do relief to his brethren that wanted, and supplied the soldiers out of his store in Yorkshire, when himself could but ill spare it: but he received public thanks from the convocation of which he was president, and public justification from the parliament where he was speaker; so that although, as one said, "Miraculi instar vitæ iter, si longum, sine offensione percurrere;" yet no man had greater enemies, and no man had greater justifications.

But God hath taken our Elijah from our heads this day: I pray God that at least his mantle may be left behind, and that his spirit may be doubled upon his successor; and that we may all meet together with him at the right hand of the Lamb, where every man shall receive according to his deeds, whether they be good or whether they be evil. I conclude with the words of Caius Plinius: "Equidem beatos puto quibus Deorum munere datum est, aut facere scribenda, aut scribere legenda:" "he wrote many things fit to be read, and did very many things worthy to be written:" which if we wisely imitate, we may hope to meet him in the resurrection of the just, and feast with him in the eternal supper of the Lamb, there to sing perpetual anthems to the honour of God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; to whom be all honour, &c.

A FUNERAL SERMON

PREACHED AT

THE OBSEQUIES

OF THE RIGHT HONOURABLE AND MOST VIRTUOUS LADY, THE LADY FRANCES,

COUNTESS OF CARBERY,

WHO DECEASED OCTOBER 9, 1650, AT HER HOUSE, GOLDEN GROVE, IN CAERMARTHENSHIRE.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE AND TRULY NOBLE

RICHARD LORD VAUGHAN,

EARL OF CARBERY, BARON OF EMLIN AND MOLINGER, KNIGHT OF THE HONOURABLE ORDER OF THE BATH.

MY LORD,

I AM not ashamed to profess, that I pay this part of service to your lordship most unwillingly; for it is a sad office to be the chief minister in a house of mourning, and to present an interested person with a branch of cypress and a bottle of tears. And indeed, my Lord, it were more proportionable to your needs to bring something that might alleviate or divert your sorrow, than to dress the hearse of your dear lady, and to furnish it with such circumstances, that it may dwell with you, and lie in your closet, and make your prayers and your retirements more sad and full of weepings. But, because the Divine Providence hath taken from you a person so excellent, a woman fit to converse with angels and apostles, with saints and martyrs, give me leave to present you with her picture, drawn in little and in water colours, sullied, indeed, with tears and the abrupt accents of a real and consonant sorrow, but drawn with a faithful hand, and taken from the life; and indeed, it were too great a loss to be deprived of her example and of her rule, of the original and of the copy too. The age is very evil and deserved her not; but because it is so evil, it hath the more need to have such lives preserved in memory, to instruct our piety or upbraid our wickedness. For now that God hath cut this tree of Paradise down from its seat of earth, yet so the dead trunk may support a part of the declining temple, or, at least, serve to kindle the fire on the altar. My Lord, I pray God this heap of sorrow may swell your piety, till it breaks into the greatest joys of God and of religion; and remember, when you pay a tear upon the grave, or to the memory of your lady, that dear and most excellent soul, that you pay two more; one of repentance for those things that may have caused this breach, and another of joy for the mercies of God to your dear departed saint, that he hath taken her into a place where she can weep no more. My Lord, I think I shall, so long as I live, that is, so long as I am

Your Lordship's

Most humble servant,

JER. TAYLOR.

Pietati et Memoriæ Sacrum.

Monumentum doloris singularis, paris fati et conditionis, posuit Richardus Comes Carberiensis sibi vivo, et mortem nec exoptanti nec metuenti: et dilectissimæ suæ conjugi Franciscæ Comitissæ in flore ætatis casibus puerperii raptæ ex amplexibus sanctissimi amoris. Fuit illa (descendat lacrimula, amice lector) fuit inter castissimas prima, inter conjuges amantissima, mater optima: placidi oris, severæ virtutis, conversationis suavissimæ: vultum hilarem fecit bona conscientia; amabilem, forma plusquam uxoria. Claris orta natalibus, fortunam non mediocrem habuit; erat enim cum uniciâ germanâ hæres ex asse. Annos XIII. Menses IV. supra biduum vixit in sanctissimo matrimonio cum suo quem effusissimè dilexit, et sanctè observavit; quem novit prudentissimum, sensit amantissimum, virum optimum vidit et lætata est. Enixa prolem numerosam, pulchram, ingenuam, formæ et spei optimæ; quatuor masculos, Franciscum Dominum Vaughan, Johannem, Althamum, quartum immaturum; fœminas sex, Dominam Franciscam, Elizabethas duas, Mariam, Margaretam, et Althamiam;—post cujus partum paucis diebus obdormiit. Totam prolem masculam (si demas abortivum illum) et fœminas omnes, præter Elizabetham alteram, et Mariam, superstites reliquit. Pietatis adeòque spei plena obiit ix. Octobr. MDCL. Lacrymis suorum omnium tota irrigua conditur in hoc cœmeterio, ubi cùm Deo Opt. Max. visum fuerit, sperat se reponendum conjux mœstissimus; intereà temporis luctui, sed pietati magis vacat, ut in suo tempore simul lætentur par tam pium, tam nobile, tam christianum in gremio Jesu, usque dum coronæ adornentur accipiendæ in adventu Domini. Amen.

Cum ille vitâ defunctus fuerit, marmor loquetur, quod adhuc tacere jubet virtus modesta: interim vitam ejus observa, et leges quod posteâ hîc inscriptum amabunt et colent posteri. Ora et abi.

SERMON.

For we must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again; neither doth God respect any person: yet doth he devise means, that his banished be not expelled from him.—2 Sam. xiv. 14.

When our blessed Saviour and his disciples viewed the temple, some one amongst them cried out, "Magister, aspice, quales lapides!" "Master, behold what fair, what great stones are here!" Christ made no other reply, but foretold their dissolution, and a world of sadness and sorrow which should bury that whole nation, when the teeming cloud of God's displeasure should produce a storm, which was the daughter of the biggest anger, and the mother of the greatest calamity, which ever crushed any of the sons of Adam; "The time shall come, that there shall not be left one stone upon another." The whole temple and the religion, the ceremonies ordained by God, and the nation beloved by God, and the fabric erected for the service of God, shall run to their own period, and lie down in their several graves. Whatsoever had a beginning, can also have an ending; and it shall die, unless it be daily watered with the purls flowing from the fountain of life, and refreshed with the dew of heaven and the wells of God: and therefore, God had provided a tree in Paradise to have supported Adam in his artificial immortality: immortality was not in his nature, but in the hands and arts, in the favour and superadditions of God. Man was always the same mixture of heat and cold, of dryness and moisture; ever the same weak thing, apt to feel rebellion in the humours, and to suffer the evils of a civil war in his body natural: and, therefore, health and life was to descend upon him from heaven, and he was to suck life from a tree on earth; himself being but ingrafted into a tree of life, and adopted into the condition of an immortal nature. But he that in the best of his days was but a scion of this tree of life, by his sin was cut off from thence quickly, and planted upon thorns, and his portion was for ever after among the flowers, which to-day spring and look like health and beauty, and in the evening they are sick, and at night are dead, and the oven is their grave: and, as before, even from our first spring from the dust on earth, we might have died, if we had not been preserved by the continual flux of a rare providence; so now that we are reduced to the laws of our own nature, "we must needs die." It is natural, and therefore necessary: it is become a punishment to us, and therefore it is unavoidable; and God hath bound the evil upon us by bands of natural and inseparable propriety, and by a supervening unalterable decree of heaven; and we are fallen from our privilege, and are returned to the condition of beasts, and buildings, and common things: and we see temples defiled unto the ground, and they die by sacrilege; and great empires die by their own plenty and ease, full humours, and factious subjects; and huge buildings fall by their own weight, and the violence of many winters eating and consuming the cement, which is the marrow of their bones; and princes die like the meanest of their servants; and every thing finds a grave and a tomb: and the very tomb itself dies by the bigness of its pompousness and luxury, and becomes as friable and uncombined dust, as the ashes of the sinner or the saint that lay under it, and is now forgotten in his bed of darkness. And to this catalogue of mortality man is enrolled with a "statutum est;" "It is appointed for all men once to die, and after death comes judgment:" and if a man can be stronger than nature, or can wrestle with a decree of heaven, or can escape from a Divine punishment by his own arts, so that neither the power nor the providence of God, nor the laws of nature, nor the bands of eternal predestination can hold him, then he may live beyond the fate and period of flesh, and last longer than a flower; but if all these can hold us and tie us to conditions, then we must lay our heads down upon a turf, and entertain creeping things in the cells and little chambers of our eyes, and dwell with worms till time and death shall be no more. "We must needs die"—that is our sentence: but that is not all.

———Phario nutantia pondera saxo.
Quæ cineri vanus dat ruitura labor. MART.

"We are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again." Stay,

1. We are as water, weak, and of no consistence, always descending, abiding in no certain place, unless where we are detained with violence; and every little breath of wind makes us rough and tempestuous, and troubles our faces; every trifling accident discomposes us; and, as the face of the waters wafting in a storm, so wrinkles itself, that it makes upon its forehead furrows deep and hollow like a grave; so do our great and little cares and trifles first make the wrinkles of old age, and then they dig a grave for us: and there is in nature nothing so contemptible, but it may meet with us in such circumstances, that it may be too hard for us in our weaknesses; and the sting of a bee is a weapon sharp enough to pierce the finger of a child or the lip of a man; and those creatures which nature hath left without weapons, yet they are armed sufficiently to vex those parts of men, which are left defenceless and obnoxious to a sun-beam, to the roughness of a sour grape, to the unevenness of a gravel stone, to the dust of a wheel, or the unwholesome breath of a star looking awry upon a sinner.

2. But besides the weaknesses and natural decayings of our bodies, if chances and contingencies be innumerable, then no man can reckon our dangers, and the preternatural causes of our death: so that he is a vain person, whose hopes of life are too confidently increased by reason of his health; and he is too unreasonably timorous, who thinks his hopes at an end when he dwells in sickness. For men die without rule, and with and without occasions; and no man suspecting or foreseeing any of death's addresses, and no man in his whole condition is weaker than another. A man in a long consumption is fallen under one of the solemnities and preparations to death; but at the same instant, the most healthful person is as near death, upon a more fatal and a more sudden, but a less discerned cause. There are but few persons upon whose foreheads every man can read the sentence of death, written in the lines of a lingering sickness, but they sometimes hear the passing-bell ring for stronger men, even long before their own knell calls at the house of their mother to open her womb, and make a bed for them. No man is surer of to-morrow than the weakest of his brethren: and when Lepidus and Aufidius stumbled at the threshold of the senate, and fell down and died, the blow came from heaven in a cloud; but it struck more suddenly than upon the poor slave that made sport upon the theatre with a premeditated and fore-described death: "Quod quisque vitet, nunquam homini satis Cautum est in horas." There are sicknesses that walk in darkness; and there are exterminating angels, that fly wrapt up in the curtains of immateriality and an uncommunicating nature; whom we cannot see, but we feel their force, and sink under their sword; and from heaven the veil descends that wraps our heads in the fatal sentence. There is no age of man but it hath proper to itself some posterns and outlets for death, besides those infinite and open ports out of which myriads of men and women every day pass into the dark, and the land of forgetfulness. Infancy hath life but in effigy, or like a spark dwelling in a pile of wood; the candle is so newly lighted, that every little shaking of the taper, and every ruder breath of air, puts it out, and it dies. Childhood is so tender, and yet so unwary; so soft to all the impressions of chance, and yet so forward to run into them, that God knew there could be no security without the care and vigilance of an angel-keeper; and the eyes of parents and the arms of nurses, the provisions of art, and all the effects of human love and providence, are not sufficient to keep one child from horrid mischiefs, from strange and early calamities and deaths, unless a messenger be sent from heaven to stand sentinel, and watch the very playings and sleepings, the eatings and drinkings of the children; and it is a long time before nature makes them capable of help: for there are many deaths, and very many diseases to which poor babes are exposed; but they have but very few capacities of physic; to show that infancy is as liable to death as old age, and equally exposed to danger, and equally incapable of a remedy; with this only difference, that old age hath diseases incurable by nature, and the diseases of childhood are incurable by art; and both the states are the next heirs of death.

3. But all the middle way the case is altered: nature is strong, and art is apt to give ease and remedy, but still there is no security; and there the case is not altered. 1. For there are so many diseases in men that are not understood. 2. So many new ones every year. 3. The old ones are so changed in circumstance, and intermingled with so many collateral complications. 4. The symptoms are oftentimes so alike. 5. Sometimes so hidden and fallacious. 6. Sometimes none at all; as in the most sudden and most dangerous imposthumations. 7. And then, the diseases, in the inward parts of the body, are oftentimes such, to which no application can be made. 8. They are so far off, that the effects of all medicines can no otherwise come to them, than the effect and juices of all meats; that is, not till after two or three alterations and decoctions, which change the very species of the medicament. 9. And, after all this, very many principles in the art of physic are so uncertain, that after they have been believed seven or eight ages, and that upon them much of the practice hath been established, they come to be considered by a witty man, and others established in their stead; by which men must practise, and by which three or four generations of men more (as happens) must live or die. 10. And all this while the men are sick, and they take things that certainly make them sicker for the present, and very uncertainly restore health for the future: that it may appear of what a large extent is human calamity; when God's Providence hath not only made it weak and miserable upon the certain stock of a various nature, and upon the accidents of an infinite contingency; but even from the remedies which are appointed, our dangers and our troubles are certainly increased: so that we may well be likened to water; our nature is no stronger, our abode no more certain; if the sluices be opened, "it falls away and runneth apace;" if its current be stopped it swells and grows troublesome, and spills over with a greater diffusion; if it be made to stand still, it putrifies: and all this we do. For,

4. In all the process of our health, we are running to our grave: we open our own sluices by viciousness and unworthy actions; we pour in drink, and let out life; we increase diseases, and know not how to bear them; we strangle ourselves with our own intemperance; we suffer the fevers and the inflammations of lust, and we quench our souls with drunkenness: we bury our understandings in loads of meat and surfeits; and then we lie down upon our beds, and roar with pain and disquietness of our souls: nay, we kill one another's souls and bodies with violence and folly, with the effects of pride and uncharitableness; we live and die like fools, and bring a new mortality upon ourselves; wars and vexatious cares, and private duels and public disorders, and every thing that is unreasonable, and every thing that is violent: so that now we may add this fourth gate to the grave: besides nature, and chance, and the mistakes of art, men die with their own sins, and then enter into the grave in haste and passion, and pull the heavy stone of the monument upon their own heads. And thus we make ourselves like water spilt on the ground; we throw away our lives as if they were unprofitable (and indeed most men make them so); we let our years slip through our fingers like water; and nothing is to be seen but like a shower of tears upon a spot of ground; there is a grave digged, and a solemn mourning and a great talk in the neighbourhood, and when the days are finished, they shall be, and they shall be remembered no more: and that is like water too,—when it is spilt, "it cannot be gathered up again."

There is no redemption from the grave.

> —— inter se mortales mutua vivunt:
> Et, quasi cursores, vitäi lampada tradunt. LUCR.

Men live in their course and by turns; their light burns awhile, and then it burns blue and faint, and men go to converse with spirits, and then they reach the taper to another; and as the hours of yesterday can never return again, so neither can the man whose hours they were, and who lived them over once, he shall never come to live them again, and live them better. When Lazarus, and the widow's son of Nain, and Tabitha, and the saints that appeared in Jerusalem at the resurrection of our blessed Lord, arose, they came into this world, some as strangers only to make a visit, and all of them to manifest a glory: but none came upon the stock of a new life, or entered upon the stage as at first, or to perform the course of a new nature: and therefore it is observable, that we never read of any wicked person that was raised from the dead: Dives would fain have returned to his brother's house; but neither he, nor any from him could be sent: but all the rest in the New Testament (one only excepted) were expressed to have been holy persons, or else by their age were declared innocent. Lazarus was beloved of Christ: those souls that appeared at the resurrection, were the souls of saints: Tabitha, raised by St. Peter, was a charitable and a holy christian: and the maiden of twelve years old, raised by our blessed Saviour, had not entered into the regions of choice and sinfulness: and the only exception of the widow's son, is indeed none at all, for in it the Scripture is wholly silent; and therefore it is very probable that the same process was used, God, in all other instances, having chosen to exemplify his miracles of nature to purposes of the spirit, and in spiritual capacities. So that, although the Lord of nature did not break the bands of nature in some instances, to manifest his glory to succeeding great and never-failing purposes; yet (besides that this shall be no more) it was also instanced in such persons who were holy and innocent, and within the verge and comprehensions of the eternal mercy. We never read that a wicked person felt such a miracle, or was raised from the grave to try the second time for a crown; but where he fell, there he lay down dead, and saw the light no more.

This consideration I intend to you as a severe monitor and an advice of carefulness, that you order your affairs so that you may be partakers of the first resurrection; that is, from sin to grace, from the death of vicious habits to the vigour, life, and efficacy of an habitual righteousness: for (as it happened to those persons in the New Testament now mentioned, to them, I say, in the literal sense) "Blessed are they that have part in the first resurrection; upon them the second death shall have no power:" meaning that they who, by the power of Christ and his Holy Spirit were raised to life again, were holy and blessed souls, and such who were written in the book of God; and that this grace happened to no wicked and vicious person: so it is most true in the spiritual and intended sense: you only that serve God in a holy life; you who are not dead in trespasses and sins; you who serve God with an early diligence, and an unwearied industry, and a holy religion, you, and you only, shall come to life eternal, you only shall be called from death to life; the rest of mankind shall never live again, but pass from death to death; from one death to another, to a worse; from the death of the body to the eternal death of body and soul: and therefore in the Apostles' Creed there is no mention made of the resurrection of wicked persons; but of "the resurrection of the body to everlasting life." The wicked indeed shall be haled forth from their graves, from their everlasting prisons, where, in chains of darkness, they are kept unto the judgment of the great day: but this therefore cannot be called, "in sensu favoris," a resurrection; but the solemnities of the eternal death; it is nothing but a new capacity of dying again; such a dying as cannot signify rest; but where death means nothing but an intolerable and never ceasing calamity; and therefore these words of my text are otherwise to be understood of the wicked, otherwise of the godly: the wicked are spilt like water, and shall never be gathered up again; no, not in the gatherings of eternity; they shall be put into vessels of wrath, and set upon the flames of hell; but that is not a gathering, but a scattering from the face and presence of God. But the godly also come under the sense of these words: they descend into their graves, and shall no more be reckoned among the living; they have no concernment in all that is done under the sun. Agamemnon hath no more to do with the Turk's armies invading and possessing that part of Greece, where he reigned, than had the Hippocentaur, who never had a being; and Cicero hath no more interest in the present evils of christendom, than we have to do with his boasted discovery of Catiline's conspiracy. What is it to me that Rome was taken by the Gauls? and what is it now to Camillus, if different religions be tolerated amongst us? These things that now happen concern the living, and they are made the scenes of our duty or danger respectively: and when our wives are dead, and sleep in charnel-houses, they are not troubled when we laugh loudly at the songs sung at the next marriage-feast; nor do they envy when another snatches away the gleanings of their husbands' passion.

It is true, they envy not, and they lie in a bosom where there can be no murmur; and they that are consigned to kingdoms, and to the feast of the marriage-supper of the Lamb, the glorious and eternal Bridegroom of holy souls, they cannot think our marriages here, our lighter laughings and vain rejoicings, considerable, as to them. And "yet there is a relation continued still:" Aristotle said, that to affirm the dead take no thought for the good of the living, is a disparagement to the laws of that friendship, which, in their state of separation, they cannot be tempted to rescind. And the church hath taught in general, that they pray for us, they recommend to God the state of all their relatives, in the union of the intercession that our blessed Lord makes for them and us: and St. Ambrose gave some things in charge to his dying brother Satyrus, that he should do for him in the other world: he gave it him, I say, when he was dying, not when he was dead. And certain it is, that, though our dead friends' affection to us is not to be estimated according to our low conceptions, yet it is not less, but much more than ever it was; it is greater in degree, and of another kind.

But then we should do well also to remember that in this world we are something besides flesh and blood; that we may not, without violent necessities, run into new relations, but preserve the affections we bore to our dead when they were alive: we must not so live as if they were perished, but so as pressing forward to the most intimate participation of the communion of saints. And we also have some ways to express this relation, and to bear a part in this communion, by actions of intercourse with them, and yet proper to our state: such as are strictly performing the will of the dead, providing for, and tenderly and wisely educating their children, paying their debts, imitating their good example, preserving their memories privately, and publicly keeping their memorials, and desiring of God, with hearty and constant prayer, that God would give them a joyful resurrection, and a merciful judgment,—for so St. Paul prayed in behalf of Onesiphorus;[a]—that "God would show them mercy in that day;" that fearful, and yet much to be desired day, in which the most righteous person hath need of much mercy and pity, and shall find it. Now these instances of duty show, that the relation remains still; and though the relict of a man or woman hath liberty to contract new relations, yet I do not find they have liberty to cast off the old, as if there were no such thing as immortality of souls. Remember that we shall converse together again; let us therefore never do any thing of reference to them, which we shall be ashamed of in the day when all secrets shall be discovered, and that we shall meet again in the presence of God: in the mean time, God watcheth concerning all their interest, and he will, in his time, both discover and recompense. For though, as to us, they are like water spilt; yet, to God, they are as water fallen in the sea, safe and united in his comprehension and enclosures.

But we are not yet passed the consideration of the sentence: this descending to the grave is the lot of all men, "neither doth God respect the person of any man:" the rich is not protected for favour, nor the poor for pity; the old man is not reverenced for his age, nor the infant regarded for his tenderness; youth and beauty, learning and prudence, wit and strength, lie down equally in the dishonours of the grave. All men, and all natures, and all persons resist the addresses and solemnities of death, and strive to preserve a miserable and unpleasant life; and yet they all sink down and die. For so have I seen the pillars of a building, assisted with artificial props, bending under the pressure of a roof, and pertinaciously resisting the infallible and prepared ruin,

> Donec certa dies, omni compage solutâ,
> Ipsum cum rebus subruat auxilium;

"till the determined day comes, and then the burden sunk upon the pillars, and disordered the aids and auxiliary rafters into a common ruin and a ruder grave: so are the desires and weak arts of man; with little aids and assistances of care and physic, we strive to support our decaying bodies, and to put off the evil day; but quickly that day will come, and then neither angels nor men can rescue us from our grave; but the roof sinks down upon the walls, and the walls descend to the foundation; and the beauty of the face, and the dishonours of the belly, the discerning head and the servile feet, the thinking heart and the working hand, the eyes and the guts together shall be crushed into the confusion of a heap, and dwell with creatures of an equivocal production, with worms and serpents, the sons and daughters of our own bones, in a house of dirt and darkness.

Let not us think to be excepted or deferred: if beauty, or wit, or youth, or nobleness, or wealth, or virtue, could have been a defence and an excuse from the grave, we had not met here to-day to mourn upon the hearse of an excellent lady: and God only knows, for which of us next the mourners shall go about the streets, or weep in houses.

> Ζεὺς μέν που τόγε οἶδε καὶ ἀθάνατοι θεοὶ ἄλλοι,

We have lived so many years; and every day, and every minute, we make an escape from those thousands of dangers and deaths that encompass us round about: and such escapings we must reckon to be an extraordinary fortune; and, therefore, that it cannot last long. Vain are the thoughts of man, who, when he is young or healthful, thinks he hath a long thread of life to run over, and that it is violent and strange for young persons to die, and natural and proper only for the aged. It is as natural for a man to die by drowning as by a fever: and what greater violence or more unnatural thing is it, that the horse threw his rider into the river, than that a drunken meeting cast him into a fever? and the strengths of youth are as soon broken by the strong sicknesses of youth, and the stronger intemperance, as the weakness of old age by a cough, or an asthma, or a continual rheum: nay, it is more natural for young men and women to die, than for old; because that is more natural which hath more natural causes, and that is more natural which is most common: but to die with age is an extreme rare thing; and there are more persons carried forth to burial before the five and thirtieth year of their age, than after it: and, therefore, let no vain confidence make you hope for long life: if you have lived but little, and are still in youth, remember that now you are in your biggest throng of dangers, both of body and soul; and the proper sins of youth to which they rush infinitely and without consideration, are also the proper and immediate instruments of death. But if you be old, you have escaped long and wonderfully, and the time of your escaping is out: you must not for ever think to live upon wonders, or that God will work miracles to satisfy your longing follies, and unreasonable desires of living longer to sin and to the world. Go home and think to die, and what you would choose to be doing when you die, that do daily: for you will all come to that pass to rejoice that you did so, or wish that you had: that will be the condition of every one of us: for "God regardeth no man's person."

Well! but all this you will think is but a sad story. What? we must die, and go to darkness and dishonour; and we must die quickly, and we must quit all our delights, and all our sins, or do worse, infinitely worse; and this is the condition of us all, from which none can be excepted; every man shall be spilt and fall into the ground, and "be gathered up no more." Is there no comfort after all this? "shall we go from hence, and be no more seen," and have no recompence?

allay to this huge calamity? yes, there is: there is a yet in the text. "for all this, yet doth God devise means that his banished be not expelled from him:" —All this sorrow and trouble is but a phantasm, and receives its account and degrees from our present conceptions, and the proportion to our relishes and gust.

When Pompey saw the ghost of his first lady, Julia, who vexed his rest and his conscience, for superinducing Cornelia upon her bed, within the ten months of mourning, he presently fancied it, either to be an illusion, or else that death could be no very great evil:

> Aut nihil est sensûs animis in morte relictum,
> Aut mors ipsa nihil ——— LUCAN.

"Either my dead wife knows not of my unhandsome marriage, and forgetfulness of her; or if she does, then the dead live."

> ——longæ, canitis si cognita, vitæ
> Mors media est ——— Id.

"Death is nothing but the middle point between two lives, between this and another:" concerning which comfortable mystery the Holy Scripture instructs our faith, and entertains our hope in these words: God is still the "God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; for all do live to him;" and the souls of saints are with Christ: "I desire to be dissolved," (saith St. Paul,) "and to be with Christ, for that is much better:" and, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord; they rest from their labours, and their works follow them: for we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens:" and this state of separation St. Paul calls "a being absent from the body, and being present with the Lord."[b] This is one of God's means which he hath devised, that although our dead are like persons banished from this world, yet they are not expelled from God: they are "in the hands of Christ;" they are "in his presence;" they are, or shall be, "clothed with a house of God's making;" "they rest from all their labours;" "all tears are wiped from their eyes," and all discontents from their spirits; and in the state of separation, before the soul be re-invested with her new house, the spirits of all persons are with God, so secured, and so blessed, and so sealed up for glory, that this state of interval and imperfection is, in respect of its certain event and end, infinitely more desirable than all the riches, and all the pleasures, and all the vanities, and all the kingdoms of this world.

I will not venture to determine what are the circumstances of the abode of holy souls in their separate dwellings; and yet, possibly, that might be easier than to tell what or how the soul is and works in this world, where it is in the body "tanquam in alienâ domo," "as in prison," in fetters and restraints; for here the soul is discomposed and hindered; it is not as it shall be, as it ought to be, as it was intended to be; it is not permitted to its own freedom and proper operation; so that all that we can understand of it here, is, that it is so incommodated with a troubled and abated instrument, that the object we are to consider, cannot be offered to us in a right line, in just and equal propositions: or if it could, yet because we are to understand the soul by the soul, it becomes not only a troubled and abused object, but a crooked instrument; and we here can consider it just as a weak eye can behold a staff thrust into the waters of a troubled river, the very water makes a refraction, and the storm doubles the refraction, and the water of the eye doubles the species, and there is nothing right in the thing: the object is out of its just place, and the medium is troubled, and the organ is impotent: "At cum exierit, et in liberum cœlum, quasi in domum suam, venerit;" "when the soul is entered into her own house, into the free regions of the rest," and the neighbourhood of heavenly joys, then its operations are more spiritual, proper, and proportioned to its being; and, though we cannot see at such a distance, yet the object is more fitted, if we had a capable understanding; it is in itself in a more excellent and free condition.

Certain it is that the body does hinder many actions of the soul; it is an imperfect body and a diseased brain, or a violent passion, that makes fools: no man hath a foolish soul; and the reasonings of men have infinite difference and degrees, by reason of the body's constitution. Among beasts, which have no reason, there is a greater likeness than between men, who have; and as by faces it is easier to know a man from a man, than a sparrow from a sparrow, or a squirrel from a squirrel; so the difference is very great in our souls; which difference, because it is not originally in the soul, (and indeed cannot be in simple or spiritual substances of the same species or kind,) it must needs derive wholly from the body, from its accidents and circumstances; from whence it follows, that because the body casts fetters and restraints, hinderances and impediments upon the soul, that the soul is much freer in the state of separation; and if it hath any act of life, it is much more noble and expedite.

That the soul is alive after our death, St. Paul affirms: "Christ died for us, that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him."[c] Now it were strange that we should be alive, and live with Christ, and yet do no act of life: the body when it is asleep, does many; and if the soul does none, the principle is less active than the instrument; but if it does any act at all in separation, it must necessarily be an act or effect of understanding; there is nothing else it can do, but this it can; for it is but a weak and an unlearned proposition to say, that the soul can do nothing of itself, nothing without the phantasms and provisions of the body: for,

1. In this life the soul hath one principle clearly separate, abstracted, and immaterial; I mean "the spirit of grace," which is a principle of life and action, and in many instances does not at all communicate with matter, as in the infusion, superinduction, and creation of spiritual graces.

2. As nutrition, generation, eating and drinking, are actions proper to the body and its state; so ecstasies, visions, raptures, intuitive knowledge and consideration of itself, acts of volition, and reflex acts of understanding, are proper to the soul.

3. And therefore it is observable that St. Paul said, that "he knew not whether his visions and raptures were in or out of the body;" for by that we see his judgment of the thing, that one was as likely as the other, neither of them impossible or unreasonable; and therefore, that the soul is as capable of action alone as in conjunction.

4. If in the state of blessedness, there are some actions of the soul which do not pass through the body, such as contemplation of God, and conversing with spirits, and receiving those influences and rare immissions, which coming from the holy and mysterious Trinity, make up the crown of glory; it follows that the necessity of the body's ministry is but during the state of this life, and as long as it converses with fire and water, and lives with corn and flesh, and is fed by the satisfaction of material appetites; which necessity and manner of conversation, when it ceases, it can be no longer necessary for the soul to be served by phantasms and material representations.

5. And therefore, when the body shall be reunited, it shall be so ordered that then the body shall confess it gives not any thing, but receives all its being and operation, its manner and abode, from the soul; and that then it comes not to serve a necessity, but to partake a glory: for as the operations of the soul, in this life, begin in the body, and by it the object is transmitted to the soul; so then they shall begin in the soul, and pass to the body; and as the operations of the soul, by reason of its dependence on the body, are animal, natural, and material; so in the resurrection, the body shall be spiritual, by reason of the pre-eminence, influence, and prime operation of the soul. Now between these two states stands the state of separation, in which the operations of the soul are of a middle nature, that is, not so spiritual as in the resurrection, and not so animal and natural as in the state of conjunction.

To all which I add this consideration, that our souls have the same condition that Christ's soul had in the state of separation, because he took on him all our nature, and all our condition; and it is certain, Christ's soul, in the three days of his separation, did exercise acts of life, of joy and triumph, and did not sleep, but visited the souls of the fathers, trampled upon the pride of devils, and satisfied those longing souls which were prisoners of hope: and from all this we may conclude, that the souls of all the servants of Christ are alive, and therefore do the actions of life, and proper to their state; and, therefore, it is highly probable that the soul works clearer, and understands brighter, and discourses wiser, and rejoices louder, and loves nobler, and desires purer, and hopes stronger, than it can do here.

But if these arguments should fail, yet the felicity of God's saints cannot fail: for suppose the body to be a necessary instrument, but out of tune and discomposed by sin and anger, by accident and chance, by defect and imperfections, yet that it is better than none at all; and that if the soul works imperfectly with an imperfect body, that then she works not at all when she hath none: and suppose also that the soul should be as much without sense or perception in death, as it is in a deep sleep, which is the image and shadow of death; yet then God devises other means that his banished be not expelled from him. For,

2. God will restore the soul to the body, and raise the body to such a perfection, that it shall be an organ fit to praise him upon; it shall be made spiritual to minister to the soul, when the soul is turned into a spirit; then the soul shall be brought forth by angels from her incomparable and easy bed, from her rest in Christ's holy bosom, and be made perfect in her being, and in all her operations: and this shall first appear by that perfection, which the soul shall receive, as instrumental to the last judgment; for then she shall see clearly all the records of this world, all the register of her own memory: for all that we did in this life is laid up in our memories; and though dust and forgetfulness be drawn upon them, yet when God shall lift us from our dust, then shall appear clearly all that we have done, written in the tables of our conscience, which is the soul's memory. We see many times, and in many instances, that a great memory is hindered and put out, and we, thirty years after, come to think of something that lay so long under a curtain; we think of it suddenly, and without a line of deduction, or proper consequence: and all those famous memories of Simonides and Theodactes, of Hortensius and Seneca, of Sceptius, Metrodorus, and Carneades, of Cyneas the ambassador of Pyrrhus, are only the records better kept, and less disturbed by accident and disease: for even the memory of Herod's son of Athens, of Bathyllus, and the dullest person now alive, is so great, and by God made so sure a record of all that ever he did, that as soon as ever God shall but tune our instrument, and draw the curtains, and but light up the candle of immortality, there we shall find it all, there we shall see all, and the whole world shall see all; then we shall be made fit to converse with God after the manner of spirits, we shall be like to angels.

In the mean time, although upon the persuasion of the former discourse, it be highly probable that the souls of God's servants do live in a state of present blessedness, and in the exceeding joys of a certain expectation of the revelation of the day of the Lord, and the coming of Jesus; yet it will concern us only to secure our state by holy living, and leave the event to God, that (as St. Paul said) "whether present or absent, whether sleeping or waking," whether perceiving or perceiving not, "we may be accepted of him;" that when we are banished this world, and from the light of the sun, we may not be expelled from God, and from the light of his countenance, but that, from our beds of sorrow, our souls may pass into the bosom of Christ, and from thence to his right hand in the day of sentence: "For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ;" and then if we have done well in the body, we shall never be expelled from the beatifical presence of God, but be domestics of his family, and heirs of his kingdom, and partakers of his glory. Amen.

I have now done with my text, but yet am to make you another sermon. I have told you the necessity and the state of death, it may be too largely for such a sad story; I shall, therefore, now with a better compendium teach you how to live, by telling you a plain narrative of a life, which if you imitate, and write after the copy, it will make that death shall not be an evil, but a thing to be desired, and to be reckoned among the purchases and advantages of your fortune. When Martha and Mary went to weep over the grave of their brother, Christ met them there, and preached a funeral sermon, discoursing of the resurrection, and applying to the purposes of faith, and confession of Christ, and glorification of God. We have no other, we can have no better precedent to follow: and now that we are come to weep over the grave of our dear sister, this rare personage, we cannot choose but have many virtues to learn, many to imitate, and some to exercise.

I choose not to declare her extraction and genealogy; it was indeed fair and honourable; but having the blessing to be descended from worthy and honoured ancestors, and herself to be adopted and ingrafted into a more noble family; yet she felt such outward appendages to be none of hers, because not of her choice; but the purchase of the virtues of others, which although they did engage her to do noble things, yet they would upbraid all degenerate and less honourable lives than were those, which began and increased the honour of the families. She did not love her fortune for making her noble; but thought it would be a dishonour to her, if she did not continue a nobleness and excellency of virtue fit to be owned by persons relating to such ancestors. It is fit for us all to honour the nobleness of a family; but it is also fit for them that are noble, to despise it, and to establish their honour upon the foundation of doing excellent things, and suffering in good causes, and despising dishonourable actions, and in communicating good things to others: for this is the rule in nature; those creatures are most honourable, which have the greatest power and do the greatest good; and accordingly myself have been a witness of it, how this excellent lady would, by an act of humility and christian abstraction, strip herself of all that fair appendage and exterior honour, which decked her person and her fortune, and desired to be owned by nothing but what was her own, that she might only be esteemed honourable according to that which is the honour of a christian and a wise man.

2. She had a strict and severe education, and it was one of God's graces and favours to her: for being the heiress of a great fortune, and living amongst the throng of persons, in the sight of vanities and empty temptations, that is, in that part of the kingdom where greatness is too often expressed in great follies and great vices, God had provided a severe and angry education to chastise the forwardnesses of a young spirit and a fair fortune, that she might for ever be so far distant from a vice, that she might only see it and loathe it, but never taste of it, so much as to be put to her choice whether she would be virtuous or no. God intending to secure this soul to himself, would not suffer the follies of the world to seize upon her, by way of too near a trial, or busy temptation.

3. She was married young; and besides her businesses of religion, seemed to be ordained in the providence of God to bring to this honourable family a part of her fair fortune, and to leave behind her a fairer issue, worth ten thousand times her portion: and as if this had been all the public business of her life, when she had so far served God's ends, God in mercy would also serve hers, and take her to an early blessedness.

4. In passing through which line of providence, she had the art to secure her eternal interest, by turning her condition into duty, and expressing her duty in the greatest eminency of a virtuous, prudent, and rare affection, that hath been known in any example. I will not give her so low a testimony, as to say only that she was chaste; she was a person of that severity, modesty, and close religion, as to that particular, that she was not capable of uncivil temptation; and you might as well have suspected the sun to smell of the poppy that he looks on, as that she could have been a person apt to be sullied by the breath of a foul question.

5. But that which I shall note in her, is that which I would have exemplar to all ladies, and to all women: she had a love so great for her lord, so entirely given up to a dear affection, that she thought the same things, and loved the same loves, and hated according to the same enmities, and breathed in his soul, and lived in his presence, and languished in his absence; and all that she was or did, was only for, and to, her dearest lord:

> Si gaudet, si flet, si tacet, hunc loquitur;
> Cœnat, propinat, poscit, negat, innuit, unus
> Nævius est: —— MARTIAL.

And although this was a great enamel to the beauty of her soul, yet it might in some degrees be also a reward to the virtue of her lord: for she would often discourse it to them that conversed with her, that he would improve that interest which he had in her affection, to the advantages of God and of religion; and she would delight to say, that he called her to her devotions, he encouraged her good inclinations, he directed her piety, he invited her with good books; and then she loved religion, which she saw was not only pleasing to God, and an act or state of duty, but pleasing to her lord, and an act also of affection and conjugal obedience; and what at first she loved the more forwardly for his sake, in the using of religion, left such relishes upon her spirit, that she found in it amability enough to make her love it for its own. So God usually brings us to him by instruments of nature and affections, and then incorporates us into his inheritance by the more immediate relishes of heaven, and the secret things of the Spirit. He only was (under God) the light of her eyes, and the cordial of her spirits, and the guide of her actions, and the measure of her affections, till her affections swelled up into a religion, and then it could go no higher, but was confederate with those other duties which made her dear to God: which rare combination of duty and religion, I choose to express in the words of Solomon; "She forsook not the guide of her youth, nor brake the covenant of her God."[d]

6. As she was a rare wife, so she was an excellent mother: for in so tender a constitution of spirit as hers was, and in so great a kindness towards her children, there hath seldom been seen a stricter and more curious care of their persons, their deportment, their nature, their disposition, their learning, and their customs: and if ever kindness and care did contest and make parties in her, yet her care and her severity was ever victorious; and she knew not how to do an ill turn to their severer part, by her more tender and forward kindness. And as her custom was, she turned this also into love to her lord: for she was not only diligent to have them bred nobly and religiously, but also was careful and solicitous, that they should be taught to observe all the circumstances and inclinations, the desires and wishes of their father; as thinking that virtue to have no good circumstances, which was not dressed by his copy, and ruled by his lines and his affections: and her prudence in the managing her children was so singular and rare, that whenever you mean to bless this family, and pray a hearty and a profitable prayer for it, beg of God, that the children may have those excellent things which she designed to them, and provided for them in her heart and wishes; that they may live by her purposes, and may grow thither, whither she would fain have brought them. All these were great parts of an excellent religion, as they concerned her greatest temporal relations.

7. But if we examine how she demeaned herself towards God, there also you will find her not of a common, but of an exemplar piety: she was a great reader of Scripture, confining herself to great proportions every day; which she read, not to the purposes of vanity, and impertinent curiosities, not to seem knowing, or to become talking, not to expound and rule; but to teach her all her duty, to instruct her in the knowledge and love of God and of her neighbours; to make her more humble, and to teach her to despise the world and all its gilded vanities; and that she might entertain passions wholly in design and order to heaven. I have seen a female religion that wholly dwelt upon the face and tongue; that like a wanton and an undressed tree, spends all its juice in suckers and irregular branches, in leaves and gum, and after all such goodly outsides, you should never eat an apple, or be delighted with the beauties or the perfumes of a hopeful blossom. But the religion of this excellent lady was of another constitution; it took root downward in humility, and brought forth fruit upward in the substantial graces of a christian, in charity and justice, in chastity and modesty, in fair friendships and sweetness of society: she had not very much of the forms and outsides of godliness, but she was hugely careful for the power of it, for the moral, essential, and useful parts; such which would make her be, not seem to be, religious.

8. She was a very constant person at her prayers, and spent all her time, which nature did permit to her choice, in her devotions, and reading, and meditating, and the necessary offices of household government; every one of which is an action of religion, some by nature, some by adoption. To these, also, God gave her a very great love to hear the word of God preached; in which, because I had sometimes the honour to minister to her, I can give this certain testimony, that she was a diligent, watchful, and attentive hearer: and to this, had so excellent a judgment, that if ever I saw a woman whose judgment was to be revered, it was hers alone: and I have sometimes thought that the eminency of her discerning faculties did reward a pious discourse, and placed it in the regions of honour and usefulness, and gathered it up from the ground, where commonly such homilies are spilt, or scattered in neglect and inconsideration. But her appetite was not soon satisfied with what was useful to her soul: she was also a constant reader of sermons, and seldom missed to read one every day; and that she might be full of instruction and holy principles, she had lately designed to have a large book, in which she purposed to have a stock of religion transcribed in such assistances as she would choose, that she might be "readily furnished and instructed to every good work." But God prevented that, and hath filled her desires, not out of cisterns and little aqueducts, but hath carried her to the fountain, where "she drinks of the pleasures of the river," and is full of God.

9. She always lived a life of much innocence, free from the violences of great sins; her person, her breeding, her modesty, her honour, her religion, her early marriage, the guide of her soul, and the guide of her youth, were as so many fountains of restraining grace to her, to keep her from the dishonours of a crime. "Bonum est portare jugum ab adolescentiâ: "It is good to bear the yoke of the Lord from our youth:" and though she did so, being guarded by a mighty Providence, and a great favour and grace of God, from staining her fair soul with the spots of hell, yet she had strange fears and early cares upon her; but these were not only for herself, but in order to others, to her nearest relatives: for she was so great a lover of this honourable family, of which now she was a mother, that she desired to become a channel of great blessings to it unto future ages, and was extremely jealous lest any thing should be done, or lest any thing had been done, though an age or two since, which should entail a curse upon the innocent posterity; and, therefore, (although I do not know that ever she was tempted with an offer of the crime,) yet she did infinitely remove all sacrilege from her thoughts, and delighted to see her estate of a clear and disentangled interest: she would have no mingled rights with it; she would not receive any thing from the church, but religion and a blessing; and she never thought a curse and a sin far enough off, but would desire it to be infinitely distant; and that as to this family God had given much honour, and a wise head to govern it, so he would also for ever give many more blessings: and because she knew the sins of parents descend upon children, she endeavoured, by justice and religion, by charity and honour, to secure that her channel should convey nothing but health, and a fair example, and a blessing.

10. And though her accounts to God were made up of nothing but small parcels, little passions, and angry words, and trifling discontents, which are the allays of the piety of the most holy persons; yet she was early at her repentance; and toward the latter end of her days grew so fast in religion, as if she had had a revelation of her approaching end, and, therefore, that she must go a great way in a little time: her discourses more full of religion, her prayers more frequent, her charity increasing, her forgiveness more forward, her friendships more communicative, her passion more under discipline; and so she trimmed her lamp, not thinking her night was so near, but that it might shine also in the daytime, in the temple, and before the altar of incense.

But in this course of hers there were some circumstances, and some appendages of substance, which were highly remarkable.

1. In all her religion, and in all her actions of relation towards God, she had a strange evenness and untroubled passage, sliding toward her ocean of God and of infinity, with a certain and silent motion. So have I seen a river, deep and smooth, passing with a still foot and a sober face, and paying to the "fiscus," the great "exchequer" of the sea, the prince of all the watery bodies, a tribute large and full; and hard by it, a little brook skipping and making a noise upon its unequal and neighbour bottom; and after all its talking and bragged motion, it paid to its common audit no more than the revenues of a little cloud, or a contemptible vessel: so have I sometimes compared the issues of her religion to the solemnities and famed outsides of another's piety. It dwelt upon her spirit, and was incorporated with the periodical work of every day: she did not believe that religion was intended to minister to fame and reputation, but to pardon of sins, to the pleasure of God, and the salvation of souls. For religion is like the breath of heaven; if it goes abroad into the open air, it scatters and dissolves like camphire; but if it enters into a secret hollowness, into a close conveyance, it is strong and mighty, and comes forth with vigour and great effect at the other end, at the other side of this life, in the days of death and judgment.

2. The other appendage of her religion, which also was a great ornament to all the parts of her life, was a rare modesty and humility of spirit, a confident despising and undervaluing of herself. For though she had the greatest judgment, and the greatest experience of things and persons, that I ever yet knew in a person of her youth, and sex, and circumstances; yet, as if she knew nothing of it, she had the meanest opinion of herself; and like a fair taper, when she shined to all the room, yet round about her own station, she had cast a shadow and a cloud, and she shined to every body but herself. But the perfectness of her prudence and excellent parts could not be hid; and all her humility, and arts of concealment, made the virtues more amiable and illustrious. For as pride sullies the beauty of the fairest virtues, and makes our understanding but like the craft and learning of a devil; so humility is the greatest eminency, and art of publication in the whole world; and she, in all her arts of secrecy and hiding her worthy things, was but "like one that hideth the wind, and covers the ointment of her right hand."

I know not by what instrument it happened; but when death drew near, before it made any show upon her body, or revealed itself by a natural signification, it was conveyed to her spirit: she had a strange secret persuasion that the bringing this child should be her last scene of life: and we have known, that the soul, when she is about to disrobe herself of her upper garment, sometimes speaks rarely; "Magnifica verba mors propè admota excutit;"[c] sometimes it is prophetical; sometimes God, by a superinduced persuasion wrought by instruments, or accidents of his own, serves the ends of his own providence, and the salvation of the soul: but so it was, that the thought of death dwelt long with her, and grew from the first steps of fancy and fear, to a consent,—from thence to a strange credulity, and expectation of it; and without the violence of sickness she died, as if she had done it voluntarily, and by design, and for fear her expectation should have been deceived; or that she should seem to have had an unreasonable fear or apprehension; or rather, as one said of Cato, "Sic abiit è vitâ, ut causam moriendi nactam se esse gauderet;" "she died as if she had been glad of the opportunity."

And in this I cannot but adore the providence and admire the wisdom and infinite mercies of God; for having a tender and soft, a delicate and fine constitution and breeding, she was tender to pain, and apprehensive of it as a child's shoulder is of a load and burden: "Grave est teneræ cervici jugum:" and in her often discourses of death, which she would renew willingly and frequently, she would tell, that "she feared not death, but she feared the sharp pains of death:" "Emori nolo, me esse mortuam non curo." The being dead, and being freed from the troubles and dangers of this world, she hoped would be for her advantage, and therefore, that was no part of her fear; but she believing the pangs of death were great, and the use and aids of reason little, had reason to fear lest they should do violence to her spirit, and the decency of her resolution. But God, that knew her fears and her jealousy concerning herself, fitted her with a death so easy, so harmless, so painless, that it did not put her patience to a severe trial. It was not in all appearance of so much trouble as two fits of a common ague, so careful was God to demonstrate to all that stood in that sad attendance, that this soul was dear to him,—and that since she had done so much of her duty towards it, he that began would also finish her redemption by an act of a rare providence and a singular mercy. Blessed be that goodness of God, who does such careful actions of mercy for the ease and security of his servants! But this one instance was a great demonstration, that the apprehension of death is worse than the pains of death; and that God loves to reprove the unreasonableness of our fears, by the mightiness and by the arts of his mercy.

She had in her sickness, if I may so call it,—or rather in the solemnities and graver preparations towards death,—some curious and well-becoming fears concerning the final state of her soul; but from thence she passed into a "deliquium," or "a kind of trance;" and as soon as she came forth of it, as if it had been a vision, or that she had conversed with an angel, and from his hand had received a label or scroll of the book of life, and there seen her name enrolled, she cried out aloud, "Glory be to God on high! now I am sure I shall be saved." Concerning which manner of discoursing we are wholly ignorant what judgment can be made; but, certainly, there are strange things in the other world, and so there are in all the immediate preparations to it; and a little glimpse of heaven, a minute's conversing with an angel, any ray of God, any communication extraordinary from the spirit of comfort, which God gives to his servants in strange and unknown manners, are infinitely far from illusions, and they shall then be understood by us when we feel them, and when our new and strange needs shall be refreshed by such unusual visitations.

But I must be forced to use summaries and arts of abbreviature in the enumerating those things, in which this rare personage was dear to God and to all her relatives.

If we consider her person, she was in the flower of her age, "jucundum cum ætas florida ver ageret;"[f] of a temperate, plain, and natural diet, without curiosity or an intemperate palate; she spent less time in dressing than many servants; her recreations were little and seldom, her prayers often, her reading much; she was of a most noble and charitable soul, a great lover of honourable actions, and as great a despiser of base things; hugely loving to oblige others, and very unwilling to be in arrear to any upon the stock of courtesies and liberality; so free in all acts of favour, that she would not stay to hear herself thanked, as being unwilling that what good went from her to a needful or an obliged person, should ever return to her again. She was an excellent friend, and hugely dear to very many, especially to the best and most discerning persons; to all that conversed with her, and could understand her great worth and sweetness. She was of an honourable, a nice and tender reputation; and of the pleasures of this world, which were laid before her in heaps, she took a very small and inconsiderable share, as not loving to glut herself with vanity, or take her portion of good things here below.

[f] Catullus.

If we look on her as a wife, she was chaste and loving, fruitful and discreet, humble and pleasant, witty and compliant, rich and fair; and wanted nothing to the making her a principal and precedent to the best wives of the world, but a long life and a full age.

If we remember her as a mother, she was kind and severe, careful and prudent, very tender, and not at all fond; a greater lover of her children's souls than of their bodies, and one that would value them more by the strict rules of honour and proper worth, than by their relation to herself.

Her servants found her prudent and fit to govern, and yet open-handed and apt to reward; a just exactor of their duty, and a great rewarder of their diligence.

She was in her house a comfort to her dearest lord, a guide to her children, a rule to her servants, an example to all.

But as she related to God in the offices of religion, she was even and constant, silent and devout, prudent and material; she loved what she now enjoys, and she feared what she never felt, and God did for her what she never did expect; her fears went beyond all her evil; and yet the good which she hath received, was, and is, and ever shall be, beyond all her hopes.

She lived as we all should live, and she died as I fain would die:

> Cum mihi supremos Lachesis perneverit annos,
> Non aliter cineres mando jacere meos. MART.

I pray God I may feel those mercies on my deathbed that she felt, and that I may feel the same effect of my repentance which she feels of the many degrees of her innocence. Such was her death, that she did not die too soon; and her life was so useful and excellent, that she could not have lived too long: "Nemo parum diu vixit, qui virtutis perfectæ perfecto functus est munere." And as now in the grave it shall not be inquired concerning her, how long she lived, but how well; so to us who live after her, to suffer a longer calamity,— it may be some ease to our sorrows, and some guide to our lives, and some security to our conditions, to consider that God hath brought the piety of a young lady to the early rewards of a never-ceasing and never-dying eternity of glory. And we also, if we live as she did, shall partake of the same glories; not only having the honour of a good name and a dear and honoured memory, but the glories of these glories, the end of all excellent labours, and all prudent counsels, and all holy religion, even the salvation of our souls, in that day when all the saints, and among them this excellent woman, shall be shown to all the world to have done more, and more excellent things than we know of, or can describe. "Mors illos consecrat, quorum exitum, et qui timent, laudant:" "death consecrates and makes sacred that person, whose excellency was such, that they that are not displeased at the death, cannot dispraise the life; but they that mourn sadly, think they can never commend sufficiently."

SERMON IX.

PREACHED IN

ST. MARY'S CHURCH, OXFORD,

UPON

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE GUNPOWDER TREASON.

TO THE

MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

WILLIAM,

BY DIVINE PROVIDENCE,

LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY,

HIS GRACE,

PRIMATE OF ALL ENGLAND, AND METROPOLITAN, CHANCELLOR OF THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, AND ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY COUNCIL.

My most honourable good Lord;

May it please your Grace,

It was obedience to my superior, that engaged me upon this last anniversary commemoration of the great goodness of God Almighty to our king and country, in the discovery of the most damnable powder-treason. It was a blessing which no tongue could express, much less mine, which had scarce learned to speak,—at least, was most unfit to speak in the schools of the prophets. "Delicata autem est illa obedientia, quæ causas quærit." It had been no good argument of my obedience to have disputed the inconvenience of my person, and the unaptness of my parts, for such an employment. I knew God, out of the mouth of infants, could acquire his praise, and if my heart were actually as votive as my tongue should have been, it might be one of God's "magnalia" to perfect his own praise out of the weakness and imperfection of the organ. So as I was able, I endeavoured to perform it, having my obedience ever ready for my excuse to men, and my willingness to perform my duty, for the assoilment of myself before God; part of which I hope was accepted, and I have no reason to think that the other was not pardoned.

When I first thought of the barbarism of this treason, I wondered not so much at the thing itself, as by what means it was possible for the devil to gain so strong a party in men's resolutions, as to move them to undertake a business so abhorring from christianity, so evidently full of extreme danger to their lives, and so certainly to incur the highest wrath of God Almighty. My thoughts were thus rude at first; but, after a strict inquisition, I found it was apprehended as a business, perhaps, full of danger to their bodies, but advantageous to their souls, consonant to the obligation of all christians, and meritorious of an exceeding weight of glory; for now it was come to pass, which our dear Master foretold, "Men should kill us, and think they did God good service in it." I could not think this to be a part of any man's religion, nor do I yet believe it. For it is so apparently destructive of our dear Master's royal laws of charity and obedience, that I must not be so uncharitable as to think they speak their own mind truly, when they profess their belief of the lawfulness and necessity, in some cases, of rebelling against their lawful prince, and using all means to throw him from his kingdom, though it be by taking of his life. But it is but just that they who break the bonds of duty to their prince, should likewise forfeit the laws of charity to themselves, and if they say not true, yet to be more uncharitable to their own persons, than I durst be, though I had their own warrant. Briefly, Most Reverend Father, I found amongst them of the Roman party such prevailing opinions, as could not consist with loyalty to their prince, in case he were not the pope's subject; and these so generally believed, and [illegible] peril of their souls, that I could not but point at these dangerous rocks, at which, I doubt not, but the loyalty of many hath suffered shipwreck, and of thousands more might, if a higher star had not guided them better than their own pilots.

I could not, therefore, but think it very likely, that this treason might spring from the same fountain; and I had concluded so in my first meditations, but that I was willing to consider, whether or no it might not be, that these men were rather exasperated than persuaded,—and whether it were not that the severity of our laws against them might rather provoke their intemperate zeal, than religion thus move their settled conscience. It was a material consideration, because they ever did, and still do, fill the world with outcries against our laws, for making a rape upon their consciences; have printed catalogues of their English martyrs; drawn schemes of most strange tortures imposed on their priests, such as were unimaginable by Nero, or Dioclesian, or any of the worst and cruelest enemies of christianity, endeavouring thus to make us partly guilty of our own ruin, and so washing their hands, in token of their own innocence, even then when they were dipping them in the blood royal, and would have emptied the best veins in the whole kingdom to fill their lavatory. But I found all these to be but calumnies, strong accusations, upon weak presumptions, and that the cause did rest where I had begun, I mean upon the pretence of the Catholic cause, and that the imagined iniquity of the laws of England could not be made a veil to cover the deformity of their intentions, for our laws were just, honourable, and religious.

Concerning these and some other appendices to the business of the day, I expressed some part of my thoughts, which because happily they were but a just truth, and this truth not unseasonable for these last times, in which (as St. Paul prophesied) "Men would be fierce, traitors, heady and high-minded, creeping into houses, leading silly women captive;" it pleased some who had power to command me, to wish me to a publication of these my short and sudden meditations, that, if it were possible, even this way, I might express my duty to God and the king.

Being thus far encouraged, I resolved to go something further, even to the boldness of a dedication to your Grace, that since I had no merit of my own, to move me to the confidence of a public view, yet I might dare to venture under the protection of your Grace's favour. But since my boldness doth as much need a defence, as my sermon a patronage, I humbly crave leave to say, that though it be boldness, even to presumption, yet my address to your Grace is not altogether unreasonable.

For since all know that your Grace thinks not your life your own, but when it spends itself in the service of your king, opposing your great endeavours against the zealots of both sides, who labour the disturbance of the church and state, I could not think it ἀπροσδιόνυσον to present to your Grace this short discovery of the king's enemies, ὡς ἐπικουρίαν βασιλικὴν φιλοβασιλεῖ, and proper to your Grace, who is so true, so zealous a lover of your prince and country. It was likewise appointed to be the public voice of thanksgiving for your University, (though she never spake weaker than by so mean an instrument,) and, therefore, is accountable to your Grace, to whom, under God and the king, we owe the blessing and prosperity of all our studies. Nor yet can I choose but hope, that my great obligations to your Grace's favour may plead my pardon (since it is better that my gratitude should be bold, than my diffidence ungrateful): but that this is so far from expressing the least part of them, that it lays a greater bond upon me, either for a debt of delinquency in presenting it, or of thankfulness, if your Grace may please to pardon it.

I humbly crave your Grace's benediction, pardon, and acceptance of the humblest duty and observance of

Your Grace's

Most observant and obliged Chaplain,

JER. TAYLOR.

SERMON.

But when James and John saw this, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did?—Luke ix. 54.

I SHALL not need to strain much to bring my text and the day together. Here is "fire," in the text, "consuming fire," like that whose "Antevorta" we do this day commemorate. This fire called for by the disciples of Christ; so was ours too, by Christ's disciples at least, and some of them entitled to our great Master by the compellation of his holy name of Jesus.

I would say the parallel holds thus far, but that the persons of my text, however "Boanerges," "sons of thunder," and of a reprovable spirit, yet are no way considerable in the proportion of malice with the persons of the day. For if I consider the cause that moved James and John to so inconsiderate a wrath, it bears a fair excuse:[a] the men of Samaria turned their Lord and Master out of doors, denying to give a night's lodging to the Lord of heaven and earth. It would have disturbed an excellent patience to see him, whom but just before they beheld transfigured, and in a glorious epiphany upon the mount, to be so neglected by a company of hated Samaritans, as to be forced to keep his vigils where nothing but the welkin should have been his roof, not any thing to shelter his precious head from the descending dew of heaven.

——— Quis talia fando
Temperet? Æn.

It had been the greater wonder if they had not been angry. But now if we should level our progress by the same line, and guess that in the present affair there was an equal cause, because a greater fire was intended,—we shall too much betray the ingenuity of apparent truth, and the blessing of this anniversary. They had not half such a cause for an excuse to a far greater malice, it will prove they had none at all; and, therefore, their malice was so much the more malicious, because causeless and totally inexcusable.

However, I shall endeavour to join their consideration in as near a parallel as I can; which if it be not exact,—as certainly it cannot, where we have already discovered so much difference in degrees of malice, yet, by laying them together, we may better take their estimate, though it be only by seeing their disproportion.

The words, as they lay in their own order, point out, 1. The persons that asked the question. 2. The cause that moved them. 3. The person to whom they propounded it. 4. The question itself. 5. And the precedent they urged to move a grant, drawn from a very fallible topic, a singular example, in a special and different case. The persons here were Christ's disciples, and so they are in our case, designed to us by that glorious surname of christianity: they will be called catholics; but if our discovery perhaps rise higher, and that the see apostolic prove sometimes guilty of so reprovable a spirit, then we are very near to a parallel of the persons, for they were disciples of Christ and apostles. 2. The cause was the denying of toleration of abode upon the grudge of an old schism; religion was made the instrument. That which should have taught the apostles to be charitable, and the Samaritans hospitable, was made a pretence to justify the unhospitableness of the one, and the uncharitableness of the other. Thus far we are right; for the malice of this present treason stood upon the same base. 3. Although neither side much doubted of the lawfulness of their proceedings, yet St. James and St. John were so discreet as not to think themselves infallible, therefore they asked their Lord: so did the persons of the day ask the question too, but not of Christ, for he was not in all their thoughts; but yet they asked of Christ's delegates, who, therefore, should have given their answer "ex eodem tripode," from the same spirit. They were the fathers confessors who were asked. 4. The question is of both sides concerning a consumptive sacrifice, the destruction of a town there, of a whole kingdom here, but differing in the circumstance of place whence they would fetch their fire. The apostles would have had it from heaven, but these men's conversation was not there. Τὰ κάτωθεν, "things from beneath," from an artificial hell, but breathed from the natural and proper, were in all their thoughts. 5. The example, which is the last particular, I fear I must leave quite out; and when you have considered all, perhaps you will look for no example.

First of the persons; they were disciples of Christ and apostles: "But when James and John saw this." When first I considered they were apostles, I wondered they should be so intemperately angry; but when I perceived they were so angry, I wondered not that they sinned. Not the privilege of an apostolical spirit, not the nature of angels, not the condition of immortality, can guard from the danger of sin; but if we be overruled by passion, we almost subject ourselves to its necessity. It was not, therefore, without reason altogether, that the Stoics affirmed wise men to be void of passions; for sure I am, the inordination of any passion is the first step to folly. And although of them, as of waters of a muddy residence, we may make good use, and quench our thirst, if we do not trouble them; yet upon any ungentle disturbance we drink down mud instead of a clear stream, and the issues of sin and sorrow, certain consequents of temerarious or inordinate anger. And, therefore, when the apostle had given us leave to "be angry," as knowing the condition of human nature, he quickly enters a caveat that "we sin not;" he knew sin was very likely to be hand-maid where anger did domineer, and this was the reason why St. James and St. John are the men here pointed at; for the Scripture notes them for "Boanerges," "sons of thunder," men of an angry temper, "et quid mirum est filios tonitru fulgurâsse voluisse?" said St. Ambrose. But there was more in it than thus. Their spirits, of themselves hot enough, yet met with their education under the law, whose first tradition was in fire and thunder, whose precepts were just, but not so merciful; and this inflamed their distemper to the height of a revenge. It is the doctrine of St. Jerome[b] and Titus Bostrensis,[c] —the law had been their schoolmaster, and taught them the rules of justice, both punitive and vindictive; but Christ was the first that taught it to be a sin to retaliate evil with evil; it was a doctrine they could not read in the killing letter of the law. There they might meet with precedents of revenge and anger of a high severity, "an eye for an eye," and "a tooth for a tooth," and "let him be cut off from his people:" but forgiving injuries, praying for our persecutors, loving our enemies, and relieving them, were doctrines of such high and absolute integrity, as were to be reserved for the best and most perfect lawgiver, the bringer of the best promises, to which the most perfect actions have the best proportion, and this was to be when Shiloh came. Now then the spirit of Elias is out of date,

——— Jam ferrea primum

[c] In Lucam.

And, therefore, our blessed Master reproved them of ignorance, not of the law, but of his Spirit, which had they but known or could but have guessed at the end of his coming, they had not been such abecedarii in the school of mercy.

And now we shall not need to look far for persons, disciples professing at least in Christ's school, yet as great strangers to the merciful spirit of our Saviour, as if they had been sons of the law, or foster-brothers to Romulus, and sucked a wolf; and they are Romanists too: this day's solemnity presents them to us, πηλὸς αἵματι συμπεφυρμένος;[e] and yet were that washed off, underneath they write Christian and Jesuit.

One would have expected that such men, set forth to the world's acceptance with so merciful a "cognomentum," should have put a hand to support the ruinous fabric of the world's charity, and not have pulled the frame of heaven and earth about our ears. But yet,—"Ne credite, Teucri!" Give me leave first to make an inquisition after this antichristian pravity, and try who is of our side, and who loves the king, by pointing at those whose sermons do blast loyalty, breathing forth treason, slaughters, and cruelty, the greatest imaginable contrariety to the spirit and doctrine of our dear Master. So we shall quickly find out more than a pareil for St. James and St. John, the Boanerges of my text.

"It is an act of faith, by faith to conquer the enemies of God and holy church," saith Sanders, our countryman.[f] Hitherto nothing but well; if James and John had offered to do no more than what they could have done with "the sword of the Spirit, and the shield of faith," they might have been inculpable, and so had he if he had said no more; but the blood boils higher, the manner spoils all. "For it is not well done, unless a warlike captain be appointed by Christ's vicar to bear a crusade in a field of blood." And if the other apostles did not proceed such an angry way as James and John, it was only discretion that detained them, not religion. "For so they might, and it were no way unlawful for them to bear arms to propagate religion, had they not wanted an opportunity;" if you believe the same author: "for fighting is proper for St. Peter and his successors, therefore, because Christ gave him commission to feed his lambs."[g] A strange reason!

I had thought Christ would have his lambs fed with the sincere milk of his word, not like to cannibals,

> ——solitisque cruentum
> Lac potare Getis, et pocula tingere venis,

To mingle blood in their sacrifices, (as Herod to the Galileans,) and quaff it off for an "auspicium" to the propagation of the christian faith. Methinks here is already too much clashing of armour, and effusion of blood, for a christian cause; but this were not altogether so unchristian-like, if the sheep, though with blood, yet were not to be fed with the blood of their shepherd Cyrus, I mean their princes. But I find many such "nutritii" in the nurseries of Rome, driving their lambs from their folds, unless they will be taught to worry the lion.

Emanuel Sà, in his Aphorisms, affirms it lawful to kill a king; indeed not every king, but such a one as rules with tyranny; and not then, unless the pope hath sentenced him to death, but then he may, though he be his lawful prince.[h] Not the necessitude which the law of nations hath put between prince and people, not the obligation of the oath of allegiance, not the sanctions of God Almighty himself, must reverse the sentence against the king when once passed; but any one of his subjects, of his own sworn subjects, may kill him.

This perfidious treasonable position of Sà is not a single testimony. For 1. it slipped not from his pen by inadvertency; it was not made public until after forty years' deliberation, as himself testifies in his preface.[i] 2. After such an avisamente, it is now the ordinary received manual for the fathers confessors of the Jesuits' order.

This doctrine, although—"Titulo res digna sepulcri"—yet is nothing if compared with Mariana.[k] For 1. he affirms the same doctrine in substance. 2. Then he descends to the very manner of it, ordering how it may be done with the best convenience: he thinks poison to be the best way, but yet that, for the more secrecy, it be cast upon the chairs, saddles, and garments of his prince. It was the old laudable custom of the Moors of Spain.[l] 3. He adds examples of the business, telling us that this was the device, to wit, by poisoned boots, that old Henry of Castile was cured of his sickness. 4. Lastly, this may be done, not only if the pope judge the king a tyrant, (which was the utmost Emanuel Sà affirmed,) but it is sufficient proof of his being a tyrant if learned men, though but few, and those seditious too, do but murmur it, or begin to call him so.[m] I hope this doctrine was long since disclaimed by the whole society, and condemned "ad umbras Acherunticas." Perhaps so; but yet these men who use to object to us an infinity of divisions among ourselves, who boast so much of their own union and consonancy in judgment, with whom nothing is more ordinary than to maintain some opinions quite throughout their order, (as if they were informed by some common "intellectus agens,") should not be divided in a matter of so great moment, so much concerning the monarchy of the see apostolic, to which they are vowed liegemen. But I have greater reason to believe them united in this doctrine, than is the greatness of this probability. For 1. There was an apology printed in Italy, "permissu superiorum," in the year 1610, that says, "They were all enemies of that holy name of Jesus, that condemned Mariana for any such doctrine." I understand not why, but sure I am that the Jesuits do or did think his doctrine innocent: for in their apology put forth in the name of the whole society against the accusations of Anticoton, they deny that the assassin of Henry IV., I mean Ravaillac, was moved to kill the king by reason of Mariana, and are not ashamed to wish that he had read him.[n] Perhaps they mean it might have wrought the same effect upon him, which the sight of a drunkard did upon the youth of Lacedæmon; else I am sure it is not very likely he should have been dissuaded from his purpose by reading in Mariana, that it was lawful to do what he intended. 3. I add, they not only thought it innocent, and without positive hurt, but good and commendable; so that it is apparent that it was not the opinion of Mariana alone, but that the Moors of Spain had more disciples than Mariana. 1. He says it himself; for, commending the young monk that killed Henry III., he says he did it "having been informed, by several divines, that a tyrant might lawfully be killed."[o] 2. The thing itself speaks it, for his book was highly commended by Gretser[p] and Bonarscius,[q] both for style and matter,—higher yet by Petrus de Onna, provincial of Toledo, who was so highly pleased with it, he was sorry he wanted leisure[r] to read it the second and third time over, and, with this censure prefixed, was licensed to the press. Further yet, for Stephen Hoyeda, visitor of the Jesuits for the same province, approved it not only from his own judgment, but as being before approved by grave and learned men of the Jesuits' order,[s] and so with a special commission from Claudius Aquaviva, their general, with these approbations, and other solemn privileges, it was printed at Toledo[t] and Mentz;[u] and lastly, inserted into the catalogues of the books of their order by Petrus Ribadineira.

What negligence is sufficient that such a doctrine as this should pass so great supervisors, if in their hearts they disavow it? The children of this world are not such fools in their generations. The fathers of the society cannot but know, how apt these things of themselves are to public mischief, how invidious to the christian world, how scandalous to their order; and yet they rather excuse, than condemn, Mariana: speaking of him, at the hardest, but very gently, as if his only fault had been his speaking a truth "in tempore non opportuno," "something out of season; or as if they were forced to yield to the current of the times, and durst not profess openly of what, in their hearts, they were persuaded. I speak of some of them, for others, you see, are of the same opinion. But I would fain learn why they are so sedulous and careful to procure the decrees of the rector and deputies of Paris, rescripts of the bishop, revocation of arrest of the parliament which had been against them, and all to acquit the fathers of the society from these scandalous opinions; as if these laborious devices could make what they have said and done, to be unspoken and undone, or could change their opinions from what indeed they are; whereas they never went "ex animo" to refute these theorems, never spake against them in the real and serious dialect of an adversary, never condemned them as heretical, but what they have done they have been shamed to, or forced upon, as Père Coton by the king of France, and Servin to a confutation of Mariana (from which he desired to be excused, and after the king's death wrote his declaratory letter to no purpose); the apologists of Paris, by the outcries of christendom against them; and when it is done, done so coldly in their reprehensions with a greater readiness to excuse all, than condemn any. I say, these things, to a considering man, do increase the supicion, if at least that may be called suspicion, for which we have had so plain testimonies of their own.

I add this more, to put the business past all question; that when some things of this nature were objected to them by Arnald, the French king's advocate, they were so far from denying them, or excusing them, that they maintained them in spite of opposition, putting forth a book, entitled, "Veritas defensa contra actionem Antonii Arnaldi." What the things were, for which they stood up patrons, hear themselves speaking,[x] "Tum enim id non solum potest papa, sed etiam debet, se ostendere superiorem illis principibus. Exceptio hæc stomachum tibi commovet, facit ut ringaris, sed oportet haurias, et de cætero fatearis tibi nec rationem esse, nec conscientiam." Hard words these! The advocate is affirmed to be void both of reason and honesty, for denying the pope's dominion over kings. The reason follows, "The pope could not keep them to their duties, unless he kept them in awe with threatening them the loss of their kingdoms." But this is but the least part of it. They add, "If the subjects had been but disposed as they should have been, there was no time but it might have been profitable to have exercised the sword upon the persons of kings."[y] Let them construe their meaning, those are their words. But see further.

The damned act of Jacques Clément, the monk, upon the life of Henry III. of France, of Jean Chastel and Ravaillac upon Henry IV. are notorious in the christian world, and yet the first of these was commended by F. Guignard,[z] in a discourse of purpose, and by Mariana, as I before cited him. The second had two apologies made for him, the one by Constantinus Veruna,[a] the other,[b] without a name indeed, but with the mark and cognizance of the Jesuits' order, and the last was publicly commended, in a sermon by a monk of Cologne, as it is reported by the excellent Thuanus.

Not much less than this is that of Baronius, just, I am sure, of the same spirit with James and John, for he calls for a ruin upon the Venetians, for opposing of his holiness. "Arise, Peter, not to feed these wandering sheep, but to destroy them; throw away thy pastoral staff, and take thy sword." I confess here is some more ingenuity, to oppose murdering to feeding, than to make them all one, as Sanders[c] doth, but yet the same fiery spirit inflames them both, as if all Rome were on fire, and would put the world in a combustion.

Further yet. Guignard, a Jesuit of Clerimont college in Paris, was executed by command of the parliament,[d] for some conclusions he had written, which were of a high nature treasonable; and yet as if either there were an infallibility in every person of the society, or as if the parliament had done injustice in condemning Guignard, or lastly, as if they approved his doctrine, he was apologized for by Lewis Richeome,[e] and Bonarscius.[f] I know they will not say, that every Jesuit is infallible, they are not come to that yet; it is plain then, they are of the same mind with Guignard, or else (which I think they dare not say) the parliament was unjust in the condemnation of him; but if they do, they thus proclaim their approbation of these doctrines he was hanged for; for that he had such, was under his own hand, by his own confession, and of itself evident, as is to be seen in the arrest of the parliament against him.

Lastly, more pertinent to the day is the fact of Garnet,—who, because a Jesuit, could have done nothing for which he should not have found an apologist, for even for this his last act of high treason he was apologized for, by Bellarmine,[g] Gretser,[h] and Eudæmon Johannes.[i]

Thus far we have found out persons fit enough to match any malice; Boanerges all, and more than a pareil for James and John: but I shall anon discover the disease to be more epidemical, and the pest of a more catholic infection; and yet if we sum up our accounts, we shall already find the doctrine to be too catholic. For we have already met with Emanuel Sà, a Portuguese: Mariana and Ribadineira, Spaniards; Bonarscius, a bas Almain: Gretser, a German; Eudæmon Johannes, a false Greek; Guignard, Richeome, and the apologists for Chastel, Frenchmen; Bellarmine and Baronius, Italians; Garnet and Sanders, English.

The doctrine, you see, they would fain make catholic; now, if it prove to be but apostolic too, then we have found out an exact parallel for James and John, great disciples and apostles: and whether or no the see apostolic may not sometime be of a fiery and consuming spirit, we have so strange examples, even in our own home, that we need seek no farther for resolution of the 'Quære.' In the bull of excommunication put forth by Pius Quintus against Queen Elizabeth of blessed memory, there is more than a naked encouragement, as much as comes to a "Volumus et jubemus ut adversus Elizabetham, Angliæ reginam, subditi arma capessant." —"Bone Jesu! in quæ nos reservasti tempora?" Here is a command to turn rebels, a necessity of being traitors. "Quid eo infelicius, cui jam esse malum necesse est."

The business is put something further home by Catena and Gabutius, who wrote the life of Pius Quintus, were resident at Rome, one of them an advocate in the Roman court; their books both printed at Rome, "con licenza," and "con privilegio."[k] And now hear their testimonies of the whole business between the queen and his holiness.

"Pius Quintus published a bull against Queen Elizabeth, declared her a heretic, and deprived her of her kingdom, absolved her subjects from their oath of allegiance, excommunicated her, and gave power to any one to rebel against her," &c.[l] This was but the first step; he therefore thus proceeds; "He procures a gentleman of Florence to move her subjects to a rebellion against her for her destruction."[m] Further yet; he thought this would be such a real benefit to christendom to have her "destroyed, that the pope was ready to aid in person, to spend the whole revenue of the see apostolic, all the chalices and crosses of the church, and even his very clothes, to promote so pious a business as was the destruction of Queen Elizabeth."[n]

The witnesses of truth usually agree in one. The same story is told by Antonius Gabutius,[o] and some more circumstances added. First, he names the end of the pope's design, it was "to take her life away, in case she would not turn Roman catholic."—"To achieve this, because no legate could come into England, nor any public messenger from the see apostolic, he employed a Florentine merchant to stir her subjects to a rebellion for her perdition."[p] Nothing but "sollevamento," "rebellion," perdition and destruction to the queen could be thought upon by his holiness.

More yet; for when the Duke of Alva had seized upon the English merchants' goods which were at Antwerp, the pope took the occasion, instigated the king of Spain to aid "the pious attempts of those who conspired against the queen:" they are the words of Cabutius.[q] This rebellion was intended to be under the conduct of the Duke of Norfolk, "viro catholico," "a Roman catholic;" Gabutius notes it, for fear some heretic might be suspected of the design, and so the catholics lose the glory of the action. However Pius Quintus "intended to use the utmost and most extreme remedies to cure her heresy, and all means to increase and strengthen the rebellion." I durst not have thought so much of his holiness, if his own had not said it; but if this be not worse than the fiery spirit which our blessed Saviour reproved in James and John, I know not what is.

I have nothing to do to specify the spirit of Paulus Quintus in the Venetian cause; this only, Baronius[r] propounded the example of Gregory VII. to him, of which how far short he came, the world is witness. Our own business calls to mind the bulls of Pope Clement VIII., in which the Catholics in England were commanded to see, that however the right of succession did entitle any man to the crown of England, yet, if he were not a catholic, they should have none of him, but with all their power they should hinder his coming in. This bull Bellarmine[s] doth extremely magnify; and, indeed, it was for his purpose, for it was (if not author) yet the main encourager of Catesby to the powder-treason. For, when Garnet would willingly have known the pope's mind in the business, Catesby eased him of the trouble of sending to Rome, since the pope's mind was clear. "I doubt not" (said Catesby) "at all of the pope's mind, but that he, who commanded our endeavours to hinder his coming in, is willing enough we should throw him out."[t] It was but a reasonable collection.

I shall not need to instance in the effects which this bull produced; the treason of Watson and Cleark, two English seminaries, is sufficiently known; it was as a "præludium" or warning-piece to the great "fougade," the discharge of the powder-treason. Briefly, the case was so, that after the publication of the bull of Pius Quintus, these catholics in England durst not be good subjects till F. Parsons and Campian got a dispensation that they might for awhile do it; and "rebus sic stantibus," with a safe conscience profess a general obedience in causes temporal: and, after the bull of Clement, a great many of them were not good subjects; and if the rest had not taken to themselves the privilege which the pope[u] sometimes gave to the archbishop of Ravenna, "either to do as the pope bid them, or to pretend a reason why they would not:" we may say, as Creswell, in defence of Cardinal Allen, "Certainly we might have had more bloody tragedies in England, if the moderation of some more discreetly tempered had not been interposed."[x] However, it is no thank to his holiness; his spirit blew high enough.

But I will open this secret no farther, if I may have but leave to instance once more. If I mistake not, it was Sixtus Quintus who sometimes pronounced a speech in full consistory,[y] in which he compares the assassinat of Jacques Clément upon Henry III. to the exploits of Eleazar and Judith; where, after having aggravated the faults of the murdered king, concluded him to have died impenitent, denied him the solemnities of mass, dirge, and requiem for his soul, at last he ends with a prayer, "that God would finish what in this (bloody) manner had been begun."—I will not aggravate the foulness of the thing by any circumstances (though I cannot but wonder that his holiness should say a prayer of so much abomination); it is of itself too bad.

If his holiness be wronged in the business, I have no hand in it; the speech was printed at Paris,[z] three months after the murder of the king, and avouched for authentic by the approbation of three doctors, Boucher, Decreil, and Ancelein; let them answer it; I wash my hands of the accusation, and only consider the danger of such doctrines, if set forth with so great authority, and practised by so uncontrollable persons.

If the disciples of Christ, if apostles, if the see apostolic, if the fathers confessors, prove "boutefeus" and incendiaries, I'll no more wonder if the people call for fire to consume us, but rather wonder if they do not. And indeed, although it be no rare or unusual thing for a papist to be "de facto" loyal and duteous to his prince, yet it is a wonder that he is so, since such doctrines have been taught by so great masters; and at the best he depends but upon the pope's pleasure for his loyalty, which upon what security it rests, you may easily guess from the antecedents.

Thus much for consideration of the persons who asked the question; they were Christ's disciples, they were James and John.

But when James and John "saw this." Our next inquiry shall be of the cause of this their angry question. This we must learn from the foregoing story. Christ was going to the feast at Jerusalem, and passing through a village of Samaria, asked lodging for a night;[a] but they, perceiving that he was a Jew, would by no means entertain him, as being of a different religion. For although God appointed that all of the seed of Jacob should go up to Jerusalem to worship, ἀπρέπη γὰρ ἐν ἑνὶ τόπῳ προσκύνησις,[b] yet the tribes of the separation first under Jeroboam, worshipped in groves and high places; and after the captivity, being a mixed people, half Jew, half gentile, procured a temple to be built them by Sanballat, their president,[c] near the city Sichem, upon the mountain Gerizim, styling themselves "pertinentes ad montem benedictum,"[d] by allusion to the words of God by Moses, "they shall stand upon the mount Gerizim to bless the people, and these upon mount Ebal to curse." And in case arguments should fail to make this schism plausible, they will make it good by turning their adversaries out of doors: they shall not come near their blessed mount of Gerizim, but fastening an anathema on them, let them go to Ebal, and curse there. And now I wonder not that these disciples were very angry at them, who had lost the true religion, and neglected the offices of humanity to them that kept it. They might go near now to make it a cause of religion; σεμνότερον ὄνομα τῆς εὐσεβείας, as Nazianzen[e] speaks, might seem to apologize for them; and so it might, if it had not led them to indiscreet and uncharitable zeal. But men care not how far they go, if they do but once think they can make God a party of their quarrel. For when religion, which ought to be the antidote of our malice, proves its greatest incentive, our uncharitableness must needs run faster to mischief, by how much that which stopped its course before, drives it on with the greater violence. And, therefore, as it is ordinary for charity to be called coldness in religion, so it is as ordinary for a pretence of religion to make cold charity.

The present case of the disciples, and the same spirit, which, for the same pretended cause, is taken up by the persons of the day, proves all this true; with whom fire and faggot is esteemed the best argument to convince the understanding, and the inquisitors of heretical pravity, the best doctors and subtlest disputants, determining all with a "viris ignem, fossam mulieribus."[f] For thus we had like to have suffered; it was mistaken religion that moved these traitors to so damnable a conspiracy, not for any defence of their own cause, but for extirpation of ours. For else what grievances did they groan under? "In quos eorum populum exæstuantem sollicitavimus? quibus vitæ periculum attulimus?" it was Nazianzen's question to the apostate.[g] Give me leave to consider it as applicable to our present case, and try if I can make a just discovery of the cause that moved these traitors to so accursed a conspiracy.

1. Then there was no cause at all given them by us; none put to death for being a Roman catholic, nor any of them punished for his religion.

This hath been the constant attestation of our princes and state, since the first laws made against recusants; and the thing itself will bear them record.[h]

From "primo of Elizabeth to undecimo," the papists made no scruple of coming to our churches; recusancy was not then so much as a chrisom, not an embryo. But when Pius Quintus sent forth his briefs of excommunication and deposition of the queen, then first they forbore to pray with us, or to have any religious communion. This, although every where known, yet being a matter of fact, and so as likely to be denied by others, as affirmed by us, without good evidence, see it therefore affirmed expressly by an act of parliament in "decimo-tertio of Elizabeth," which specifies this as one inconvenience and ill consequences of the bull; "whereby hath grown great disobedience and boldness in many, not only to withdraw and absent themselves from divine service, now most godly set forth, and used within this realm, but also have thought themselves discharged of all obedience," &c. Not only recusancy, but likewise disobedience; therefore both recusancy and disobedience.

Two years, therefore, after this bull, this statute was made, if it was possible, to nullify the effects of it, to hinder its execution, and, if it might be, by this means to keep them, as they had been before, in communion with the church of England, and obedience to her majesty. This was the first statute that concerned them in special, but yet their religion was not meddled with; for this statute against execution of the pope's bulls, was no more than what had been established by act of parliament in the sixteenth year of Richard II., by which it was made "præmunire" to purchase bulls from Rome; and the delinquents in this kind, with all their "abettors, fautors, procurators, and maintainers, to be referred to the king's council for further punishment." There was indeed this severity expressed in the act of decimo-tertio of the queen, that the putting them in execution should be capital; and yet this severity was no more than what was inflicted upon the bishop of Ely, in Edward III.'s time, for publishing of a bull against the Earl of Chester, without the king's leave; and on the bishop of Carlisle, in the time of Henry IV., for the like offence. Thus far our laws are innocent.

But when this statute did not take the good effect for which it was intended, neither keeping them in their ancient communion nor obedience, but for all this, Mayne, Campian, and many others, came as the pope's emissaries for execution of the bull, the state proceeded to a further severity, making laws against recusancy, against seditious and traitorous books, and against the residence of Romish priests in England; making the first finable with a pecuniary mulct, the two latter capital, as being made of a treasonable nature. Of these in order:

1. The mulct which was imposed for recusancy, was not soul money, or paid for religion; and that for these reasons: 1. Because it is plain, religion did not make them absent themselves from our churches, unless they had changed their religion since the bull came over: for if religion could consist with their communion with us before the bull, as it is plain it did, then why not after the bull? unless it be part of their religion to obey the pope, rather than to obey God commanding us to obey our prince.—2. Their recusancy was an apparent mischief to our kingdom, and it was the prevention or diversion of this that was the only or special end of these laws.

The mischief is apparent these two ways: 1. Because by their recusancy they gave attestation that they held the bull to be valid; for else why should they, after the bull, deny their communion, which, before, they did not? Either they must think the queen, for a just cause, and by a just power, excommunicate; or why did they separate from her communion? Now if the queen, by virtue of the bull, was excommunicate, why should they stop here? She was by the same deposed, they absolved from all allegiance to her, and commanded to take arms against her. I confess it is no good argument of itself to say, the pope might excommunicate the queen, therefore depose her from her kingdom: but this concludes with them sufficiently, with whom excommunication not only drives from spirituals, but deprives of temporals, and is not to mend our lives, but to take them away. I speak how it is in the case of princes, and I shall anon prove it; for they being public persons from whose deposition more may be gotten, are like to suffer more. "Ut ex tunc ipse (pontifex) vassallos ab ejus fidelitate denuntiet absolutos, et terram exponat catholicis occupandam;" as they are taught by Pope Innocent III., in the eighth Lateran council. Such is their excommunication for matter of heresy, as was this pretended in the queen's case, so that in respect of them the danger was apparent.

2. It is plain that recusancy and disobedience came actually hand in hand: I say not that the one was the issue of the other, but that they were coetaneous, for the same persons that moved them to recusancy by virtue of the bull, moved them to the execution of it "per omnia." Now see whither this would tend. They by recusancy were better able to judge of their forces in England, and what party they were able to make for execution of the bull; whilst by that, as by a discriminative cognizance, they were pointed at as abettors of the catholic cause.

Thus far they suffered not for their religion or conscience, unless it were against their conscience to be good subjects; and then it was not religion, at least not christian, that was inconsistent with their loyalty: and so hitherto, in respect of us, their machination was altogether causeless.

2. For the second, (of which sometimes they accuse our laws,)—I mean the writing and publishing of seditious and traitorous books; I shall not need to say any thing in defence of its being made capital; for they were ever so, and of a high nature treasonable, and the publishers of them, by the canons of the church, were "ipso facto" excommunicate.[i] This I noted, because the same censure involves more, by virtue of the same canon: I mean not only the seditious libellers, but impugners of the king's regalities; as also the bringers, publishers, and executioners of the bull; as is to be seen in the constitution of Archbishop Stephen, in a council held at Oxford.—But, secondly, whether they were or were not, it matters nothing: this I suppose was no part of their religion, therefore this might be made treason, and yet their religion and peace of conscience undisturbed. 3. But the next is the main outcry of all, the very "conclamatum est" of the catholic cause, if suffered: it was made treason to be a priest, or at least if any of their priests should be found in England, he should be adjudged a traitor; and these laws were not yet repealed, but then in execution.

When certain sycophants told Philip of Macedon, that some of his discontented subjects called him tyrant, his answer was, "Rudes sunt Macedones, et scapham vocant scapham." I wish these men who object this, had the same ingenuity, and would acknowledge that the rudeness of a Macedonian tell-truth is no apparent calumny: and truly, as the case then stood, it was no worse. For consider that the statute against priests was not made till sixteen years after the bull of Pius V., and after much evidence, both by the confession of some priests themselves, and divers lay persons, that at least many of them came into England with this errand, that they might instigate the queen's liege people to the execution of it. This is very plain in the case of Mayne the Jesuit, and M. Tregion, who were executed at Launceston for the same business.[k]

The state could not certainly know what would be the issue, but yet could not but think it likely to produce more and worse consequences for the future. "Ideo leges in facta constitui, quia futura in incerto sint."[l] The queen then providing for her safety, banished these priests out of her dominions. This was all; and this done with so much lenity and moderation, as if of purpose to render good for their evil; such was her innocence; —and yet to provide for her safety, such was her prudence. She gave them forty days' time of preparation for their journey, imposed no penalty for their longer stay, in case that any of them were less healthful, or that the winds were cross, or that the weather served not: provided that during their stay, they gave security for their due obedience to her laws, and that they should attempt nothing against her person or government, for this was all she aimed at; but if they obeyed not the proscription, having no just cause to the contrary, such as were expressed in the act, then it should be adjudged their errand was not right, and, therefore, not their religion, but their disobedience, treasonable.

This was the highest ἀκμὴ of the severity of this state against them. Now first I shall briefly show, that this proscription, which was the highest penalty, was for just cause, as the case then stood, and deserved on their part. 2. It was but reasonable, in case they obeyed not the proscription, their stay should be made treason. 1. Because the priests did generally preach the pope's power, either directly over temporals, or else in order to spirituals,—of which the pope being judge, it would come to the same issue, and this was dangerous to the peace of the kingdom, and entrenched too much upon the regalty. In particular, the case of bringing from the see of Rome, and publishing of bulls, was by the lords of the parliament, in the sixteenth year of Richard the Second, judged to be "clearly in derogation of the king's crown and of his regalty, as it is well known, and hath been of a long time known;" and, therefore, they protested "together and every one severally by himself, that they would be with the same crown and regalty, in these cases specially, and in all other cases which shall be attempted against the same crown and regalty, in all points. with all their power." I hope then if the state, in the time of Queen Elizabeth, having far greater reason than ever, shall judge that these bulls, the publishing of them, the preaching of their validity, and reconciling, by virtue of them, her subjects to the see of Rome, be derogatory to her crown and regalty,—I see no reason she should be frighted from her just defence with the bugbear of pretended religion; for if it was not against religion then, why is it now? I confess there is a reason for it, to wit, because now the pope's power is an article of faith, as I shall show anon, but then it was not with them, any more than now it is with us: but whether this will convince any man of reason, I leave it to himself to consider.

But one thing is observable in that act of parliament of Richard the Second, I mean this clause, "As it is well known, and hath been of a long time known." The pope's encroachments upon the state of England had been an old sore, and by its eld almost habituate; but yet it grieved them nevertheless, nor was the less a fever for being hectical: but so it is, that I am confident, upon very good grounds, it may be made as apparent as the noon sun, for these six hundred years and upwards, that the bishops of Rome have exercised so extreme and continual tyranny and exactions in this kingdom, that our condition was under him worse than the state of the Athenians under their thirty tyrants, or than our neighbours are now under their Belgic tributes. So many grievances of the people, expilations of the church, abuses to the state, entrenchments upon the royalties of the crown, were continued, that it was a great blessing of Almighty God, our kingdom was delivered from them upon so easy terms, which Grosthead, bishop of Lincoln, thought would never be done, but in "Ore gladii cruentandi:" and now to have all these mischiefs return with more strength upon us, by the attempts of these priests, had been the highest point of indiscretion and sleepiness. I said, with more strength,—because what anciently at the highest was thought but a privilege of the church, began now to be an article of faith; and, therefore, if admitted, would have bound stronger and without all possibility of redress.

And now, if after all this, any man should doubt of the justice of these laws against the priests obtruding upon the state of the pope's power, I only refer him to the parliament of Paris, where let him hold his plea against those great sages of the law, for their just censures upon Florentinus Jacobus, Thomas Blanzius,[m] and John Tanquerell, who were all condemned to a solemn honorary penance and satisfaction to the state, and not without extreme difficulty escaped death, for the same cause: but this is not all. I add,

Secondly; the pope had his agent in England, to stir up the subjects to rebel against the queen, as I proved before by the testimonies of Catena and Gabutius. It is not then imaginable that he should so poorly intend his own designs, to employ one on purpose, and he but a merchant; and that the priests, who were the men, if any, most likely to do the business, should be unemployed. I speak not of the argument from matter of fact; (for it is apparent that they were employed, as I showed but now;) but it is plain also that they must have been employed, if we had had no other argument but a presumption of the pope's ordinary discretion. Things then remaining in this condition, what security could the queen or state have, without the absence of those men who must be the instruments of their mischief?

Thirdly, there was great reason those men might be banished, who might from their own principles plead immunity from all laws, and subordination to the prince. But that so these priests might, I only bring two witnesses, leading men of their own side. Thus Bellarmine:[n] "The pope hath exempted all clerks from subjection to princes." The same is taught by Emanuel Sà in his "Aphorisms," verbo "clericus." I must not dissemble that this aphorism, however it passed the press at first, yet in the edition of Paris it was left out. The cause is known to every man: for that it was merely to serve their ends is apparent; for their French freedom was there taken from them, they durst not "parler tout" so near the parliament; but the aphorism is to this day retained in the editions of Antwerp and Cologne.

If this be their doctrine, as it is plain it is taught by these leading authors, I mean Sà and Bellarmine, I know no reason but it may be very just and most convenient to deny those men the country from whose laws they plead exemption.

Secondly: It was but reasonable, in case they obeyed not the proscription, their disobedience should be made capital. For if they did not obey, then either they sinned against their conscience, in disobeying their lawful prince, and so are αὐτοκατάκριτοι, and inexcusable from the law's penalty, which may be extended at the pleasure of the lawgiver, where there is no positive injustice in the disproportion; or if they did not sin against their conscience, then of necessity must they think her to be no lawful prince, or not their lawful prince, nor they her subjects, and so "ipso facto" are guilty of high treason, and their execution was for "treason, not religion;" and so the principle is evicted which I shall beg leave to express in St. Cyprian's language, "Non erat illa fidei corona, sed pœna perfidiæ; nec religiosæ virtutis exitus gloriosus, sed desperationis interitus."[o]

For if Valentius banish Eusebius from Samosata, and Eusebius obey not the edict, if Valentius puts him to death, it is not for his being a christian that he suffers death; but for staying at Samosata, against the command of Valentius.[p] Such was the case of the priests, whom for just cause, as I have proved, and too apparent proof of seditious practices, the queen banished. Now if the queen was their lawful sovereign, then were they bound to obey her decree of exile, though it had been unjust, as was the case of Eusebius; or if they did not obey, not to think the laws unjust for punishing their disobedience. I say again their disobedience, not their religion; for that it was not their religion that was struck at by the justice of these laws, but the security of the queen and state only aimed at,—besides what I have already said, is apparent to the evidence of sense. For when Hart and Bosgrave, Jesuits both, came into England against the law, they were apprehended and imprisoned: for the laws without just execution were of no force for the queen's safety; but when these men had acknowledged the queen's legitimate power, and put in their security for their due obedience, they obtained their pardon and their liberty. The same proceedings were in the case of Horton and Rishton, all which I hope were not apostates from their order or religion, but so they must have been, or not have escaped death, in case that their religion had been made capital. Lastly, this statute extended only to such priests who were made priests, since "Primo of Elizabeth," and were born in England. It was not treason for a French priest to be in England, but yet so it must have been, if religion had been the thing they aimed at. But it is so foul a calumny, I am ashamed to stand longer to refute it. The proceedings of the church and state of England were just, honourable, and religious, full of mercy and discretion, and unless it were that as C. Fimbria complained of Q. Scævola, we did not open our breasts wide enough to receive the danger, there is no cause imaginable, I mean on our parts, to move them to so damned a conspiracy, or indeed to any just complaint.

Secondly: If these were not the causes, (as they would fain abuse the world into a persuasion that they were,) what was? I shall tell you, if you will give me leave ἄνωθεν τὴν πηγὴν διορύττειν, "to derive it from its very head," and then I will leave it to you to judge whether or no my augury fails me.

First, I guess that the traitors were encouraged and primarily moved to this treason, from the prevailing opinion which is most generally received, on that side, of the lawfulness of deposing princes that are heretical. I say, generally received, and I shall make my words good, or else the blame shall lay on themselves for deceiving me, when they declare their own minds. I instance, first, in the fathers of the society.[q] Bellarmine teacheth that kings "have no wrong done them, if they be deprived of their kingdoms, when they prove heretics."—Creswell, in his "Philopater" goes further, saying, "that if his heresy be manifest, he is deposed without any explicit judicial sentence of the pope, the law itself hath passed the sentence of deposition."[r] And therefore,

Bonarscius is very angry[s] at Arnald, the French king's advocate, for affirming that religion could be no just cause to depose a lawful prince; if he had been brought up in their schools, he might have learnt another lesson; "papa potest mutare regna, et uni auferre, atque alteri conferre, tanquam summus princeps spiritualis, si id necessarium sit ad animarum salutem," saith Bellarmine.[t] He gives his reason too, "Quia alioqui possent mali principes impunè fovere hæreticos;"[u] which is a thing not to be suffered by his holiness.

This doctrine is not the private opinion of these doctors, but "est certa, definita, atque indubitata virorum clarissimorum sententia," saith F. Creswell,[x] I suppose he means in his own order; and yet I must take heed what I say, for Eudæmon Johannes[y] is very angry with Sir Edward Cooke, for saying it is the doctrine of the Jesuits. Do they then deny it? No, surely, but "Non est Jesuitarum propria," it is not theirs alone, "sed, ut Garnettus respondit, totius Ecclesiæ, et quidem ab antiquissimis temporibus consensione recepta doctrina nostra est;" and there he reckons up seven-and-twenty famous authors of the same opinion. Creswell, in his Philopater,[z] says as much if not more: "Hinc etiam infert universa theologorum et jurisconsultorum ecclesiasticorum schola, et est certum, et de fide, quemcunque principem christianum, si a religione catholicâ manifestè deflexerit, et alios avocare voluerit, excidere statim omni potestate ac dignitate, ex ipsâ vi juris, tum humani, tum Divini." You see how easily they swallow this great camel. Add to this, that Bellarmine[a] himself proves, that the pope's temporal power, or of disposing of princes' kingdoms, is a catholic doctrine: for he reckons up of this opinion, one-and-twenty Italians, fourteen French, nine Germans, seven English and Scotch, nineteen Spaniards, and these not "è fæce plebis," but "è primoribus," all very famous and very leading authors.

You see it is good divinity amongst them, and I have made it good, that it is a general opinion, received by all their side, if you will believe themselves; and now let us see if it will pass for good law, as well as good divinity.

It is not for nothing that the church of France protests against some of their received canons; if they did not, I know not what would become of their princes. Their "lilies" may be to-day, and to-morrow be cast into the oven, if the pope either call their prince "Huguenot," as he did Henry IV.; or "tyrant," as Henry III.; or, "unprofitable for the church or kingdom," as he did King Childeric, whom Pope Zachary, "de facto" did depose for the same cause, and inserted his act into the body of the law as a precedent for the future, "Quod etiam ex auctoritate frequenti agit sancta ecclesia;" it is impaled in a parenthesis in the body of the canon,[b] lest deposition of princes should be taken for news. The law is clear for matter of fact; the lawfulness follows.

"Hæreticis licitum est auferri quæ habent;"[c] and this not only from a private man, but even from princes, "Nam qui in majore dignitate est, plus punitur;" or take it, if you please, in more proper terms. "Dominus papa principem secularem deponere potest propter hæresim;"[d] and so another may be chosen, like the Palatines and Castellans in Poland, just as if the king were dead, "Nam per hæresim plusquam civiliter mortuus censetur," saith Simancha,[e] and that, by virtue of a constitution of Gregory IX., by which every man is freed from all duty, homage, allegiance, or subordination whatsoever due to a heretic, whether due by a natural, civil, or political right; "Aliquo pacto, aut quâcunque firmitate vallatum.—Et sic nota," saith the gloss, "Quod papa potest absolvere laicum de juramento fidelitatis."

I end those things with the attestation of Bellarmine,[f] "Est res certa et explorata, posse pontificem maximum justis de causis temporalibus judicare, atque ipsos temporales principes aliquando deponere."—And again, that we may be sure to know of what nature this doctrine is, he repeats it; "Sic igitur de potestate in temporalibus, quod ea sit in papâ, non opinio, sed certitudo apud catholicos est." And now let any man say, if this be not a catholic doctrine, and a likely antecedent to have treason to be its consequent.

But I fix not here, only this, it is plain that this proposition is no friend to loyalty; but that which follows is absolutely inconsistent with it, in case our prince be of a different persuasion in matters of religion. For,

2. It is not only lawful to depose princes that are heretical, but it is necessary, and the catholics are bound to do it "sub mortali." I know not whether it be so generally, I am sure it is as confidently taught as the former, and by as great doctors.

"Ecclesia nimis graviter erraret, si admitteret aliquem regem, qui vellet impunè fovere quamlibet sectam, et defendere hæreticos:" so Bellarmine.[g] And again,[h] "Non licet Christianis tolerare regem hæreticum, si conetur pertrahere subditos ad suam hæresim." But F. Creswell[i] puts the business home to purpose, "Certè non tantum licet sed summâ etiam juris Divini necessitate ac præcepto, imò conscientiæ vinculo arctissimo, et extremo animarum suarum periculo ac discrimine, Christianis omnibus hoc ipsum incumbit, si præstare rem possint." Under peril of their souls they must not suffer an heretical prince to reign over them. "Possunt, et debent eum arcere ex hominum Christianorum dominatu, ne alios inficiat," &c.[k]

3. He that saith subjects "may, and are bound to depose their princes, and to drive them from all rule over christians, if they be able," means something more: for what if the prince resist? still he is bound to depose him if he be able. How if the prince make a war? the catholic subject must do his duty nevertheless, and war too, if he be able. He that says he may wage a war with his prince, I doubt not but thinks he may kill him; and if the fortune of the war lights so upon him, the subject cannot be blamed for doing of his duty.

It is plain that killing a prince is a certain consequent of deposing him, unless the prince be bound in conscience to think himself a heretic, when the pope declares him so, and be likewise bound not to resist; and besides all this, will perform these his obligations, and as certainly think himself heretical, and as really give over his kingdom quietly, as he is bound. For in case any of these should fail, there can be but very slender assurance of his life. I would be loth to obtrude upon men the odious consequences of their opinions, or to make any thing worse which is capable of a fairer construction; but I crave pardon in this particular; the life of princes is sacred, and is not to be violated so much as in thought, or by the most remote consequence of a public doctrine: but here indeed it is so immediate and natural a consequent of the former, that it must not be dissembled. But what shall we think, if even this blasphemy be taught "in terminis?" See this too.

In the year 1407, when the Duke of Orleans had been slain by John of Burgundy, and the fact notorious beyond a possibility of concealment, he thought it his best way to employ his chaplain to justify the act, pretending that Orleans was a tyrant. This stood him in small stead, for by the procurement of Gerson, it was decreed in the council of Constance, that tyranny was no sufficient cause for a man to kill a prince. But yet, I find, that even this decree will not stand princes in much stead. First, because the decree runs "ut nemo privatâ autoritate," &c.; but if the pope commands it, then it is "judicium publicum," and so they are never the more secure for all this. Secondly, because Mariana[l] tells us, that this decree is nothing. "Namque id decretum (Concilii Constantiensis) Romano Pontifici Martino quinto probatum non invenio, non Eugenio aut successoribus, quorum consensu conciliorum ecclesiasticorum sanctitas stat." Thirdly, because though the council had forbidden killing of tyrannical princes, even by public authority, though this decree had been confirmed by the pope, which yet it was not, yet princes are never the more secure, if they be convicted of heresy; and, therefore, let them but add heresy to their tyranny, and this council, "Non obstante," they may be killed by any man; for so it is determined[m] in an apology made for Chastel, "Licitum esse privatis et singulis, reges et principes hæreseos et tyrannidis condemnatos, occidere, non obstante decreto concilii Constantiensis;"—and the author of the book "De justâ Abdicatione Henrici III." affirms it not only lawful but meritorious.

How much less than this is that of Bellarmine?[n] "Si temporalia obsint fini spirituali, spiritualis potestas potest, et debet coercere temporalem, omni ratione ac viâ." If "omni ratione," then this of killing him in case of necessity, or greater convenience, must not be excluded. But to confess the business openly and freely, it is known that either the consent of the people, or the sentence of the pope, or consent of learned men, is with them held to be a "publicum judicium," and sufficient to sentence a prince, and convict him of heresy or tyranny. That opinion which makes the people judge, is very rare amongst them, but almost generally exploded;[o] that opinion which makes the learned to be their judge is, I think, proper to Mariana, or to a few more with him; but that the sentence of the pope is a sufficient conviction of him, and a complete judicial act, is the most catholic opinion on that side, as I shall show anon. Now whether the pope, or learned men, or the people, be to pass this sentence upon the prince, it is plain that it is a universal doctrine amongst them, that after this sentence (whosesoever it be) it is then without question lawful to kill him; and the most that ever they say is, that it is indeed not lawful to kill a king, not lawful for a private man, of his own head, without the public sentence of his judge; but when this judge (whom they affirm to be the pope) hath passed his sentence, then they doubt not of its being lawful. That I say true, I appeal to Gregory de Valentia,[p] Tolet,[q] Bellarmine,[r] Suarez,[s] Salmeron,[t] Serarius,[u] Molina,[x] Emanuel Sà,[y] Azorius,[z] Martinus Delrius,[a] Lessius,[b] Gretser,[c] Becanus,[d] Sebastan Heissius,[e] Richeome,[f] Eudæmon Johannes,[g] Salianus,[h] Filliucius,[i] Adam Tanner,[k] and their great Thomas Aquinas.[l]

All these, and many more that I have seen, teach the lawfulness of killing kings after public sentence; and then, to beautify the matter, profess that they deny the lawfulness of "regicidium," by a private authority. For if the pope sentence him, then he is no longer a king, and so the killing of him is not "regicidium;" and if any man doth kill him after such sentence, then he kills him not "privatâ autoritate," or "sine judicio publico;" which is all they affirm to be unlawful.

And thus they hope to stop the clamour of the world against them, yet to have their opinions stand entire, the way to their own ends fair, but the prince no jot the more secure of his life. I do them no wrong, I appeal to the authors themselves; there I will be tried. For that either the people, or that a company of learned men, or to be sure the pope, may license a man to kill the king, they speak it with one voice and tongue. And now after all this we may better guess what manner of counsel or threatening (for I know not which to call it) that was which Bellarmine[m] gave sometimes to King James of blessed memory. "Si securus regnare velit rex, si vitæ suæ et suorum consulere cupiat, sinat catholicos frui religione suâ!"—If this be good counsel, then in case the catholics were hindered from the free profession of their religion, at the best it was full of danger, if not certain ruin. But I will no more rake this Augean stable; in my first part I showed it was too catholic a doctrine, and too much practised by the great Cisalpine prelate. I add no more, lest truth itself should blush, fearing to become incredible.

Now, if we put all these things together, and then we should prove to be heretics in their account, we are in a fair case, both prince and people; if we can but guess rightly at this, we shall need, I think, to look no further why fire was called for to consume both our king and country, nor why we may fear it another time.

The author of the "Epistle of Comfort to the Catholics in Prison," printed by authority, in the year of the powder treason, is very earnest to persuade his catholics not to come to our churches, or communicate with us in any part of our divine service; affrighting them with the strange "terriculamenta" of half christians, hypocrites, deniers of Christ, in case they joined with us in our Liturgy.[n] Strange affrightments these, yet not much more than what is true, if they esteem us heretics. For if they think us so, we are so to them; and they communicating with us, do as much sin, as if we were so indeed.

But if we be not heretics, what need all this stir, "permissu superiorum:" the counsel of recusancy was unreasonable, dangerous, schismatical, and, as the case then stood, very imprudent. In charity to their discretion, we cannot but think them uncharitable in their opinion of us.

But there is no need we should dispute ourselves into a conjecture, themselves speak out and plain enough. Hear Bellarmine,[o] under the visor of Tortus, affirming that the king's edict commanded the catholics to go to heretics' churches, speaking of ours. But more plain is that of Champ, the Sorbonist, in his treatise of "Vocation of Bishops." "Therefore, as Arianism is a condemned heresy, and the professors thereof be heretics,—so likewise is protestantism a condemned heresy, and those that profess it be also heretics."[p]

By this time we see too plainly that the state of protestant princes is full of danger, where these men have to do. They may be deposed and expelled from the government of their kingdoms, they must be deposed by the Catholics, under peril of their souls, it may be done any way that is most convenient; they may be rebelled against, fought with, slain. For all this, it were some ease, if here we might fix a "non ultra." For, perhaps, these princes might put in a plea for themselves, and go near to prove themselves to be no heretics. All is one, for though they do, yet unless they can persuade his holiness not to judge them so, or declare them heretics, all is to no purpose, for to him they must stand or fall. "Nam judicare an rex pertrahat ad hæresim necne, pertinet ad pontificem." So Bellarmine. They need not stay till his heresy be of itself manifest, he is then to be used like a heretic, "when by the pope of Rome he shall be judged heretical."

But what matter is it if the pope be judge, for if they may be deposed, as good he as any else? What grievance then can this be to the state of princes more than the former? Yes, very much. 1. Because the pope, by his order to spirituals, may take away kingdoms upon more pretences than actual heresy. It is a large title, and may do any thing. Bellarmine[q] expresses it handsomely, and it is the doctrine of their great Aquinas.[r] "The pope," saith he, "by his spiritual power may dispose of the temporalities of all the christians in the world, when it is requisite to the end of the spiritual power."—The words are plain that he may do it for his own ends, (for his is the spiritual power,) that is, for the advancement of the see apostolic; and thus (to be sure) he did actually with Frederick Barbarossa, John of Navarre, the Earl of Thoulouse, and our own King John. 2. The pope pretends to a power, that to avoid the probable danger of the increase of heresy, he may take away a territory from the right owner, as is reported by the Cardinal D'Ossat; and this is soon pretended, for who is there that cannot make probabilities, especially when a kingdom is at stake? 3. We find examples, that the pope hath excommunicated princes, and declared them heretics, when all the heresy hath been a not laying their crowns at the feet of St. Peter. The case of Lewis IV. is every where known, whom John XXIII. excommunicated. Platina[s] tells the reason. He called himself emperor without the pope's leave, and aided the Italian deputies to recover Milan. Doubtless a most damnable and fundamental heresy. 4. How, if it proves in the pope's account to be a heresy to defend the immediate right of princes to their kingdoms, dependent only on God, not on the see apostolic. If this be no heresy, nor like heresy to say it, I would fain learn the meaning of Baronius[t] concerning the book of Johannes de Roa, who sometime had been a Jesuit, but then changed his order, and became Augustan, saying, "it was sentenced to the fire before it had escaped the press." And good reason, "Nihil enim tale à patribus societatis didicit." Good men, they never taught him any such doctrine as is contained in that pestilent book, "de juribus principalibus defendendis et moderandis juste." Now, if this be heresy, or like it, to preach such a doctrine, then likely it will be judged heresy in princes to do so, that is, to hold their crowns without acknowledgment of subordination to St. Peter's chair. And if it be not heresy to do so, it is in their account as bad, for so the Jesuits, in their "Veritas defensa" against the action of Arnald the advocate, affirm "in terminis," that the actions of some kings of France against the pope, in defence of their regalties, were but "examples of rebellion, and spots to disgrace the purity of the French lilies." 5. But in case the pope should chance to mistake in his sentence against a prince, for the cause of heresy, yet for all this mistake, he can secure any man to take away the prince's life or kingdom. His lawyers will be his security for this point. For although, in this case, the deposition of the prince should be, and be acknowledged to be, against God's law, the prince being neither tyrant nor heretic, yet his holiness commanding it, takes away the unlawfulness of it, by his dispensation. So D. Marta;[u] and for this doctrine he quotes Hostiensis, Felinus, Gratus the abbot, the archbishop of Florence, Ancharanus, Johannes Andreas, Laurentius, de Pinu, and some others. Indeed his divines deny this, "sed contrarium tamen observatur," as it is very well observed by the same doctor;[w] for he brings the practice and example of Pope Martin V., Julius II., Celestine III., Alexander III., and Sixtus Quintus, all which dispensed in cases acknowledged to be expressly against God's law. 6. Lastly, how if the pope should lay a claim to all the kingdoms of the world, as belonging to St Peter's patrimony, by right of spiritual pre-eminence? I know no great security we have to the contrary. For, first, it is known he hath claimed the kingdom of England, as feudatory to the see apostolic.[x] Which when I considered, I wondered not at that new and insolent title which Mosconius gives his holiness,[y] of "Defensor fidei." He might have added the title of "Rex Catholicus," and "Christianissimus." For D. Marta, in his treatise of "jurisdiction,"[z] which he dedicated to Paulus Quintus, hath that for an argument why he dedicated his book to him, because, forsooth, the pope is the only monarch of the world. But of greater authority is that of Thomas Aquinas,[a] affirming the pope to be the vertical top of all power, ecclesiastical and civil. So that now it may be true which the bishop of Patara told the emperor, in behalf of Pope Sylverius. "Multos esse reges, sed nullum talem, qualis ille, qui est papa super ecclesiam mundi totius."[b]

For these reasons, I think, it is true enough, that the constituting the pope the judge of princes in the matter of deposition, is of more danger than the thing itself. The sum is this. However schism or heresy may be pretended, yet it is but during the pope's pleasure, that kings or subjects shall remain firm in their mutual necessitude. For if our prince be but excommunicate or declared heretic, then to be a good subject will be accounted no better than irreligion and anti-catholicism. If the conclusion be too hard and intolerable, then so are the premises, and yet they pass for good catholic doctrine among themselves.

But if truly, and "ex animo," they are otherwise affected, they should do well to unsay what hath been said, and declare themselves, by public authority, against such doctrines: and say whether or no their determinations shall be "de fide?" If they be, then all those famous catholic doctors, Thomas Aquinas, Bellarmine, Creswell, Mariana, Emanuel Sà, &c., are heretics, and their canons teach heresy, and many of their popes to be condemned as heretical, for practising and teaching deposition of princes, by an authority usurped against, and in prejudice of, the christian faith. But if their answers be not "de fide," then they had as good say nothing, for the danger is not at all decreased; because if there be doctors on both sides, by their own assertion[c] they may without sin follow either, but yet more safely, if they follow the most received and the most authorized; and whether this rule will lead them, I will be judged by any man that hath considered the premises. Briefly, either this thing must remain in the same state it is, and our princes still exposed to so extreme hazards, or else let his holiness seat himself in his chair, condemn these doctrines, vow against their future practice, limit his "ordo ad spiritualia," contain himself within the limits of causes directly and merely ecclesiastical, disclaim all power, so much as indirect over princes' temporals, and all this with an intent to oblige all christendom. Which when I see done, I shall be most ready to believe that nothing in popery doth, either directly or by a necessary consequence, destroy loyalty to our lawful prince; but not till then, having so much evidence to the contrary.

Thus much was occasioned by consideration of the cause of the disciples' query, which was when they saw this, that their Lord and Master, for his difference in religion, was turned forth of doors, which when they saw, "They said, Lord:" it was well they asked at all, and would not too hastily act what they too suddenly had intended; but it was better that they asked Christ; it had been the best warrant they could have had, could they have obtained but a "magister dixit." But this was not likely, it was too strange a question to ask of such a Master, "a Magistro mansuetudinis licentiam crudelitatis." Nothing could have come more cross to his disposition. His spirit never was addicted to blood, unless it were to shed his own. He was a Prince of peace, and set forth to us by all the symbols of peace and gentleness, as of a sheep, a lamb, a hen, a gentle twining vine, the healing olive: and is it likely, that such a one should give his "placet" to the utter ruin of a company of poor villagers, for denying him a night's lodging, moved thereto by the foregoing scandal of a schism? he knew better what it cost to redeem a man, and to save his life from destruction, than to be so hasty for his ruin. And if the fathers confessors, who were to answer the question of the day, had but reflected upon this gospel, they might have informed their penitents better, than to have engaged them upon such antichristian and treasonable practices, as to destroy an assembly of christians, as to depose or kill a king.

It is the proper cognizance of Mahometanism, by fire and sword to maintain their cause, and to propagate their religion by ruin of princes and conquering their kingdoms. But it is the excellency of christianity, that by humility and obedience it made princes tributary to our dear Master, and homagers to his kingdom. When Valentinian sent Calligonus, his chamberlain, to St. Ambrose, to threaten him from his faith, his answer was, "Deus permittit tibi ut impleas quod minaris. Ego patiar, quod est episcopi; tu facies, quod est spadonis." He did not stir up the numerous people of his diocess to rebel against the emperor, or depose him, employed no agent in his court to undermine his security, nor assassin to take his life. He and the rest of those good fathers would not have lost their possibility of being martyrs for the world, unless it were by persuading the emperors to the christian faith. "We pray for all our governors, that they might have long life, a secure government, a safe house, strong armies, good subjects, quiet world." So Tertullian.[d]

I had thought that the doctrine and example of our blessed Saviour, the practice apostolical and primitive, had been ties enough to keep us in our obedience to God and the king, and in christian charity to all; but I find that all these precepts come to nothing; for the apostles and primitive christians did not actually depose kings, nor alter states, nor call for fire to consume their enemies: not because it was simply unlawful so to do, or any way adverse to the precepts of Christ, but because they wanted power. So Bellarmine:[e] "The church gave leave that the faithful should obey Julian, because then they wanted forces."—And F. Creswell[f] is very confident of the business, "They might without all question have appointed to themselves other kings and princes, if the christians had been strong enough to bring their intendments to pass." But because they could not, therefore it was not lawful for them to go about it, nor is it for us in the same case, "especially if the prince hath quiet possession, and a strong guard about him, then by no means is it lawful for a single man, by his own authority, to assault his prince that rules tyrannically." So Salmeron.[g] But who sees not that this way murder may be lawful? For true it is God commanded us, saying, "Thou shalt not kill;" that is, if thou art not able to lift up thy hand, or strike a stroke: thou shalt not blaspheme, that is, if thou beest speechless; thou must be obedient to thy prince, that is, if thou canst not tell how to help it. Good doctrine this! And indeed it might possibly be something if God had commanded our subordination to princes only "for wrath," for then "si vires adsint," if we can defend ourselves we are secure, we need not fear his wrath; but when he adds, "also for conscience' sake," I cannot sufficiently wonder that any man should obtrude so senseless, so illiterate, and so impious an interpretation upon the christian world, under the title of catholic doctrine.

Christ when he was betrayed, and seized upon by his murderers, could have commanded twelve legions of angels for his guard, "Non defuerunt vires;" and, in all human likelihood, such a "satellitium," as that would have moved them to a belief in him, or else, I am sure, might have destroyed the unbelievers. Shall I say more against this rude "glossema?" Then thus. It is false that the primitive christians had not power to defend themselves against their persecutors. Hear St. Cyprian; "Nemo nostrûm, quando apprehenditur, reluctatur, nec se adversus injustitiam, et violentiam vestram, quamvis nimius et copiosus noster sit populus, ulciscitur." They could have resisted, and that to blood, but they had not so learned Christ. Prayers and tears were the arms of christians, and then they had a defence beyond all this, when they were hard put to it, "Mori potuerunt;" a submission of their bodies to martyrdom was their last refuge.

Thus St. Agnes, Lucia, Agatha, Christina, Domitilla saved both their faith and chastity, "non armis, sed ignibus et carnificis manu;" the tormentor's last cruelty defended them from all succeeding danger.

I will not yet conclude, that that which these men obtrude for catholic doctrine is flat and direct heresy; I will instance but once more, and then I shall. In the fourth council of Toledo, which was assembled when the usurping and tyrannizing Goths did domineer in Europe, the most whereof were tyrants, usurpers, or Arians; the council decreed that if any man did violate the life or person of his king, "aut potestate regni exuerit," kill him or depose him, "Anathema sit," &c., he should be accursed in the sight of God and his holy angels, and together with all the companions of his iniquity, he should be separated from the catholic church. And now, I hope, I may say that these men who either practise or advise such practices as killing or deposing kings, are as formally condemned for heresy, and anathematized, as ever was Manichee or Cataphrygian. I know not, but, perhaps, this might be thought of when the Jesuits were inscribed heretics upon the public pillar before the Louvre, in Paris, upon their banishment: however, let them answer it as they may, it concerns them as much as their being catholics comes to, "Et considerent, quia quæ prædicant tantoperè verba, aut ipsorum summorum pontificum sunt suas fimbrias extendentium, aut illorum qui eis adulantur," as said Æneas Sylvius;[h] but at no hand can it be christian doctrine.

I instanced in these things to show the antithesis between the spirit of our blessed Saviour, who answered the question of the text, and the fathers confessors, of whom was asked the question of the day.

But give me leave to consider them not only as misinforming their penitents, but as concealing their intended purpose; for even this way, the persons to whom the question was propounded made themselves guilty of the intended machination.[i] For by all law, ecclesiastical and civil, he that conceals an intended murder or treason, makes himself as much a party for concealing, as is the principal for contriving.

Ob. But these fathers confessors could not be accused by virtue of these general laws, as being exempt by virtue of a special case, for they received notice of these things only in confession, the seal of which is so sacred and inviolable, that he is sacrilegious who in any case doth break it open, though it be to avoid the greatest evil that can happen, so Bellarmine;[k] to save the lives of all the kings in christendom, so Binet;[l] though to save a whole commonwealth from damage, temporal or spiritual, of body or soul, so Suarez.[m]

A considerable matter! On the one side we are threatened by sacrilege, on the other by danger of princes and commonwealths; for the case may happen, that either the prince and the whole state may be suffered to perish bodily and ghostly, or else the priest must certainly damn himself by the sacrilegious breach of the holy seal of confession. Give me leave briefly to consider it, and, both for the acquittance of our state in its proceedings against these traitors, and for the regulating of the case itself, to say these two things.

1. This present treason was not revealed to these fathers confessors in formal confession. 2. If it had, it did not bind to secrecy in the present case. Of the first, only a word.

1. It was only propounded to them in way of question or consultation,[n] (like this in the text,) as appeared by their own confessions, and the attestation of then Sir Henry Mountague, recorder of London, to Garnet himself. It could not, therefore, be a formal confession; and, therefore, not bind to the seal. It is the common opinion of their own doctors: "Non enim inducitur obligatio sigilli in confessione, quam quis facit sine ullo animo accipiendi absolutionem, sed solum consilii petendi causa."[o]

2. It was propounded to these fathers confessors as a thing not subjectable to their penitential judicature, because it was a fact not repented of, but then in agitation, and resolved upon for the future. How then could this be a confession, whose institution must certainly be in order to absolution, and how could this be in any such order, when it was a business of which they could not expect to be absolved, unless they hoped to sin with a pardon about their necks; and on condition God would be merciful to them in its remission, would come and profess that they were resolved to anger him? In reason, this could be no act of repentance, neither could it, by confession of their own side. It is the doctrine of Hostiensis: and Navarre,[p] and Cardinal Alban[q] confess it to be most commonly received.

3. It was not only not repented of, but by them reputed to be a good action, and so could not be a matter of confession. I appeal to any of their own manuals and penitentiary books. It is culpable, say they. I am sure it is ridiculous in any man to confess, and shrive himself of a good action; and that this was such in their opinion, it is plain, by that impious answer of Garnet, affirming it a business greatly meritorious, if any good might thence accrue to the catholic cause.[r]

4. By this their pretended confession they endeavoured to acquire new complices, as is evident "in the proceedings against the traitors." They were therefore bound to reveal it, for it neither was, nor could be, a proper and formal confession. That this is the common opinion of their own schools, see it affirmed by Ægidius Coninck.[s]

The first particular then is plain. Here neither was the form of confession, nor yet could this thing be a matter of confession; therefore supposing the seal of confession to be sacredly inviolable, in all cases, yet they were highly blamable for their concealment in the present.

2. But the truth of the second particular is more to be inquired of. That is, that though these things had been only revealed in confession, and this confession had been formal and direct, yet they were bound, in the present case, to reveal it, because the seal of confession is not so inviolable, as that in no case it is to be broken up, and if in any, especially it may be opened in the case of treason.

I never knew any thing cried up with so general a voice, upon so little ground, as is the over-hallowed seal of confession.

True it is that an ordinary secret, committed to a friend in civil commerce, is not to be revealed upon every cause, nor upon many; but upon some it may, as they all confess. If thus, then much rather is this to be observed in the revelation of the secrets of our consciences, not only from the ordinary tie to secrecy, but likewise, lest sins should grow more frequent, if so great a remedy of them be made so odious, as to expose us to a public infamy or danger of the law. The council, therefore, that first introduced this obligation, was very prudent and reasonable, pleads a thousand years' prescription, and relies upon good conveniences. This is all that ever could be proved of it, as may appear anon; but these are too weak a base, to build so great a structure on it, as to make it sacrilege, or any sin at all, to reveal confessions, in some cases.

1. For first, if because it is delivered as a secret, and such a secret, it is the more closely and religiously to be kept; it is true,—but concludes no more, but that it must be a greater cause that must authorize a publication of this, than of the secrets of ordinary commerce between friend and friend.

2. If the licensing of publication of confession be a way to make confession odious, and therefore that it may not be published,—I say, if this concludes, then, on the contrary, it concludes far more strongly, that therefore, in some cases, it may be published, because nothing can make a thing more odious and intolerable, than if it be made a cover for grand impieties, so as to engage a true subject, quietly and knowingly, to see his prince murdered.

3. If it be discouragement to the practice of confession, that some sins revealed in it must be published, though with peril to the delinquent's fame and life, then it will be a far greater discouragement to the sin, when that it shall, by a universal judgment, be so detested, that its concealment may not be permitted, though it be with the hazard of discouraging the holy duty of confession: and when the being guilty of such a sin, shall reduce men into such straits, that either they shall want the benefit of absolution, or submit themselves to a public satisfaction, and so, even in this particular, the benefit is far greater than the imaginary inconvenience.

The conveniences of the seal force no more, than that it is convenient to be observed, not simply and absolutely, in all cases necessary. And perhaps Suarez, the great patron of it, perceived it; however, he lays the burden "super communi consensu ecclesiæ, ejusque perpetuâ traditione."[t] If then I can show, that there is no such catholic consent of the present church, nor any universal tradition of the ancient church, for the inviolable seal, but plainly the contrary, then our church, in her permission of the priests to reveal some confessions, is as inculpable as those of the present church, who (besides herself) teach and practise it, and as the primitive church, whose example in this, as in other things, she strictly follows.

Of the first, the church of England, which observes the seal of confession, as sacredly as reason or religion itself can possibly permit, yet forbids not disclosure, in case of murder or treason, but, in these particulars, leaves us entire in our obedience to the common laws of England; and these command it.[u]

That the church of England gives leave, in some cases, to reveal confessions, is argument enough to prove, that the seal is not founded upon the consent of the present catholic church: for it is no more a begging of the question (nor apparently so much) to say, the church of England is a part of the catholic church, and therefore her consent is required to make a thing universal, than to say, the church of Rome is the whole catholic church, therefore her consent is sufficient to make a thing catholic. But I shall not need to proceed this way. For,

1. It is apparent, that, of their own side, Altisidiorensis largely and professedly proves the lawfulness of publication, in some cases, as it is to be seen. Lib. 4. Summæ tract. 6. cap. 3. q. 7. and Garnet himself,—the man who, if any, had most need to stand in defence of the seal, that the pretence of it might have defended him,—yet confessed of his own accord, "Leges quæ celare hæc prohibent, aprimè esse justas et salutares."[x] He adds his reason, and that is more than his authority; for, saith he, it is not fitting that the life and safety of a prince should depend upon the private niceties of any man's conscience. If two, nay, if one dissent, it is enough to destroy a consent. But see further.

There are many cases, generally confessed amongst themselves, in which the seal of formal, and, as they love to speak, sacramental confession, may be broken open. I instance but in two or three.

First, Confession may be revealed to clear a doubtful case of marriage. It is the opinion of many great canonists,[y] as you may see them quoted by Suarez de Paz, and Covaruvias,[z] and the case of the Venetian, who married a virgin that was both his sister and daughter;—and that at Rome, under Pope Paul III. almost to like purpose,—were long disputed on both sides, whether they were to be revealed or not; so that at most, it is but a doubtful matter in such cases, whether the tie of secrecy doth oblige. Now if for the proof of marriage, the seal may be broken up, that man and wife might live contentedly, and as they ought, strange it should be unlawful to reveal confessions, in case of treason, for the safety of a prince or state!

In case of heresy, the seal binds not, by their own general confession. It is a rule amongst them,

"Hæresis est crimen, quod non confessio celat."

Now I would fain learn why treason is not as revealable as heresy? Is heresy dangerous to souls? Then surely so is treason, unless it be none, or a very small crime. May heresy infect others? So may treason, as it did in the present. It may then as well be revealed as heresy. Now that it may something rather, I have these reasons. 1. Because it is not so certain, that such an opinion is heresy, as that such a fact is treason. 2. Because, although both treason and real heresy be damnable and dangerous to souls, yet heresy kills no kings as treason doth. I confess that heresy may, and doth teach it, but then it degenerates into treason. Now, if some heresy may be treason, then that treason is heresy; and so a case of treason may occur, in which, from their own confession, treason is revealable.

3. By the most general voice of their own side, any man may license his confessor to reveal his confession. It is the doctrine of Scotus, Durandus, Almain, Navarre, Medina, and generally of all the Thomists. I infer, if a private man may license his confessor to reveal his confession, then the seal of confession is not founded upon any Divine commandment; for if it were, the penitent could not give the priest license to break it. But, if the penitent may give his confessor leave, because the tie of secrecy is a bond in which the priest stands bound to the penitent, and, he giving him leave, remits of his own right, then much rather may a whole state authorize this publication;[a] for, whatever personal right a private man hath, that the whole state hath much rather, for he is included in it as a part of the whole; and in such cases as concern the whole commonwealth, as this of treason doth most especially, the rule of the law holds without exception, "refertur ad universos, quod publice fit per majorem partem,"[b] the delinquent gives leave to the publication of confession, therefore, because the whole state doth, whereof he is one member. I add, that in the case of treason, this is much rather true, for here the delinquent loseth all his right whatsoever, prædial, personal, and of privilege; and, therefore, the commonwealth can the better license the publication, and the breach of the bond of secrecy, in which the confessor stood tied to the penitent by virtue of implicit stipulation.

4. Lastly, even in special, in the very case of treason confessed, many of their own do actually practise a publication, when either they are loyal of themselves, or dare not be otherwise.

I instance first in the church of France. For this, see Bodinus,[c] who reports of a Norman gentleman, whom his confessor discovered for having confessed a treasonable purpose he sometimes had, of killing Francis I., of which he was penitent, did his penance, craved absolution, obtained it, but yet was sentenced to the axe by express commission from the king to the parliament of Paris.[d] The like confession was made by the lord of Haulterville when he was in danger of death; which when he had escaped, he incurred it with the disadvantage of public infamy upon the scaffold. I instance not in the case of Barriere, it is every where known as it is reported partly by Thuanus, but more fully by the author of "Histoire de la Paix." Nor yet is France singular in the practice of publication of confessed treason. For at Rome there have been examples of the like, I mean of those who confessed their purpose of killing the pope, who were revealed by their confessors, and accordingly punished.[e]

Thus then the first pretence proves a nullity, and either our laws are just in commanding publication of confession in case of treason, or themselves very culpable in teaching and practising it in the same and in cases of less moment. The second is like the first, for it is extremely vain to pretend that the seal of confession is founded upon catholic tradition. Judge by the sequel.

The first word I hear of concealing confessions is in Sozomen,[f] relating how the Greek church, about the time of Decius the emperor, set over the penitents a public penitentiary priest, who was bound to be "Vir bonæ conversationis, servansque secretùm," "a good man, and a keeper of secrets;" for, indeed, he was bound to conceal some crimes, in particular, those which an adulteress had confessed, I mean, concerning her adultery, as appears in the canons of St. Basil.[g] But yet this priest who was so tied to a religious secresy, did "publish many of them in the congregation before the people," that they might reprove the delinquent and discountenance the sin. The same story is reported by Cassiodore and Nicephorus from the same author.

The lawfulness and practice of publication, in some cases, is as clear in Origen.[h] "If" (saith he) "the physician of thy soul perceives thy sins to be such as to need so harsh a remedy, as to have them published before the assemblies of the people, that others may be admonished, and thou the better cured, he need be very deliberate, and skilful in the application of it." Hitherto, no such thing as a universal tradition for the pretended inviolable sacramental seal; for Origen plainly, and by them confessedly, speaks of such sins, as first were privately confessed to the priest; how else should he deliberate of their publication? but yet he did so, and for all the seal of confession, sometimes opened many of them to no fewer witnesses than a whole assembly. Thus it was, in the Greek church, both law and custom. But now if we look into the Latin church, we shall find that it was taken up from example of the Greeks and somewhile practised, that some particular sins should be published in the church before the congregation, as it is confessed in the council of Mentz, and inserted by Burchard into his decree.[i]

But when the lay-piety began to cool, and the zeal of some clergymen wax too hot, they would needs heighten this custom of publication of some sins, to a law of the publishing of all sins. This being judged to be inconvenient, expressed the first decree for the seal of confession in the Latin church. Now see how it is uttered, and it will sufficiently inform us both of the practice and the opinion, which antiquity had of the obligation to the seal.

"Illam contra apostolicam regulam præsumptionem," &c. that is, "it was against the apostolical ordinance, that a law should enjoin that the priest should reveal all those sins which had been told him in confession."[k] It might be done, so it were not required and exacted, and yet might be so required, so it were not a publication of all. "Non enim omnium hujusmodi sunt peccata;" saith St. Leo: "some sins are inconvenient to be published:" it is not fit the world should know all, therefore some they might, or else he had said nothing. The reason which he gives, makes the business somewhat clearer, for he derives it, not from any simple necessity of the thing, or a Divine right, but lest men out of inordinate love to themselves, "should rather refuse to be washed than buy their purity with so much shame." The whole epistle hath many things in it excellently to the same purpose.

I say no more; the doctrine and practice of antiquity is sufficiently evident, and that there is nothing less than a universal tradition for the seal of confession to be observed in all cases, even of sins of the highest malignity.

Thus these fathers confessors are made totally inexcusable by concealing a treason, which was not revealed to them in a formal confession, and had been likewise culpable though it had, there being, as I have shown, no such sacredness of the seal as to be inviolable in all cases whatsoever.

I have now done with the several considerations of the persons to whom the question was propounded; they were the fathers confessors in the day, but it was Christ the Lord, in my text. The question itself follows, "Shall we command fire to come from heaven and consume them?"

The question was concerning the fate of a whole town of Samaria; in our case it was more, of the fate of a whole kingdom. It had been well if such a question had been silenced by a direct negative, or (as the judges of the Areopagus used to do) put off "ad diem longissimum," that they might have expected the answer three ages after.

"De morte hominis nulla est cunctatio longa;" no demur had been too long in a case of so much and so royal blood, the blood of a king, of a king's children, of a king's kingdom. Πρίαμος Πριαμοῦ τε παῖδες, king and kingdom should have been made a solemn sacrifice to appease their solemn deliberate malice. I said "deliberate," for they were loth to be malicious without good advice, and therefore they asked their question, worthy of an oracle even no less than Delphic, where an evil spirit was the "numen," and a witch the prophet. For the question was such of which a christian could not doubt, though he had been fearfully scrupulous in his resolutions. For who ever questioned the unlawfulness of murder, of murdering innocents, of murdering them who were confessed righteous? For such was their proposal; being rather willing that catholics should perish with those whom they thought heretics, than that there should be no blood spilt.

But to the question. It was fire they called for, the most merciless of all the elements, no possibility of relenting when once kindled, and had its object. It was the fittest instrument for merciless men, men of no bowels, whose malice, like their instrument, did "agere ad extremum suarum virium," "work to the highest of its possibility." Secondly; it was fire indeed they called for, but not like that in my text, not fire from heaven. They might have called as long and as loud as those priests did who contested with Elisha; no fire would have come from heaven to have consumed what they had intended for a sacrifice. God's anathemas post not so fast as ours do: "Deus non est sicut homo." Man curseth often when God blesseth; men condemn whom God acquits, and, therefore, they were loth to trust God with their cause, they therefore take it into their own hands. And certainly, if to their anathemas they add some faggots of their own, and gunpowder, it is odds but then we may be consumed indeed; and so did they; their fire was not from heaven.

Lastly, it was a fire so strange, that it had no example. The apostles, indeed, pleaded a mistaken precedent for the reasonableness of their demand, they desired leave to do but "even as Elias did." The Greeks only retain this clause, it is not in the Bibles of the church of Rome, and really these "Romano-barbari" could never pretend to any precedent for an act so barbarous as theirs. Adramelech, indeed, killed a king, but he spared the people; Haman would have killed the people, but spared the king; but that both king and people, princes and judges, branch, and rush, and root, should die at once, (as if Caligulas were actuated and all England upon one head,) was never known till now, that all the malice in the world met in this, as in a centre. The Sicilian even-song, the matins of St. Bartholomew, known for the pitiless and damned massacres, were but κάπνου σκίας ὄναρ, "the dream of the shadow of smoke," if compared with this great fire. "In tam occupato sæculo fabulas vulgaris nequitia non invenit." This was a busy age; Erostratus must have invented a more sublimed malice than the burning of one temple, or not have been so much as spoke of since the discovery of the powder-treason. But I must make more haste, I shall not else climb the sublimity of this impiety. Nero was sometimes the "populare odium," was "popularly hated;" and deserved it too; for he slew his master, and his wife, and all his family, once or twice over, opened his mother's womb, fired the city, laughed at it, slandered the christians for it, but yet all these were but "principia malorum," the very first "rudiments of evil." Add then to these, Herod's master-piece at Ramah, as it was deciphered by the tears and sad threnes of the matrons in a universal mourning for the loss of their pretty infants; yet this of Herod will prove but an infant wickedness, and that of Nero, the evil but of one city. I would willingly have found out an example, but I see I cannot, should I put into the scale the extract of all the old tyrants famous in antique stories,

> "Bistonii stabulum regis, Busiridis aras, > Antiphatæ mensas, et Taurica regna Thoantis."

Should I take for true story the highest cruelty as it was fancied by the most hieroglyphical Egyptian, this alone would weigh them down, as if the Alps were put in scale against the dust of a balance. For had this accursed treason prospered, we should have had the whole kingdom mourn for the inestimable loss of its chiefest glory, its life, its present joy, and all its very hopes for the future. For such was their destined malice, that they would not only have inflicted so cruel a blow, but have made it incurable, by cutting off our supplies of joy, the whole succession of the line royal. Not only the vine itself, but all the "gemmulæ," and the tender olive-branches should either have been bent to their intentions, and made to grow crooked, or else been broken.

And now after such a sublimity of malice, I will not instance in the sacrilegious ruin of the neighbouring temples, which needs must have perished in the flame, nor in the disturbing the ashes of our entombed kings, devouring their dead ruins, like sepulchral dogs, these are but minutes, in respect of the ruin prepared for the living temples.

Let us then return to God the cup of thanksgiving, he having poured forth so largely to us of the cup of salvation. We cannot want wherewithal to fill it, here is matter enough for an eternal thankfulness, for the expression of which a short life is too little; but let us here begin our hallelujahs, hoping to finish them hereafter, where the many choirs of angels will fill the concert.

Praise the Lord, ye house of Levi; ye that fear the Lord, praise the Lord. Praise the Lord out of Sion, which dwelleth at Jerusalem.[1]

SERMON X.

In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works: in doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity,

Sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part, may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say to you.—Tit. ii. 7, 8.

As God, in the creation of the world, first produced a mass of matter, having nothing in it but an obediential capacity and passivity; which God separating into classes of division, gave to every part a congruity to their respective forms, which, in their distinct orbs and stations, they did receive in order, and then were made beauteous by separations and a new economy; and out of these he appointed some for servants, and some for government; and some to eat, and some to be eaten; some above, and some below; some to be useful to all the rest, and all to minister to the good of man, whom he made the prince of the creation, and a minister of the Divine glory.—So God hath also done in the new creation; all the world was concluded under sin; it was a corrupt mass; all mankind "had corrupted themselves;" but yet were capable of Divine influences, and of a nobler form, producible in the new birth: here then God's Spirit moves upon the waters of a Divine birth, and makes a separation of part from part, of corruption from corruption; and first chose some families to whom he communicated the Divine influences and the breath of a nobler life; Seth and Enoch, Noah and Abraham, Job and Bildad, and these were the special repositories of the Divine grace, and prophets of righteousness to glorify God in themselves, and in their sermons unto others. But this was like enclosing of the sun; he that shuts him in, shuts him out; and God, who was and is an infinite goodness, would not be circumscribed, and limited to a narrow circle; goodness is his nature, and infinite is his measure, and communication of that goodness is the motion of that eternal being: God, therefore, breaks forth as out of a cloud, and picks out a whole nation; the sons of Israel became his family, and that soon swelled into a nation, and that nation multiplied, till it became too big for their country, and by a necessary dispersion went, and did much good, and gained some servants to God out of other parts of mankind. But God was pleased to cast lots once more, and was like the sun already risen upon the earth, who spreads his rays to all the corners of the habitable world, that all that will open their eyes and draw their curtains, may see and rejoice in his light. Here God resolved to call all the world; he sent into the highways and hedges, to the corners of the gentiles, and the highways of the Jews, all might come that would; for "the sound of the gospel went out into all lands:" and God chose all that came, but all would not; and those that did, he gathered into a fold, marked them with his own mark, sent his Son to be "the great Shepherd and Bishop of their souls;" and they became "a peculiar people unto God," "a little flock," "a new election."

And here is the first separation and singularity of the gospel; all that hear the voice of Christ's first call, all that profess themselves his disciples, all that take his signature, they and their children are the church, an Ἐκκλησία, called out from the rest of the world, the "elect" and the "chosen of God."

Now these being thus chosen out, culled and picked from the evil generations of the world, he separates them from others, to gather them to himself; he separates them and sanctifies them to become holy; to come out, not of the companies so much, as from the evil manners of the world; God chooses them unto holiness, they are τεταγμένοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, "put in the right order to eternal life."

All christians are holy unto the Lord, and therefore must not be unholy in their conversation; for nothing that is unholy shall come near to God; that is the first great line of our duty; but God intends it further; all christians must not be only holy, but eminently holy. For "John indeed baptized with water;" but that is but a dull and inactive element, and moves by no principle, but by being ponderous; Christ "baptizes with the Holy Ghost and with fire," and God hates lukewarmness; and when he chooses to him a peculiar people, he adds, they must be "zealous of good works."

But in this affair there are many steps and great degrees of progression. 1. All God's people must be delivered from all sin; for as Christ came wholly "to destroy the works of the devil," so he intends also "to present his church as a pure virgin unto Christ;" ἄσπιλον, ἀπρόσκοπον, εἰλικρινῆ, "without scandal, without hypocrisy," "without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing:" for to be quit from sin, that is, from all affection to it, is supposed in the christian's life; "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts," and "being cleansed from all filthiness of flesh and spirit," and "having escaped from all corruption that is in the world through lust;" this is not so much commanded as supposed: without this, nothing can be done, nothing can be hoped: this is but the foundation of the christian, who is intended to be "a habitation of God," "a member of Christ," "a temple of the holy Spirit of God:" the building follows.

2. All christians must acquire all the graces of the Holy Spirit of God: St. Peter gives the catalogue; "faith, and virtue, and knowledge, and temperance, and patience, and godliness, and brotherly kindness, and charity:"[a] and that you may see what is the spirit of a christian, what an activity and brisk principle is required to the acquisition of these things; the apostle gives this precept, that for the acquiring these things, "we should give" πᾶσαν σπουδὴν, "all diligence;' no lazy worker is a good christian, he must be diligent; and not every diligence, nor every degree of good diligence; but it must be all, "omnem omnino diligentiam," "give all diligence."

3. There is yet another degree to be added hereto: it is not enough for a christian to be free from corruption, and to have these graces; and therefore to be diligent, very diligent to obtain them; but "they must be in us, and abound."[b] N. B. they must be in us; these graces and this righteousness must be inherent; it is not enough for us that Christ had them for us; for it is true, if he had not had them, we should never have received those, or any thing else that is good: but he had them, that we might have them, and follow his steps who knew no sin, and fulfilled all righteousness. They "must be in us," saith St. Peter; and not only so, they must also abound in us; that is the end of Christ's death; that is the fruit of his Spirit: they must be plentiful, like a full vintage, or like Euphrates in the time of ripe fruits; they must swell over the banks: for when they are but "in gradu virtutis," "in the lowest step of sincerity," they may fall from the tree like unripe fruit, and be fit for nothing but for prodigals and swine; they must be in their season and period, great, and excellent, and eminent; they must take up all our faculties, fill up all our time, spend all our powers, satisfy the will, and be adequate to all the powers of our choice; that is, as St. Peter adds, they must be so, that we "make our calling and election sure;" so as that we shall never any more depart from God: well, thus far, you see how severe and sacred a thing it is to be a christian.

4. But there are yet three steps more beyond this: God requires of us perseverance; a thrusting all this forward, even unto the end: "without peace and holiness no man shall see God,"[c] saith the author to the Hebrews; but that is not all; διώκετε εἰρήνην καὶ ἁγιασμὸν, "follow after peace and holiness with all men," ἄνευ οὗ, "without which;" it is not ἄνευ ἧς εἰρήνης, "without which peace," but ἄνευ οὗ διώκειν, "without which following of peace and holiness;" that is, unless we endure all contradiction of sinners and objections; without following it close and home to the utmost issue, to the end of all righteousness, tending even to comprehension, to consummation and perfection, no man shall see God; διοικεῖν ἐν ἁγιασμῷ, is good and great, "to dwell in holiness;" but that is not enough, it must be διώκειν too, we must still pursue it, and that unto the end: "for he that endureth unto the end shall be saved."

5. And what more? yes, there is something yet: for besides this extension of duration, there must be "intensio graduum:" for "nondum comprehendimus, nondum perfecti sumus;" "we have not yet comprehended, we are not yet made perfect;" but that must be aimed at: "Be ye perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect;"—be "ye meek as Christ is;"—"be ye holy as God is holy;—"pure as your Father in heaven is pure:"—and who can be so? no man can be so in degree, but so in kind; every man must desire, and every man must contend to be, and therefore it is possible, else it had never been required.

6. And now after all this, one thing more is to be done: you must be so for yourselves, and you must be so for others: you must be so as to please God, and you must be so to edify your brethren: "Let your light so shine before men, that they may glorify your Father which is in heaven:" let it be so eminent and conspicuous, that all that see your conversation, and all that come into your congregations, may be convinced, and "falling down and worshipping, may say, of a truth, the Spirit of the Lord is in you." And therefore our blessed Saviour, in his sermon upon the mount, which is the summary of a christian's life,—at the end of the eight beatitudes, tells all his followers and disciples: "Ye are the salt of the world, ye are the light of the world;" and therefore "the kingdom of heaven," or the gospel, is compared "to a woman that hid, in three measures of meal,"—the Jews, the Turks, the heathen idolaters,—"her leaven, till all was leavened:" our light must be so shining, our conversation so exemplar, as to draw all the world after us; that they that will not, may be ashamed, and they that will, may be allured by the beauty of the flame. These are the proportions and measures of every christian; for "from the days of John the Baptist, the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force;" that although "John the Baptist was the greatest that ever was born of woman," yet he that "is least in the kingdom of heaven," the meanest of the laity, may be "greater than he." This is a great height: and these things I have premised, not only to describe the duty of all that are here present, even of all christians whatsoever, that you may not depart without your portion of a blessing; but also as a foundation of the ensuing periods, which I shall address to you, my brethren of the clergy, the fathers of the people; for I speak in a school of the prophets, prophets and prophets' sons; to you who are, or intend to be so.

For God hath made a separation of you even beyond this separation: he hath separated you yet again; he hath put you anew into the crucible; he hath made you to pass through the fire seven times more. For it is true, that the whole community of the people is the church; "Ecclesia sancta est communio sanctorum," "the holy catholic church is the communion of saints;" but yet, by the voice and consent of all christendom, you are the church, by way of propriety, and eminency, and singularity; "churchmen,"—that is your appellative: all are ἀνδρὲς πνευματικοὶ, "spiritual men;" all have received the Spirit, and all walk in the Spirit, and ye are all "sealed by the Spirit unto the day of redemption;" and yet there is a spirituality peculiar to the clergy: "If any man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness:"[d] you who are spiritual by office and designation, of a spiritual calling, and spiritual employment; you who have the Spirit of the Lord Jesus, and minister the Spirit of God, you are more eminently spiritual; you have the Spirit in graces and in powers, in sanctification and abilities, in office and in person; the unction from above hath descended upon your heads and upon your hearts: you are κατ' ἐξοχὴν "by way of eminency" and prelation, "spiritual men." All "the people of God were holy;" Korah and his company were in the right so far; but yet Moses and Aaron were more holy, and stood nearer to God. All the people are prophets: it is now more than Moses's wish, for the Spirit of Christ hath made them so: "If any man prayeth or prophesieth with his head covered;" or "if any woman prophesieth with her head uncovered," they are dishonoured: but either man or woman may do that work in time and place; for "in the latter days I will pour out of my Spirit, and your daughters shall prophesy;" and yet, God hath appointed in his church prophets above these, to whose Spirit all the other prophets are subject; and as God said to Aaron and Miriam concerning Moses, "to you I am known in a dream or a vision, but to Moses I speak face to face;" so it is in the church; God gives of his Spirit to all men, but you he hath made the ministers of his Spirit: nay, the people have their portion of the keys of the kingdom of heaven, so said St. Paul; "To whom ye forgive any thing, to him I forgive also;" and to the whole church of Corinth he gave a commission, "in the name of Christ, and by his Spirit, to deliver the incestuous person unto Satan;" and when the primitive penitents stood in their penitential stations, they did "Charis Dei adgeniculari, et toti populo legationem orationis suæ commendare;" and yet the keys were not only promised, but given to the apostles, to be used then, and transmitted to all generations of the church; and we are "ministers of Christ, and stewards of the manifold myteries of God; and to us is committed the word of reconciliation." And thus, in the consecration of the mysterious sacrament, the people have their portion; for the bishop or the priest blesses, and the people, by saying "Amen" to the mystic prayer, is partaker of the power, and the whole church hath a share in the power of spiritual sacrifice; "Ye are a royal priesthood, kings and priests unto God;" that is, so ye are priests as ye are kings; but yet kings and priests have a glory conveyed to them, of which the people partake but in minority, and allegory, and improper communication: but you are, and are to be respectively, that considerable part of mankind, by whom God intends to plant holiness in the world; by you God means to reign in the hearts of men; and therefore you are to be the first in this kind, and consequently the measure of all the rest: to you, therefore, I intend this, and some following discourses, in order to this purpose: I shall but now lay the first stone, but it is the corner-stone in this foundation.

But to you, I say, of the clergy, these things are spoken properly; to you these powers are conveyed really; upon you God hath poured his Spirit plentifully; you are the choicest of his choice, the elect of his election, a church picked out of the church, vessels of honour for your Master's use, appointed to teach others, authorized to bless in his name; you are the ministers of Christ's priesthood, underlabourers in the great work of mediation and intercession, "Medii inter Deum et populum;" you are for the people towards God, and convey answers and messages from God to the people: these things I speak, not only to magnify your office, but to enforce and heighten your duty; you are holy by office and designation; for your very appointment is a sanctification and a consecration; and therefore whatever holiness God requires of the people who have some little portions in the priesthood evangelical, he expects it of you, and much greater, to whom he hath conveyed so great honours, and admitted so near unto himself, and hath made to be the great ministers of his kingdom and his Spirit: and now, as Moses said to the Levitical schismatics, Korah and his company, so I may say to you; "Seemeth it but a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation of Israel to bring you to himself, to do the service of the tabernacle of the Lord, and to stand before the congregation to minister to them? And he hath brought thee near to him."[e] Certainly, if of every one of the christian congregation God expects a holiness that mingles with no unclean thing; if God will not suffer of them a lukewarm and an indifferent service, but requires zeal of his glory, and that which St. Paul calls the πόνος τῆς ἀγάπης, "the labour of love;" if he will have them to be "without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing;" if he will not endure any pollution in their flesh or spirit; if he requires that their bodies, and souls, and spirits be kept blameless unto the coming of the Lord Jesus; if he accepts of none of the people, unless they have within them the conjugation of all christian graces; if he calls on them to abound in every grace, and that in all the periods of their progression, unto the ends of their lives, and to the consummation and perfection of grace; if he hath made them lights in the world, and the salt of the earth, to enlighten others by their good example, and to teach them, and invite them by holy discourses, and wise counsels, and speech seasoned with salt; what is it, think ye, or with what words is it possible to express what God requires of you? They are to be examples of good life to one another; but you are to be examples even of the examples themselves; that is your duty, that is the purpose of God, and that is the design of my text, "That in all things ye show yourselves a pattern of good works; in doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you."

Here then is, 1. Your duty. 2. The degrees and excellency of your duty.

The duty is double: 1. Holiness of life. 2. Integrity of doctrine. Both these have their heightenings, in several degrees.

1. For your life and conversation, it ought not only to be good, not only to be holy, but to be so up to the degrees of an excellent example; "Ye must be a pattern."

2. Ye must be patterns, not only of knowledge and wisdom, not of contemplation and skill in mysteries, not of unprofitable notions, and ineffective wit and eloquence; but of something that is more profitable, of something that may do good, something by which mankind shall be better; of something that shall contribute to the felicity and comfort of the world; "a pattern of good words."

3. It must not be a τύπος, "a type" or pattern to be hidden or laid in tabernacles, like those images of Moloch and Remphan, which the Spirit of God in the Old Testament calls סכות בנות "Succoth Benoth," little repositories or booths to hide their images and patterns of their gods; but παρεχόμενος τύπον, "you must be exhibited" and shown forth, brought forth into action and visibility, and notorious observation.

4. There is also another mystery and duty in this word; for Moloch and Remphan they were patterns and figures, but they were τύποι οὓς ἐποιήσαντο, "patterns which the people made;"—but to Titus St. Paul commanded that he himself should be παρεχόμενος τύπον, "he should give a pattern" to the people; that is, the ministers of Christ must not be framed according to the people's humour, they must not give him rules, nor describe his measures; but he should be a rule to them; he is neither to live with them, so as to please their humours, or to preach doctrines "populo ut placerent, quas fecisset fabulas:"[f] but the people are to require the doctrine at his mouth, and he is to become exemplar to them, according to the pattern seen in the mount, according to the laws of the religion and the example of Christ.

5. It must be ἐν πᾶσιν; he must be a pattern "in all things:" it is not enough that the minister be a loving person, a good neighbourly man, that he be hospitable, that he be not litigious, that he be harmless, and that he be diligent; but in every grace he must "præferre facem," "hold a torch," and show himself a light in all the commands of God. These are the measures of his holiness, the pattern in his life and conversation.

Secondly; Integrity of doctrine. The matter of the doctrine you are to preach, hath in it four qualifications.

1. It must be ἀδιάφθορος, "incorrupt;" that is, it must be κατ' ἀναλογίαν πίστεως, it must be "according to the analogy of faith," no heretical mixtures, pure truths of God.

2. It must be σεμνὸς, "grave," and clean, and chaste; that is, ἄνευ φλυαρίας, no vain and empty notions, little contentions, and pitiful disputes; but becoming the wisdom of the guides of souls, and the ministers of Christ.

And 3. It must be ὑγιὴς, "sound speech," so we read it; the word properly signifies "salutary" and "wholesome;" that is, such as is apt for edification, εἰς οἰκοδομὴν πίστεως καὶ ἀγάπης; "for the building men up in a most holy faith, and a more excellent charity;" not feeding the people with husks and draff, with colocynths and gourds, with gay tulips and useless daffodils, but with the bread of life, and medicinal plants, springing from the margin of the fountains of salvation. This is the matter of their doctrine; and this also hath some heightenings, and excellencies, and extraordinaries: for,

4. It must be ἀκατάγνωστος, so evidently demonstrated, that "no man shall be able to reprove it;" so certainly holy, that no man shall be willing to condemn it.

And 5. It must be ἄφθαρτος, "sincere," not polluted with foul intentions and little devices of secular interests, complying with the lusts of the potent, or the humours of the time; not biassed by partiality, or bending in the flexures of human policy: it must be so conducted that your very enemies, schismatics and heretics, and all sorts of gainsayers, may see that you intend God's glory, and the good of souls; and, therefore, that as they can say nothing against the doctrine delivered, so neither shall they find fault with him that delivers it: and he that observes all this, will indeed be a pattern both of life and doctrine; both of good words and good works.

But I shall not be so minute in my discourse, as in the division; the duties, and the manner or degrees of the duties, I shall handle together, and give you the best measures I can, both for institution of life and excellency of doctrine:—it is required of every one of you, that in all things you show yourselves a pattern of good works.

That is the first thing required in a minister: and this is, upon infinite accounts, necessary: 1. In general. 2. In particular. 1. In general. The very first words of the whole psalter are an argument of this necessity: "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the chair of the mockers," the seat of the scornful. The doctor's chair or pulpit must have nothing to do with the "irrisores," that mock God, and mock the people; he must neither walk with them, nor stand with them, nor sit with them; that is, he must "have no fellowship with the unfruitful workers of darkness, but rather reprove them;" for they that do preach one thing, and do another, are לצים, "mockers;" they destroy the benefit of the people, and diminish the blessings of God; and "binding burdens on the people's shoulders which they will not touch with the top of their finger," they secretly laugh and mock at the people, as at the asses of Issachar, fit to be cozened into unnecessary burdens. These words are greatly to be regarded: the primitive church would admit no man to the superior orders of the clergy, unless, among other prerequired dispositions, they could say all David's psalter by heart; and it was very well, besides many other reasons, that they might in the front read their own duty, so wisely and so mysteriously, by the Spirit of God, made preliminary to the whole office.

To the same purpose is that observation of St. Jerome made concerning the vesting of the priests in the Levitical ministrations; the priest put on the humeral, beset with precious stones, before he took the λόγιον, or the "rationale" upon his breast, to signify, that first the priest must be a shining light, resplendent with good works, before he fed them with the γάλα λογικὸν, "the rational milk," of the word: concerning which symbolical precept, you may please to read many excellent things to his purpose, in St. Jerome's epistle to Fabiola. It will be more useful for us to consider those severe words of David; "But unto the wicked God saith, What hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldst take my covenant in thy mouth; seeing thou hatest instruction and castest my words behind thee?"[g] The words are a sad upbraiding to all ungodly ministers, and they need no commentary; for whatever their office and employment be to teach God's people, yet, unless they regard the commandments of God in their heart and practice themselves, they having nothing to do with the word of God,—they sin in taking the covenant, a testament of God, into their mouth. God said to the sinner, רשע Raschaah, that is, "to him that had sinned and had not repented of his sins;" so the Chaldee paraphrase reads it; "Impio autem, qui non agit pœnitentiam et orat in prævaricatione, dixit Deus." Indeed, if none could be admitted to this ministry but those who had never sinned, the harvest might be very great, but the labourers would be extremely few, or rather none at all; but, after repentance, they must be admitted, and not before; "Iniquitas opilabit os eorum," "iniquity shall stop their mouths," saith David;[h] that ought to silence them indeed: and this was David's care, when he had fallen into the foul crimes of murder and adultery; he knew himself unfit and unable, though he were a prophet, to teach others the laws of God; but when he prayed to God to restore him to a free spirit, he adds; "Then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee:"[i] till then it was to no purpose for him to preach. "But thou, when thou art converted," said Christ to Peter, "strengthen the brethren."—The primitive church had a degree of severity beyond this; for they would not admit any man, who had done public penance, to receive holy orders: to which purpose they were excellent words which P. Hormisda spake in his letters to the bishops of Spain, in which he exhorts them to the observation of the ancient canons of the church, telling them that "They who are promoted to the clergy, ought to be better than others;" "nam longâ debet vitam suam probatione monstrare, cui gubernacula committuntur ecclesiæ; non negamus," &c. we deny not but amongst the laity there are many whose manners are pleasing to God, but the faithful laws of God seek for him soldiers that are approved; and they ought rather to afford to others, by themselves, an example of a religious life, than require it from them; "ideoque nullus ex pœnitentibus debet ordinari; quis enim quem paulo ante jacentem viderat, veneretur antistitem?" "None of the public penitents must be ordained; for who will esteem that priest venerable, whom a little before he saw dishonoured by scandalous and public crimes?" But this is to be understood of them only, as the prophet Amos expresses it, "qui corripiuntur in portâ," "who are rebuked in the gate,"[k] condemned by public sentence, and are blotted with the reproaches of the law. But in all cases, Turpe est doctori, cum culpa redarguit ipsum.

The guilt of the sin which a man reproves, quite spoils his sermon: "ipsam obmutescere facundiam, si ægra sit conscientia," said St. Ambrose; "a sick conscience spoils the tongue of the eloquent, and makes it stammer." For how shall any man preach against sin, or affright his people from their dangers, if he denies God's justice? and if he thinks God is just, why is not he confounded, that, with his own mouth, pronounces damnation against himself? Nothing confounds a man so much, as to be judged out of his own mouth: "Esse munda studeat manus, quæ diluere sordes curat," said St. Gregory; "the hand that means to make another clean, should not itself be dirty. But all this is but in general; there are yet considerations more particular and material.

1. A minister of an evil life cannot do so much good to his charges; he cannot profit them, he is not useful εἰς οἰκοδομήν, he pulls down as fast, or faster than he builds up. "Talmud absque opere non est magnum Talmud," said the Jews' proverb: "a good sermon without a good example is no very good sermon." For, besides that such a man is contemptible to his people, contemptible, not only naturally, but by Divine judgment (according to that of the prophet, "Propter quod dedi vos contemptibiles omni populo," "for this very reason I have made you to be scorned in the eyes of all the people"[l]): but besides this, it is very considerable what St. Chrysostom says; "Si prædicas et non facis, opus proponis tanquam impossibile:" "he that preaches mortification and lives voluptuously, propounds the duty as if it were impossible:" for certainly if it be good, and if it be possible, a man will ask, why is it not done? It is easy for him that is well to give a sick man counsel: "Verùm tu si hic esses, certè aliter sentires;" when it comes to be his own case, when the sickness pinches, and when the belly calls for meat, where's the fine oration then? "Omnia quæ vindicâris in altero, tibi ipsi vehementer fugienda sunt: etenim non modo accusator, sed ne objurgator ferendus est, qui, quod in altero vitium reprehendit, in eo ipse deprehenditur:" "whatsoever you reprove in others, must be infinitely avoided by yourself: for no man will endure an accuser, no not so much as a man to chide, for that fault in which himself was taken."[m] But if your charges see you bear your sickness patiently, and your cross nobly, and despise money generously, and forgive your enemy bravely, and relieve the poor charitably, then he sees your doctrine is tangible and material; it is more than words, and he loves you, and considers what you say. In the East the shepherds used to go before their sheep, to which our blessed Saviour alludes, "My sheep hear my voice and follow me;" but our shepherds are forced to drive them, and affright them with dogs and noises: it were better if themselves did go before. 3. A minister of an evil life cannot preach with that fervour and efficacy, with that life and spirit, as a good man does; for besides that he does not himself understand the secrets of religion, and the private inducements of the Spirit, and the sweetness of internal joy, and the inexpressible advantages of a holy peace; besides this, he cannot heartily speak all that he knows; he hath a clog at his foot, and a gag in his teeth; there is a fear, and there is a shame, and there is a guilt, and a secret willingness that the thing were not true; and some little private arts to lessen his own consent, and to take off the asperities and consequent troubles of a clear conviction. To which if we add, that there is a secret envy in all wicked men against the prosperities of goodness; and if I should say no more, this alone were enough to silence a Boanerges, and to make his thunder still and easy as an oaten pipe: "Nonne id flagitium est, te aliis consilium dare, foris sapere, tibi non posse auxiliari?" "That is a burning shame and an intolerable wickedness, that a minister shall be like Marcotis, or the statue of Mercury, show the way to others, and himself stand still like a painted block; to be wise abroad, and a very fool in his own concerns, and unable to do himself good."—"Dicit Reslakis, 'orna teipsum, postea ornato alios:'" "first trim thyself, and then adorn thy brother," said the rabbins: but certain it is, he that cannot love to see others better than himself, it cannot be that he should heartily endeavour it.

It is not to be expected that a diseased father should beget wholesome children: like will come from like, whether the principle be good or evil.

But, secondly; for this is but the ἀρχὴ ὠδίνων; this is but the least evil; there is yet much worse behind. A wicked minister cannot with success and benefit pray for the people of his charges; and this is a great matter; for prayer is the key of David, and God values it at so high a rate, that Christ is made the prince of all intercession, and God hath appointed angels to convey to his throne of grace the prayers of the saints; and he hath made prophets and priests, even the whole clergy, the peculiar ministers of prayer: "Orabit pro eo sacerdos;" "the priest shall pray for him," the priest shall make an atonement for his sin, and it shall be forgiven him.[n] And God's anger is no where more fiercely described, than when things come to that pass that he will not hear the priest or prophet praying for the people: "Pray not thou for this people, neither lift up prayer nor cry for them, neither make intercession to me; for behold mine anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place."[o] When the prayers of the gracious and acceptable persons, the presidents of prayer, are forbidden, then things are desperate; it is a greater excommunication; "the man sins a sin unto death; and I say not that thou pray for him that sins unto death." This, I say, is the priest's office, and if the people lose the benefit of this, they are undone. To bishop Timothy, St. Paul gave it in charge, "That supplications, and prayers, and intercessions, be made for all men." And St. James advised "the sick to send for the elders of the church," (the bishops and priests,) "and let them pray over them," and then "their sins shall be forgiven them." But how? that is supposed, the minister prays for vently, and be a righteous man; for "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much;" it is promised on no other terms. "Qualis vir, talis oratio," is an old rule: "as is the man, such is his prayer." "The prayer of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord," said Solomon; he cannot prevail for himself, much less for others. I remember that Bias being once in a storm, and a company of villains in the ship, being affrighted, called upon their gods for help: "Cavete," said he, "ne vos dii interesse sentiant:" "take heed lest the gods perceive you to be here," lest we all perish for your sakes. And upon surer grounds it was that David said, "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear my prayer." And what then do you think will be the event of those assemblies, where he that presents the prayers of all the people, is hateful to God? will God receive the oblation that is presented to him by an impure hand? The Levitical priests were commanded to wash before they sacrificed:[p] and every man is commanded to repent before he prays; "My son, hast thou sinned, do so no more;" and then, "ask pardon for thy former fault."[q] And can we hope that the minister, who, "with wrath and doubting," and covetousness, presents the people's prayers, that ever those intercessions shall pierce the clouds, and ascend to the mercy-seat, and descend with a blessing? Believe it not: a man that is ungracious in his life, can never be gracious in his office, and acceptable to God. We are abundantly taught this, by those excellent words of God by the prophet Micah: "The heads of Sion judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire, and the prophets thereof divine for money; yet will they lean upon the Lord, and say, Is not the Lord among us?"[r] As if God had said, nothing is so presumptuous and unreasonable as to lean upon God, and think he will be among us, when the priests and the prophets are covetous and wicked. No, he declares it expressly, (v. 7.) "Then shall the seers be ashamed, and the diviners confounded, yea, they shall all cover their lips; for there is no answer of God." God will not answer; for sometimes the case is so, that, "though Noah, Daniel, and Job were there," God would not hear; that is, when the people are incorrigibly wicked, and the decree is irrevocably gone out for judgment. But there are other times, in which the prayers of innocent people, being presented by an ungracious minister and intercessor, are very much hindered in prevailing. In such cases, God is put to extraordinaries; and Christ and Christ's angels are then the suppletories, and, at the best, the people's prayers go alone, they want the assistance of the "angel of the church," and they get no help or furtherance from him, and probably very much hinderance: according to that of St. Gregory: "Cum is qui displicet, ad intercedendum mittitur, irati animus ad deteriora provocatur." Alexander hated to see Zercon, and, therefore, if he had interceded for Clytus, it would but have hastened his death: a man's suit thrives the worse for having a hated intercessor. If, therefore, he that robs a church of a patin or a chalice, be a sacrilegious person, what is he that steals from the church of God (so far as lies in him) the fruit of all their holy prayers; that corrupts the sacrifice, and puts coloquintida into the cups of salvation, and mingles death in the pottage provided for the children and disciples of the prophets? I can say no more, but to expostulate with them in those upbraiding words of God, in the prophet: "Do they provoke me to anger, saith the Lord? do they not provoke themselves to the confusion of their own faces?"[s] "Confundentur divini, et operient vultus suos omnes:"[t] "all such divines shall be confounded, and shall cover their faces in the day of sad accounts." "Divini sunt, non theologi:" "they are diviners, and not divines," witches rather than prophets; they are the sons of Bosor, and have no portion in the economy of God. In short, if so much holiness as I formerly described, be required of him that is appointed to preach to others, to offer spiritual sacrifices for the people, to bless the people, to divert judgments from them, to deprecate the wrath of God, to make an atonement for them, and to reconcile them to the eternal mercy;—certain it is, that though the sermons of a wicked minister may do some good, not so much as they ought, but some they can; yet the prayer of a wicked minister does no good at all; it provokes God to anger, it is an abomination in his righteous eyes.

Thirdly: The ecclesiastical order is by Christ appointed to minister his Holy Spirit to the people; the priests, in baptism, and the holy eucharist, and prayer, and intercession; the bishop, in all these, and in ordination besides, and in confirmation, and in solemn blessing: now then consider what will be the event of this without effect: can he minister the Spirit, from whom the Spirit of God is departed? And, therefore, since all wickedness does "grieve the Spirit of God," and great wickedness defiles his temples, and destroys them unto the ground, and extinguishes the Spirit that drives iniquity away;—these persons are no longer spiritual men; "they are carnal, and sold under sin," and walk not in the Spirit; they are spiritual just as Simon Magus was a christian, or as Judas was an apostle; he had the name of it; but what says the Scripture? "He fell from it by transgression;" only this, as he that is baptized has for ever a title to the promises, and a possibility of repentance, and a right to restitution, until he renounces all, and never will or can repent; so there is in all our holy orders an indelible character, and they can, by a new life, be restored to all their powers; but in the mean time, while they abide in sin and carnality, the cloud is over the face of the sun, and the Spirit of God appears not in a fiery tongue, that is, not in material and active demonstrations; and how far he will be ministered by the offices of an unworthy man, we know not; only by all that is said in Scripture we are made to fear, that things will not be so well with the people, till the minister be better; only this we are sure of, that though one man may be much the worse for another man's sin, yet, without his own fault, no man shall perish; and God will do his work alone; and the Spirit of God, though he be ordinarily conveyed by ecclesiastical ministries, yet he also comes irregularly, and in ways of his own, and prevents the external rites, and prepossesses the hearts of his servants; and the people also have so much portion in the evangelical ministration, that if they be holy, they shall receive the Holy Ghost in their hearts, and will express him in their lives, and themselves also become kings and priests unto God, while they are zealous of good works. And to this purpose may the proverb of the Rabbins be rightly understood, "Major est qui respondit 'amen,' quam qui benedicit;" "He that says 'amen,' is greater than he that blesses or prays;" meaning, if he heartily desires what the other perfunctorily, and with his lips only, utters, not praying with his heart, and with the acceptabilities of a good life, the "amen" shall be more than all the "prayer," and the people shall prevail for themselves, when the priest could not; according to the saying of Midrasich Tehillim. "Quicunque dicit 'amen,' omnibus viribus suis, ei aperientur portæ paradisi, sicut dictum est, 'et ingredietur gens justa:'" "He that says 'amen,' with his whole power, to him the gates of Paradise shall be open, according to that which is said,—and the righteous nation shall enter in." And this is excellently discoursed of by St. Austin, "Sacramentum gratiæ dat etiam deus per malos; ipsam vero gratiam non nisi per seipsum, vel per sanctos suos;" and, therefore, he gives remission of sins by himself, or by the members of the Dove; so that good men shall be supplied by God. But as this is an infinite comfort to the people, so it is an intolerable shame to all wicked ministers; the benefit which God intended to minister by them, the people shall have without their help, and whether they will or no; but because the people get nothing by their ministration, or but very little, the ministers shall never have their portion, where the good people shall inhabit to eternal ages: and I beseech you to consider what an infinite confusion that will be at the day of judgment, when they, to whom you have preached righteousness, shall enter into everlasting glory, and you who have preached it shall have the curse of Hananeel, and the reward of Balaam, "The wages of unrighteousness." But thus it was, when the wise men asked the doctors where Christ should be born, they told them right; but the wise men went to Christ, and found him, and the doctors sat still, and went not.

Fourthly; Consider, that every sin which is committed by a minister of religion, is more than one, and it is as soon espied too; for more men look upon the sun in an eclipse, than when he is in his beauty: but every spot, I say, is greater, every mote is a beam; it is not only made so, but it is so; it hath not the excuses of the people, is not pitiable by the measures of their infirmity: and, therefore, 1. It is reckoned in the accounts of malice, never of ignorance: for ignorance itself, in them, is always a double sin; and, therefore, it is very remarkable, that when God gave command to the Levitical priests to make atonement for the sins of ignorance in the people, there is no mention made of the priests' sin of ignorance; God supposed no such thing in them, and Moses did not mention it, and there was no provision made in that case, as you may see at large in Levit. iv. and Numb. xv.[x] But 2. Because every priest is a man also, observe how his sin is described, Levit. iv. 3. "If the priest that is anointed do sin according to the sin of the people;" that is, if he be so degenerate, and descend from the glory where God hath placed him, and do sin after the manner of the people, then he is to proceed to remedy: intimating that it is infinitely besides expectation; it is a strange thing, it is like a monstrous production; it is unnatural that a priest should sin, according as the people do; however, if he does, it is not connived at with a sentence gentle, as that finds which is a sin of ignorance, or the sin of the people: no, it is not; for it is always malice, it is always uncharitableness; for it brings mischief to their congregations, and contracts their blessings into little circuits, and turns their bread into a stone, and their wine to vinegar: and then besides this, 3. It is also scandalous, and then it is infinitely against charity; such ministers make the people of God to sin, and that is against the nature of their office, and design of their persons: God sent them to bring the people from sin, and not to be like so many Jeroboams, the sons of Nebat, to set forward the devil's kingdom, to make the people to transgress the covenant of their God: for they who live more by example than by precept, will more easily follow the works of their minister than the words of God; and few men will aspire to be more righteous than their guide; they think it well if they be as he is: and hence it is no wonder that we see iniquity so popular. "Oppida tota canem venerantur, nemo Dianam;"[y] every man runs after his lusts, and after his money, because they see too many of the clergy little looking after the ways of godliness. But then consider, let all such persons consider,

5. That the accounts, which an ungodly and an irreligious minister of religion shall make, must needs be intolerable; when, besides the damnation which shall certainly be inflicted upon them for the sins of their own lives, they shall also reckon for all the dishonours they do to God, and to religion, and for all the sins of the people, which they did not, in all just ways, endeavour to hinder, and all the sins which their flocks have committed by their evil example and undisciplined lives.

6. I have but two words more to say in this affair: 1. Every minister that lives an evil life, is that person whom our blessed Saviour means under the odious appellative of a "hireling:" for he is not the hireling that receives wages, or that lives of the altar; "sine farinâ non est lex," said the doctors of the Jews; "without bread-corn no man can preach the law:" and St. Paul, though he spared the Corinthians, yet he took wages of other churches, of all, but in the regions of Achaia; and the law of nature and the law of the gospel have taken care, that "he that serves at the altar should live of the altar;" and he is no hireling for all that; but he is a hireling, that does not do his duty; he that "flies when the wolf comes," says Christ, he that is not present with them in dangers, that helps them not to resist the devil, to master their temptations, to invite them on to piety, to gain souls to Christ; to him it may be said, as the apostle did of the Gnostics, εὐσέβειά ἐστι πορισμὸς, "Gain to them is godliness;" and theology is but "artificium venale," a trade of life, to fill the belly, and keep the body warm. "An cuiquam licere putas, quod cuivis non licet?" "Is any thing lawful for thee, that is not lawful for every man?" and if thou dost not mind, in thy own case, whether it be lawful or no, then thou dost but sell sermons, and give counsel at a price, and like a fly in the temple, taste of every sacrifice, but do nothing but trouble the religious rites: for certain it is, no man takes on him this office, but he "either seeks those things which are his own, or those things which are Jesus Christ's;" and if he does this, "he is a minister of Jesus Christ;" if he does the other, he is "the hireling," and intends nothing but his belly, and "God shall destroy both it and him."

[x] Vide Origen. Homil. ii. in Levit.

7. Lastly; These things I have said unto you, that ye sin not; but this is not the great thing here intended; you may be innocent, and yet not "zealous of good works;" but if you be not this, you are not good ministers of Jesus Christ: but, that this is infinitely your duty, and indispensably incumbent on you all, besides the express words of my text, and all the precepts of Christ and his apostles, we have the concurrent sense of the whole church, the laws and expectations of all the world, requiring of the clergy a great and an exemplar sanctity: for, therefore it is, that, upon this necessity is founded the doctrine of all divines in their discourses of the states and orders of religion; of which you may largely inform yourselves in Gerson's Treatise "De perfectione Religionis," in Aquinas,[z] and in all his scholars upon that question; the sum of which is this, that all those institutions of religions, which St. Anselm calls "factitias religiones," that is, the schools of discipline in which men, forsaking the world, give themselves up wholly to a pious life, they are indeed very excellent if rightly performed; they are "status perfectionis acquirendæ," they are excellent institutions "for the acquiring perfection;" but the state of the superior clergy is "status perfectionis exercendæ," they are states which suppose perfection to be already in great measures acquired, and then to be exercised, not only in their own lives, but in the whole economy of their office: and, therefore, as none are to be chosen but those who have given themselves up to the strictness of a holy life,—so far as can be known; so none do their duty, so much as tolerably, but those who, by an exemplar sanctity, become patterns to their flocks of all good works. Herod's doves could never have invited so many strangers to their dovecotes, if they had not been besmeared with opobalsamum: but ἐὰν μύρῳ χρίσῃς τὰς περιστερὰς, καὶ ἔξωθεν ἄλλας ἄξουσιν, said Didymus;[a] "Make your pigeons smell sweet, and they will allure whole flocks;" and if your life be excellent, if your virtues be like a precious ointment, you will soon invite your charges to run "in odorem unguentorum," "after your precious odours:" but you must be excellent, not "tanquam unus de populo," "but tanquam homo Dei;" you must be a man of God, not after the common manner of men, but "after God's own heart;" and men will strive to be like you, if you be like to God: but when you only stand at the door of virtue, for nothing but to keep sin out, you will draw into the folds of Christ none but such as fear drives in. "Ad majorem Dei gloriam," "To do what will most glorify God," that is the line you must walk by: for to do no more than all men needs must, is servility, not so much as the affection of sons; much less can you be fathers to the people, when you go not so far as the sons of God: for a dark lantern, though there be a weak brightness on one side, will scarce enlighten one, much less will it conduct a multitude, or allure many followers, by the brightness of its flame. And indeed, the duty appears in this, that many things are lawful for the people, which are scandalous in the clergy; you are tied to more abstinences, to more severities, to more renunciations and self-denials, you may not with that freedom receive secular contentments that others may; you must spend more time in prayers, your alms must be more bountiful, your hands more open, your hearts enlarged; others must relieve the poor, you must take care of them; others must show themselves their brethren, but you must be their fathers; they must pray frequently and fervently, but you must give your "selves up wholly to the word of God and prayer;" they must "watch and pray, that they fall not into temptation," but you must watch for yourselves and others too; the people must mourn when they sin, but you must mourn for your own infirmities, and for the sins of others; and indeed, if the life of a clergyman does not exceed even the piety of the people, that life is, in some measure, scandalous: and what shame was ever greater than is described in the parable of the traveller going from Jerusalem to Jericho, when, to the eternal dishonour of the Levite and the priest, it is told that they went aside, and saw him with a wry neck and a bended head, but let him alone, and left him to be cured by the good Samaritan? The primitive church in her discipline used to thrust their delinquent clergy "in laicam communionem," even then when their faults were but small, and of less reproach than to deserve greater censures; yet they lessened them by thrusting them "into the lay communion," as most fit for such ministers, who refused to live at the height of sacerdotal piety. Remember your dignity, to which Christ hath called you: "Shall such a man as I flee," said the brave Eleazar? shall the stars be darkness, shall the ambassadors of Christ neglect to do their King honour, shall the glory of Christ do dishonourable and inglorious actions? "Ye are the glory of Christ," saith St. Paul; remember that. —I can say no greater thing; unless possibly this may add some moments for your care and caution, that " potentes potenter cruciabuntur," " great men shall be greatly tormented," if they sin; and to fall from a great height is an intolerable ruin. Severe were the words of our blessed Saviour, " Ye are the salt of the earth; if the salt have lost his savour, it is thenceforth good for nothing, neither for land, nor yet for the dunghill:" a greater dishonour could not be expressed; he that takes such a one up, will shake his fingers. I end with the saying of St. Austin, " Let your religious prudence think, that, in the world, especially at this time, nothing is more laborious, more difficult, or more dangerous, than the office of a bishop, or a priest, or a deacon: 'Sed apud Deum nihil beatius, si eo modo militetur quo noster imperator jubet;' 'but nothing is more blessed, if we do our duty, according to the commandment of our Lord.'" [z]

I have already discoursed of the integrity of life, and what great necessity there is, and how deep obligations lie upon you, not only to be innocent and void of offence, but also to be holy; not only pure, but shining; not only to be blameless, but to be didactic in your lives; that as, by your sermons, you preach in season, so, by your lives, you may preach out of season; that is, at all seasons, and to all men, that they, " seeing your good works, may glorify God" on your behalf, and on their own.

SERMON XI.

The second Sermon on Titus ii. 7.

Now by the order of the words, and my own undertaking, I am to tell you what are the rules and measures of your doctrine, which you are to teach the people.

1. Be sure that you teach nothing to the people but what is certainly to be found in Scripture: " Servemus eas mensuras, quas nobis per legislatorem lex spiritualis enunciat;" " The whole spiritual law given us by our law-giver, that must be our measures;" [a] for though, by persuasion and by faith, by mis-persuasion and by error, by false commentaries and mistaken glosses, every man may become a law unto himself, and unhappily bind upon his conscience burdens which Christ never imposed; yet you must bind nothing upon your charges, but what God hath bound upon you; you cannot become a law unto them; that is the only privilege of the lawgiver, who, because he was an interpreter of the Divine will, might become a law unto us; and because he was faithful in all the house, did tell us all his Father's will; and, therefore, nothing can be God's law to us, but what he hath taught us. But of this I shall need to say no more but the words of Tertullian; " Nobis nihil licet ex nostro arbitrio indulgere, sed nec eligere aliquid, quod de suo arbitrio aliquis induxerit: apostolos Domini habemus, autores, qui nec ipsi quicquam de suo arbitrio quod inducerent elegerunt, sed acceptam à Christo disciplinam fideliter nationibus assignarunt." [b] Whatsoever is not in, and taken from, the Scriptures, is from a private spirit, and that is against Scripture certainly; " for no Scripture is," ἰδίας ἐπιλύσεως, saith St. Peter; it is not, it cannot be " of private interpretation;" that is, unless it come from the Spirit of God, which is that Spirit that moved upon the waters of the new creation, as well as of the old, and was promised to all, " to you, and to your children, and to as many as the Lord our God shall call," and is bestowed on all, and is the earnest of all our inheritance, and is " given to every man to profit withal;" it cannot prove God to be the author, nor be a light to us to walk by, or to show others the way to heaven.

This rule were alone sufficient to guide us all in the whole economy of our calling, if we were not weak and wilful, ignorant and abused: but the Holy Scripture hath suffered so many interpretations, and various sounds and seemings, and we are so prepossessed and predetermined to misconstruction by false apostles without, and prevailing passions within, that though it be in itself sufficient, yet it is not so for us; and we may say with the eunuch, " How can I understand, unless some man should guide me?" And, indeed, in St. Paul's epistles, " there are many things hard to be understood;" and, in many other places, we find that the well is deep; and unless there be some to help us to draw out the latent senses of it, our souls will not be filled with the waters of salvation. Therefore, that I may do you what assistances I can, and, if I cannot in this small portion of time, instruct you, yet that I may counsel you, and remind you of the best assistances that are to be had; if I cannot give you rules sufficient to expound all hard places, yet that I may show how you shall sufficiently teach your people, by the rare rules and precepts, recorded in places that are, or may be made, easy, I shall first give you some advices in general, and then descend to more particular rules and measures.

1. Because it is not to be expected, that every minister of the word of God should have all the gifts of the Spirit, and every one to abound in tongues, and in doctrines, and in interpretations; you may, therefore, make great use of the labours of those worthy persons, whom God hath made to be lights in the several generations of the world, that a hand may help a hand, and a father may teach a brother, and we all be taught of God: for there are many who have, by great skill, and great experience, taught as many good rules for the interpretation of Scripture; amongst which those that I shall principally recommend to you, are the books of St. Austin, "De Utilitate Credendi" and his 3 lib. " De Doctrinâ Christianâ;" the " Synopsis" of Athanasius; the " Proems" of Isidore; the " Prologues" of St. Jerome. I might well add the " Scholia" of Œcumenius; the " Catenæ" of the Greek fathers, and of later times, the ordinary and interlineary glosses; the excellent book of Hugo de S. Victore, " de eruditione didascalicâ;" "Ars interpretandi Scripturas," by Sixtus Senensis; Serarius's "Prolegomena;" Tena's "Introduction to the Scriptures;" together with Laurentius è Villa-Vincentio, Andreas Hyperius "de Ratione studii Philosophici," and the "Hypotyposes" of Martinus Cantapratensis: Arias Montanus's "Joseph," or "de Arcano Sermone," is of another nature, and more fit for preachers; and so is Sanctes Paguine's "Isagoge;" but Ambrosius Catharinus's book "duarum clavium ad sacram scripturam," is useful to many good purposes: but more particularly, and I think more usefully, are those seven rules of interpreting Scriptures, written by Tichonius, and first made famous by St. Austin's commendation of them, and inserted in tom. v. of the Biblioth. SS. pp.—Sebastian Perez wrote thirty-five rules for the interpretation of Scripture: Franciscus Ruiz drew from the ancient fathers two hundred and thirty-four rules: besides those many learned persons who have written vocabularies, tropologies, and expositions of words and phrases; such as are Flacius Illyricus, Junius, Jerome Lauretus, and many others, not infrequent in all public libraries. But I remember, that he that gives advice to a sick man in Ireland to cure his sickness, must tell him of medicaments that are "facilè parabilia," "easy to be had," and cheap to be bought, or else his counsel will not profit him; and even of these God hath made good provision for us; for, although many precious things are reserved for them that dig deep, and search wisely, yet there are medicinal plants, and corn and grass, things fit for food and physic, to be had in every field.

And so it is in the interpretation of Scripture; there are ways of doing it well and wisely, without the too laborious methods of weary learning, that even the meanest labourers in God's vineyard may have that which is fit to minister to him that needs. Therefore,

2. In all the interpretations of Scripture, the literal sense is to be presumed and chosen, unless there be evident cause to the contrary. The reasons are plain; because the literal sense is natural, and it is first, and it is most agreeable to some things, in their whole kind; not indeed to prophecies, nor to the teachings of the learned, nor those cryptic ways of institution by which the ancients did hide a light, and keep it in a dark lantern from the temeration of ruder handlings and popular preachers: but the literal sense is agreeable to laws, to the publication of commands, to the revelation of the Divine will, to the concerns of the vulgar, to the foundations of faith, and to all the notice of things, in which the idiot is as much concerned as the greatest clerks. From which proposition these three corollaries will properly follow; 1. That God hath plainly and literally described all his will, both in belief and practice, in which our essential duty, the duty of all men, is concerned. 2. That, in plain expressions we are to look for our duty, and not in the more secret places and darker corners of the Scripture. 3. That you may regularly, certainly, and easily do your duty to the people, if you read and literally expound the plain sayings, and easily expressed commandments, and promises, and threatenings of the gospel, and the Psalms, and the prophets.

3. But then remember this also; that not only the grammatical or prime signification of the word is the literal sense; but whatsoever is the prime intention of the speaker, that is the literal sense; though the word be to be taken metaphorically, or by translation signify more things than one. "The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous;" this is literally true; and yet it is as true, that God hath no eyes properly; but by "eyes" are meant, God's "providence;" and though this be not the first literal sense of the word "eyes," it is not that which was at first imposed and contingently; but it is that signification, which was secondarily imposed, and by reason and proportion. Thus, when we say, "God cares for the righteous," it will not suppose that God can have any anxiety or afflictive thoughts; but "he cares" does as truly and properly signify provision, as caution; beneficence, as fear; and therefore the literal sense of it is, that "God provides good things for the righteous." For in this case the rule of Abulensis is very true; "Sensus literalis semper est verus," "the literal sense is always true;" that is, all that is true, which the Spirit of God intended to signify by the words, whether he intended the first or second signification; whether that of voluntary and contingent, or that of analogical and rational institution. "Other sheep have I," said Christ, "which are not of this fold:" that he did not mean this of the "pecus lanigerum" is notorious; but of the gentiles to be gathered into the privileges and fold of Israel: for in many cases, the first literal sense is the hardest, and sometimes impossible, and sometimes inconvenient: and when it is any of these, although we are not to recede from the literal sense; yet we are to take the second signification, the tropological or figurative. "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out," said Christ: and yet no man digs his eyes out; because the very letter or intention of this command bids us only to throw away that, which if we keep, we cannot avoid sin: for sometimes the letter tells the intention, and sometimes the intention declares the letter; and that is properly the literal sense, which is the first meaning of the command in the whole complexion: and in this, common sense and a vulgar reason will be a sufficient guide, because there is always some other thing spoken by God, or some principle naturally implanted in us, by which we are secured in the understanding of the Divine command. "He that does not hate father and mother for my sake, is not worthy of me:" the literal sense of "hating" used in Scripture is not always "malice," but sometimes a "less loving;" and so Christ also hath expounded it: "He that loves father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me."—But I shall not insist longer on this; he that understands nothing but his grammar, and hath not conversed with men and books, and can see no farther than his fingers' ends, and makes no use of his reason, but for ever will be a child; he may be deceived in the literal sense of Scripture; but then he is not fit to teach others: but he that knows words signify rhetorically, as well as grammatically, and have various proper significations,[c] and which of these is the first, is not always of itself easy to be told; and remembers also that God hath given him reason, and observation, and experience, and conversation with wise men, and the proportion of things, and the end of the command, and parallel places of Scripture, in other words to the same purpose;—will conclude, that, since in plain places, all the duty of man is contained, and that the literal sense is always true, and, unless men be wilful or unfortunate, they may, with a small proportion of learning, find out the literal sense of an easy moral proposition:—will, I say, conclude, that if we be deceived, the fault is our own; but the fault is so great, the man so supine, the negligence so inexcusable, that the very consideration of human infirmity is not sufficient to excuse such teachers of others, who hallucinate or prevaricate in this. The Anthropomorphites fell foully in this matter, and supposed God to have a face, and arms, and passions, as we have; but they prevailed not: and Origen was, in one instance, greatly mistaken, and thinking there was no literal meaning but the prime signification of the word, understood the word εὐνουχίζειν, "to make an eunuch," to his own prejudice; but that passed not into a doctrine: but the church of Rome hath erred greatly in pertinacious adhering, not to the letter, but to the grammar; nor to that, but in one line or signification of it: and "Hoc est corpus meum" must signify nothing but grammatically; and though it be not, by their own confessions, to be understood without divers figures, in the whole complexion, yet peevishly and perversely, they will take it by the wrong handle; and this they have passed into a doctrine, that is against sense, and reason, and experience, and Scripture, and tradition, and the common interpretation of things, and public peace and utility, and every thing by which mankind ought to be governed and determined.

4. I am to add this one thing more: that we admit in the interpretation of Scripture but one literal sense; I say, but one prime literal sense; for the simplicity and purity of the Spirit, and the philanthropy of God, will not admit that there should, in one single proposition, be many intricate meanings, or that his sense should not certainly be understood, or that the people be abused by equivocal and doubtful senses; this was the way of Jupiter in the sands, and Apollo Pythius, and the devil's oracles: but be it far from the wisdom of the Spirit of God.

5. But then take in this caution to it; that although there be but one principal literal sense; yet others that are subordinate may be intended subordinately; and others that are true by proportion, or that first intention, may be true for many reasons, and every reason applicable to a special instance; and all these may be intended as they signify, that is, one only by prime design, and the other by collateral consequence. Thus when it is said, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee;" the Psalmist means it of the eternal generation of Christ: others seem to apply it to his birth of the blessed virgin Mary; and St. Paul expounds it of the resurrection of Christ:[d] This is all true: and yet but one literal sense primely meant; but by proportion to the first, the others have their place, and are meant by way of similitude. Thus we are the sons of God, by adoption, by creation, by favour, by participation of the Spirit, by the laver of regeneration; and every man, for one or other of these reasons, can say, "Our Father which art in heaven;" and these are all parts of the literal sense, not different, but subordinate and by participation: but more than one prime literal sense must not be admitted.

6. Lastly; Sometimes the literal sense is lost by a plain change of the words; which when it is discovered, it must be corrected by the fountain; and till it be, so long as it is pious, and commonly received, it may be used without scruple. In the 41st Psalm the Hebrews read, "My soul hath longed after 'the strong, the living God;' 'Deum fortem, vivum:'" in the vulgar Latin, it is "Deum fontem vivum," "the living fountain;" and it was very well, but not the literal sense of God's Spirit; but when they have been so often warned of it, that they were still in love with their own letter, and leave the words of the Spirit, I think was not justifiable at all: and this was observed at last by Sixtus and Clement, and corrected in their editions of the Bible, and then it came right again. The sum is this; he that with this moderation and these measures, construes the plain meaning of the Spirit of God, and expounds the articles of faith, and the precepts of life, according to the intention of God, signified by his own words, in their first or second signification, cannot easily be cozened into any heretical doctrine; but his doctrine will be ἀδιάφθορος, the pure word and mind of God.

2. There is another sense or interpretation of Scripture, and that is mystical or spiritual; which the Jews call מדרש "midrash;" which Elias the Levite calls "omne commentarium, quod non est juxta simplicem et literalem sensum;" "every gloss that is not according to their פשת 'peschat,' to the literal sense;" and this relates principally to the Old Testament: thus the waters of the deluge did signify the waters of baptism; Sarah and Agar, the law and the gospel; the brazen serpent, the passion of Christ; the conjunction of Adam and Eve, the communion of Christ and his church; and this is called the spiritual sense, St. Paul being our warrant; "Our fathers ate of the same spiritual meat, and drank of that same spiritual rock;" now that rock was not spiritual, but of solid stone; but it signified spiritually; for "that rock was Christ."

—This sense the doctors divide into tropological, allegorical, and anagogical,—for method's sake, and either to distinguish the things, or to amuse the persons; for these relate but to the several spiritual things signified by divers places; as matters of faith, precepts of manners, and celestial joys; you may make more if you please, and yet these are too many to trouble men's heads, and to make theology an art and craft, to no purpose. This spiritual sense is that which the Greeks call ὑπόνοιαν, or 'the sense that lies under the cover of words:" concerning this I shall give you these short rules, that your doctrine be ἀδιάφθορος, pure and without heretical mixtures, and the leaven of false doctrines; for, above all things, this is to be taken care of.

1. Although every place of Scripture hath a literal sense, either proper or figurative, yet every one hath not a spiritual and mystical interpretation; and, therefore, Origen was blamed by the ancients for forming all into spirit and mystery; one place was reserved to punish that folly. Thus the followers of the family of love, and the quakers, expound all the articles of our faith, all the hopes of a christian, all the stories of Christ, into such a clancular and retired sense, as if they had no meaning by the letter, but were only a hieroglyphic or a Pythagorean scheme, and not to be opened but by a private key, which every man pretends to be borrowed from the Spirit of God, though made in the forges here below; to which purposes the epistles of St. Jerome to Avitus, to Pammachius and Oceanus, are worth your reading. In this case men do as he said of Origen, "Ingenii sui acumina putant esse ecclesiæ sacramenta:" "every man believes God meant as he intended, and so he will obtrude his own dreams instead of sacraments." Therefore,

2. Whoever will draw spiritual senses from any history of the Old or New Testament, must first allow the literal sense, or else he will soon deny an article of necessary belief. A story is never the less true, because it is intended to profit as well as to please; and the narrative may well establish or insinuate a precept, and instruct with pleasure; but if, because there is a jewel in the golden cabinet, you will throw away the enclosure, and deny the story that you may look out a mystical sense, we shall leave it arbitrary for any man to believe or disbelieve what story he please; and Eve shall not be made of the rib of Adam, and the garden of Eden shall be no more than the Hesperides, and the story of Jonas a well-dressed fable; and I have seen all the Revelation of St. John turned into a moral commentary, in which every person can signify any proposition, or any virtue, according as his fancy chimes. This is too much, and, therefore, comes not from a good principle.

3. In moral precepts, in rules of polity and economy, there is no other sense to be inquired after but what they bear upon the face; for he that thinks it necessary to turn them into some further spiritual meaning, supposes that it is a disparagement to the Spirit of God to take care of governments, or that the duties of princes and masters are no great concerns, or not operative to eternal felicity, or that God does not provide for temporal advantages; for if these things be worthy concerns, and if God hath taken care of all our good, and if "godliness be profitable to all things, and hath the promise of the life that now is, and that which is to come," there is no necessity to pass on to more abstruse senses, when the literal and proper hath also in it instrumentality enough towards very great spiritual purposes. "God takes care" for servants, yea "for oxen" and all the beasts of the field; and the letter of the command enjoining us to use them with mercy, hath in it an advantage even upon the spirit and whole frame of a man's soul; and therefore let no man tear those Scriptures to other meanings beyond their own intentions and provisions. In these cases a spiritual sense is not to be inquired after.

4. If the letter of the story infers any indecency or contradiction, then it is necessary that a spiritual or mystical sense be thought of; but never else is it necessary. It may in other cases be useful, when it does advantage to holiness; and may be safely used, if used modestly; but because this spiritual or mystical interpretation, when it is not necessary, cannot be certainly proved, but relies upon fancy, or at most some light inducement, no such interpretation can be used as an argument to prove an article of faith, nor relied upon in matters of necessary concern. The "three measures of meal," in the gospel, are but an ill argument to prove the blessed and eternal Trinity: and it may be, the three angels that came to Abraham, will signify no more than the two that came to Lot, or the single one to Manoah or St. John. This divine mystery relies upon a more sure foundation; and he makes it unsure, that causes it to lean upon an unexpounded vision, that was sent to other purposes. "Non esse contensiosis et infidelibus sensibus ingerendum," said St. Austin of the book of Genesis. Searching for articles of faith in the by-paths and corners of secret places, leads not to faith but to infidelity, and by making the foundations unsure, causes the articles to be questioned.

I remember that Agricola, in his book "De Animalibus Subterraneis," tells of a certain kind of spirits that use to converse in mines, and trouble the poor labourers: they dig metals, they cleanse, they cast, they melt, they separate, they join the ore; but when they are gone, the men find just nothing done, not one step of their work set forward. So it is in the books and expositions of many men: they study, they argue, they expound, they confute, they reprove, they open secrets, and make new discoveries; and when you turn the bottom upwards, up starts nothing; no man is the wiser, no man is instructed, no truth discovered, no proposition cleared, nothing is altered, but that much labour and much time is lost: and this is manifest in nothing more than in books of controversy, and in mystical expositions of Scripture: "Quærunt quod nusquam est, inveniunt tamen." Like Isidore, who, in contemplation of a pen, observed, that the nib of it was divided into two, but yet the whole body remained one: "Credo propter mysterium:"[e] he found a knack in it, and thought it was a mystery. Concerning which I shall need to say no more but that they are safe when they are necessary, and they are useful when they teach better, and they are good when they do good; but this is so seldom, and so by chance, that oftentimes if a man be taught truth, he is taught it by a lying master; it is like being cured by a good witch, an evil spirit hath a hand in it; and if there be not error and illusion in such interpretations, there is very seldom any certainty.

"What shall I do to my vineyard, said God?"[f] "Auferam sepem ejus:" "I will take away the hedge:" that is, "custodiam angelorum," saith the gloss, "the custody of their angel guardians." And God says, "Manasseh humeros suos comedit:"[g] "Manasseh hath devoured his own shoulders;" that is, "gubernatores dimovit," say the doctors, "hath removed his governors," his princes, and his priests. It is a sad complaint, 'tis true, but what it means is the question. But although these senses are pious, and may be used for illustration and the prettiness of discourse, yet there is no further certainty in them than what the one fancies and the other is pleased to allow. But if the spiritual sense be proved evident and certain, then it is of the same efficacy as the literal; for it is according to that letter by which God's Holy Spirit was pleased to signify his meaning, and it matters not how he is pleased to speak, so we understand his meaning. And in this sense, that is true which is affirmed by St. Gregory: "Allegoriam interdum ædificare fidem:" "sometimes our faith is built up by the mystical words of the Spirit of God." But because it seldom happens that they can be proved, therefore you are not to feed your flocks with such herbs whose virtue you know not, of whose wholesomeness or powers of nourishing you are wholly, or for the most part, ignorant. We have seen and felt the mischief, and sometimes derided the absurdity. "God created the sun and the moon," said Moses; that is, said the extravagants of Pope Boniface VIII., "the pope and the emperor." And "Behold here are two swords," said St. Peter: "It is enough," said Christ; enough for St. Peter; and so he got the two swords, the temporal and spiritual, said the gloss upon that text. Of these things there is no beginning and no end, no certain principles and no good conclusions.

These are the two ways of expounding all Scriptures; these are as "the two witnesses of God;" by the first of which he does most commonly, and by the latter of which he does sometimes, declare his meaning; and in the discovery of these meanings, the measures which I have now given you are the general land-marks, and are sufficient to guide us from destructive errors. It follows in the next place, that I give you some rules that are more particular, according to my undertaking, that you in your duty, and your charges in the provisions to be made for them, may be more secure.

1. Although you are to teach your people nothing but what is the word of God, yet by this word I understand all that God spake expressly, and all that by certain consequence can be deduced from it. Thus Dionysius Alexandrinus argues, ἔγνων ὅτι υἱὸν καὶ λόγος οὐ ξένος ἂν εἴη τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ πατρός "He that in Scripture is called the Son and the Word of the Father, I conclude he is no stranger to the essence of the Father." And St. Ambrose derided them that called for express Scripture for ὁμοούσιος, since the prophets and the gospels acknowledge the unity of substance in the Father and the Son; and we easily conclude the Holy Ghost to be God, because we call upon him; and we call upon him because we believe in him; and we believe in him because we are baptized into the faith and profession of the Holy Ghost. This way of teaching our blessed Saviour used, when he confuted the Sadducees, in the question of the resurrection, and thus he confuted the Pharisees, in the question of his being the Son of God.[h] The use I make of it is this, that right reason is so far from being an exile from the inquiries of religion, that it is the great insurance of many propositions of faith; and we have seen the faith of men strangely alter, but the reason of man can never alter, every rational truth supposing its principles being eternal and unchangeable. All that is to be done here is to see that you argue well, that your deduction be evident, that your reason be right: for Scripture is to our understandings, as the grace of God to our wills; that instructs our reason, and this helps our wills; and we may as well choose the things of God without our wills, and delight in them without love, as understand the Scriptures or make use of them without reason.

Quest. But how shall our reason be guided that it may be right, that it be not a blind guide, but direct us to the place where the star appears, and point us to the very house where the babe lieth, that we may indeed do as the wise men did? To this I answer:

2. In the making deductions, the first great measure to direct our reason and our inquiries is the analogy of faith; that is, let the fundamentals of faith be your cynosura, your great light to walk by, and whatever you derive from thence, let it be agreeable to the principles from whence they come. It is the rule of St. Paul, Προφητεύων κατ' ἀναλογίαν πίστεως, "Let him that prophesies, do it according to the proportion of faith;"[i] that is, let him teach nothing but what is revealed, or agreeable to the αὐτόπιστα, "the prime credibilities" of christianity; that is, by the plain words of Scripture let him expound the less plain, and the superstructure by the measures of the foundation, and doctrines be answerable to faith, and speculations relating to practice, and nothing taught, as simply necessary to be believed, but what is evidently and plainly set down in the Holy Scriptures; for he that calls a proposition necessary, which the apostles did not declare to be so, or which they did not teach to all christians, learned and unlearned, he is gone beyond his proportions; for every thing is to be kept in that order where God hath placed it. There is a "classis" of necessary articles, and that is the apostles' creed, which Tertullian calls "regulam fidei," "the rule of faith;" and according to this we must teach necessities: but what comes after this is not so necessary; and he that puts upon his own doctrines a weight equal to this of the apostles' declaration, either must have an apostolical authority, and an apostolical infallibility, or else he transgresses the proportion of faith, and becomes a false apostle.

3. To this purpose it is necessary that you be very diligent in reading, laborious and assiduous in the studies of Scripture; not only lest ye be blind seers and blind guides, but because, without great skill and learning, ye cannot do your duty. A minister may as well sin by his ignorance as by his negligence; because when light springs from so many angles that may enlighten us, unless we look round about us and be skilled in all the angles of reflexion, we shall but turn our backs upon the sun, and see nothing but our own shadows. "Search the Scriptures," said Christ. "Non dixit legite, sed scrutamini," said St. Chrysostom; "quia oportet profundius effodere, ut quæ altè delitescunt, invenire possimus." "Christ did not say read, but search the Scriptures;" turn over every page, inquire narrowly, look diligently, converse with them perpetually, be mighty in the Scriptures; for that which is plain there, is the best measure of our faith and of our doctrines. The Jews have a saying, "Qui non advertit, quod supra et infra in Scriptoribus legitur, is pervertit verba Dei viventis." He that will understand God's meaning, must look above and below, and round about; for the meaning of the Spirit of God is not like the wind blowing from one point, but like light issuing from the body of the sun, it is light round about; and in every word of God there is a treasure, and something will be found somewhere, to answer every doubt, and to clear every obscurity, and to teach every truth by which God intends to perfect our understandings. But then take this rule with you: do not pass from plainness to obscurity, nor from simple principles draw crafty conclusions, nor from easiness pass into difficulty, nor from wise notices draw intricate nothings, nor from the wisdom of God lead your hearers into the follies of men. Your principles are easy, and your way plain, and the words of faith are open, and what naturally flows from thence will be as open; but if, without violence and distortion, it cannot be drawn forth, the proposition is not of the family of faith. "Qui nimis emungit, elicit sanguinem:" "he that wrings too hard, draws blood:" and nothing is fit to be offered to your charges and your flocks but what flows naturally, and comes easily, and descends readily and willingly, from the fountains of salvation.

4. Next to this analogy or proportion of faith, let the consent of the catholic church be your measure, so as by no means to prevaricate in any doctrine, in which all christians always have consented. This will appear to be a necessary rule by and by; but in the mean time, I shall observe to you, that it will be the safer, because it cannot go far: it can be instanced but in three things, in the creed, in ecclesiastical government, and in external forms of worship and liturgy. The catholic church hath been too much and too soon divided: it hath been used as the man upon a hill used his heap of heads in a basket; when he threw them down the hill, every head run his own way, "quot capita, tot sententiæ;" and as soon as the spirit of truth was opposed by the spirit of error, the spirit of peace was disordered by the spirit of division; and the Spirit of God hath overpowered us so far, that we are only fallen out about that, of which if we had been ignorant, we had not been much the worse; but in things simply necessary, God hath preserved us still unbroken: all nations and all ages recite the creed, and all pray the Lord's prayer, and all pretend to walk by the rule of the commandments; and all churches have ever kept the day of Christ's resurrection, or the Lord's day, holy; and all churches have been governed by bishops, and the rites of christianity have been for ever administered by separate orders of men, and those men have been always set apart by prayer and the imposition of the bishop's hands; and all christians have been baptized, and all baptized persons were, or ought to be, and were taught that they should be, confirmed by the bishop, and presidents of religion; and for ever there were public forms of prayer, more or less in all churches; and all christians that were to enter into holy wedlock, were ever joined or blessed by the bishop or the priest: in these things all christians ever have consented, and he that shall prophesy or expound Scripture to the prejudice of any of these things, hath no part in that article of his creed; he does not believe the holy catholic church, he hath no fellowship, no communion with the saints and servants of God.

It is not here intended, that the doctrine of the church should be the rule of faith distinctly from, much less against, the Scripture; for that were a contradiction to suppose the church of God, and yet speaking and acting against the will of God; but it means, that where the question is concerning an obscure place of Scripture, the practice of the catholic church is the best commentary. "Intellectus, qui cum praxi concurrit, est spiritus vivificans," said Cusanus. Then we speak according to the Spirit of God, when we understand Scripture in that sense in which the church of God hath always practised it. "Quod pluribus, quod sapientibus, quod omnibus videtur," that is Aristotle's rule; and it is a rule of nature; every thing puts on a degree of probability as it is witnessed "by wise men, by many wise men, by all wise men:" and it is Vincentius Lirinensis' great rule of truth; "Quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus:" and he that goes against "what is said always, and every where, and by all" christians, had need have a new revelation, or an infallible spirit; or he hath an intolerable pride and foolishness of presumption. Out of the communion of the universal church no man can be saved; they are the body of Christ; and the whole church cannot perish, and Christ cannot be a head without a body, and he will for ever be our Redeemer, and for ever intercede for his church, and be glorious in his saints; and, therefore, he that does not sow in these furrows, but leaves the way of the whole church, hath no pretence for his error, no excuse for his pride, and will find no alleviation of his punishment. These are the best measures which God hath given us to lead us in the way of truth, and to preserve us from false doctrines; and whatsoever cannot be proved by these measures, cannot be necessary. There are many truths besides these; but if your people may be safely ignorant of them, you may quietly let them alone, and not trouble their heads with what they have so little to do; things that need not to be known at all, need not to be taught: for if they be taught, they are not certain, or are not very useful; and, therefore, there may be danger in them besides the trouble; and since God hath not made them necessary, they may be let alone without danger; and it will be madness to tell stories to your flocks of things which may hinder salvation, but cannot do them profit. And now it is time that I have done with the first great remark of doctrine noted by the apostle in my text; all the guides of souls must take care that the doctrine they teach be ἀδιάφθορος, "pure and incorrupt," the word of God, the truth of the Spirit. That which remains is easier.

2. In the next place, it must be σεμνὸς, "grave," and reverend, no vain notions, no pitiful contentions, and disputes about little things, but becoming your great employment in the ministry of souls: and in this the rules are easy and ready.

1. Do not trouble your people with controversies: whatsoever does gender strife, the apostle commands us to avoid; and, therefore, much more the strife itself: a controversy is a stone in the mouth of the hearer, who should be fed with bread, and it is a temptation to the preacher, it is a state of temptation; it engages one side in lying, and both in uncertainty and uncharitableness; and after all, it is not food for souls; it is the food of contention, it is a spiritual lawsuit, and it can never be ended; every man is right and every man is wrong in these things, and no man can tell who is right, or who is wrong. For as long as a word can be spoken against a word, and a thing be opposite to a thing; as long as places are hard, and men are ignorant, or "knowing but in part;" as long as there is money and pride in the world, and for ever till men willingly confess themselves to be fools and deceived, so long will the saw of contention be drawn from side to side. "That which is not, cannot be numbered," saith the wise man: no man can reckon upon any truth that is got by contentious learning; and whoever troubles his people with questions, and teaches them to be troublesome, note that man, he loves not peace, or he would fain be called "Rabbi, Rabbi." Christian religion loves not tricks nor artifices of wonder; but like the natural and amiable simplicity of Jesus, by plain and easy propositions, leads us in wise paths to a place, where sin and strife shall never enter. What good can come from that which fools begin, and wise men can never end but by silence? and that had been the best way at first, and would have stifled them in the cradle. What have your people to do whether Christ's body be in the sacrament by consubstantiation or transubstantiation; whether purgatory be in the centre of the earth, or in the air, or any where, or no where; and who but a madman would trouble their heads with the entangled links of the fanatic chain of predestination? Teach them to fear God and honour the king, to keep the commandments of God, and the king's commands, because of the oath of God; learn them to be sober and temperate, to be just and to pay their debts, to speak well of their neighbours and to think meanly of themselves; teach them charity, and learn them to be zealous of good works. Is it not a shame, that the people should be filled with sermons against ceremonies, and declamations against a surplice, and tedious harangues against the poor airy sign of the cross in baptism? These things teach them to be ignorant; it fills them with wind, and they suck dry nurses; it makes them lazy and useless, troublesome and good for nothing. Can the definition of a christian be, that a christian is a man that rails against bishops and the common prayer-book? and yet this is the great labour of our neighbours that are crept in among us; this they call the work of the Lord, and this is the great matter of the desired reformation; in these things they spend their long breath, and about these things they spend earnest prayers, and by these they judge their brother, and for these they revile their superior, and in this doughty cause they think it fit to fight and die. If St. Paul or St. Anthony, St. Basil or St. Ambrose, if any of the primitive confessors, or glorious martyrs, should awake from within their curtains of darkness, and find men thus striving against government, for the interest of disobedience, and labouring for nothings, and preaching all day for shadows and moonshine; and that not a word shall come from them, to teach the people humility, not a word of obedience or self-denial; they are never taught to suspect their own judgment, but always to prefer the private minister before the public, the presbyter before a bishop, fancy before law, the subject before his prince, a prayer in which men consider not at all, before that which is weighed wisely and considered; and, in short, a private spirit before the public, and Mass John before the patriarch of Jerusalem: if, I say, St. Paul or St. Anthony should see such a light, they would not know the meaning of it, nor of what religion the country were, nor from whence they had derived their new nothing of an institution. "The kingdom of God consists in wisdom and righteousness, in peace and holiness, in meekness and gentleness, in chastity and purity, in abstinence from evil and doing good to others;" in these things place your labours, preach these things, and nothing else but such as these; things which promote the public peace and public good; things that can give no offence to the wise and to the virtuous: for these things are profitable to men and pleasing to God.

2. Let not your sermons and discourses to your people be busy arguings about hard places of Scripture; if you strike a hard against a hard, you may chance to strike fire, or break a man's head; but it never makes a good building: "Philosophiam ad syllabas vocare," that is to no purpose; your sermons must be for edification, something to make the people better and wiser, "wiser unto salvation," not wiser to discourse; for, if a hard thing get into their heads, I know not what work you will make of it, but they will make nothing of it, or something that is very strange: dress your people unto the imagery of Christ, dress them for their funerals, help them to make their accounts up against the day of judgment. I have known some persons and some families that would religiously educate their children, and bring them up in the Scriptures from their cradle; and they would teach them to tell who was the first man, and who was the oldest, and who was the wisest, and who was the strongest; but I never observed them to ask who was the best, and what things were required to make a man good:[k] the apostles' creed was not the entertainment of their pretty talkings, nor the life of Christ; the story of his bitter passion, and his incomparable sermon on the mount, went not into their catechisms. What good can your flocks receive, if you discourse well and wisely, whether Jephthah sacrificed his daughter, or put her into the retirements of a solitary life; nor how David's numbering the people did differ from Joshua's; or whether God took away the life of Moses by an apoplexy, or by the kisses of his mouth? If scholars be idly busy in these things in the schools, custom, and some other little accidents may help to excuse them; but the time that is spent in your churches, and conversation with your people, must not be so thrown away: λόγος ἔστω σεμνὸς, that is your rule; "let your speech be grave" and wise, and useful, and holy, and intelligible; something to reform their manners, to correct their evil natures, to amend their foolish customs; "to build them up in a most holy faith." That is the second rule and measure of your preachings that the apostle gives you in my text.

3. Your speech must be ὑγιὴς, "salutary" and wholesome: and, indeed, this is of greatest concern, next to the first, next to the truth and purity of that doctrine; for unless the doctrine be made fit for the necessities of your people, and not only be good in itself but good for them, you lose the end of your labours, and they the end of your preachings: "Your preaching is vain, and their faith is also vain." The particulars of this are not many, but very useful.

1. It is never out of season to preach good works; but when you do, be careful that you never indirectly disgrace them by telling how your adversaries spoil them. I do not speak this in vain; for too many of us account good works to be popery, and so not only dishonour our religion, and open wide the mouths of adversaries, but disparage christianity itself, while we hear it preached in every pulpit, that they who preach good works think they merit heaven by it; and so for fear of merit, men let the work alone; to secure a true opinion they neglect a good practice, and out of hatred of popery we lay aside christianity itself. Teach them how to do good works, and yet to walk humbly with God; for better it is to dwell even upon a weak account, than to do nothing upon the stock of a better proposition: and let it never be used any more as a word of reproach unto us all, that the faith of a protestant, and the works of a papist, and the words of a fanatic, make up a good christian. Believe well, and speak well, and do well; but in doing good works a man cannot deceive any one but himself, by the appendage of a foolish opinion; but in our believing only, and in talking, a man may deceive himself, and all the world; and God only can be safe from the cozenage. Like to this is the case of external forms of worship, which too many refuse, because they pretend that many who use them, rest in them, and pass no further: for besides that no sect of men teaches their people so to do, you cannot without uncharitableness suppose it true of very many. But if others do ill, do not you do so too; and leave not out the external forms of fear of formality, but join the inward power of godliness; and then they are reproved best, and instructed wisely, and you are secured. But remember, that profaneness is commonly something that is external; and he is a profane person who neglects the exterior part of religion: and this is so vile a crime, that hypocrisy, while it is undiscovered, is not so much mischievous as open profaneness, or a neglect and contempt of external religion. Do not despise external religion, because it may be sincere, and do not rely upon it wholly, because it may be counterfeit; but do you preach both, and practise both; both what may glorify God in public, and what may please him in private.

2. In deciding the questions and cases of conscience of your flocks, never strive to speak what is pleasing, but what is profitable, οὐ λόγους, ἀλλὰ πραγμάτων φθέγγεσθαι οὐσίας, as was said of Isidore, the philosopher; "You must not give your people words, but things and substantial food." Let not the people be prejudiced in the matter of their souls, upon any terms whatsoever, and be not ashamed to speak boldly in the cause of God; for he that is angry when he is reproved, is not to be considered, excepting only to be reproved again; if he will never mend, not you but he will have the worst of it; but if he ever mends, he will thank you for your love, and for your wisdom, and for your care: and no man is finally disgraced for speaking of a truth; only here, pray for the grace of prudence, that you may speak opportunely and wisely, lest you profit not, but destroy an incapable subject.

Lastly: The apostle requires of every minister of the gospel that his speech and doctrine should be ἀκατάγνωστος, "unreprovable:" not such against which no man can cavil; for the Pharisees found fault with the wise discourses of the eternal Son of God; and heretics and schismatics prated against the holy apostles and their excellent sermons; but ἀκατάγνωστος is "such as deserves no blame," and needs no pardon, and flatters not for praise, and begs no excuses, and makes no apologies; a discourse that will be justified by all the sons of wisdom: now that yours may be so, the preceding rules are the best means that are imaginable. For, so long as you speak the pure truths of God, the plain meaning of the Spirit, the necessary things of faith, the useful things of charity, and the excellencies of holiness, who can reprove your doctrine? But there is something more in this word which the apostle means, else it had been a useless repetition: and a man may speak the truths of God, and yet may be blame-worthy by an importune, unseasonable, and imprudent way of delivering them, or for want of such conduct, which will place him and his doctrine in reputation and advantages. To this purpose these advices may be useful.

1. Be more careful to establish a truth than to reprove an error. For besides that a truth will, when it is established, of itself reprove the error sufficiently; men will be less apt to reprove your truth, when they are not engaged to defend their own propositions against you. Men stand upon their guard when you proclaim war against their doctrine. Teach your doctrine purely and wisely, and without any angry reflections; for you shall very hardly persuade him whom you go about publicly to confute.

2. If any man have a revelation or a discovery, of which thou knowest nothing but by his preaching, be not too quick to condemn it; not only lest thou discourage his labour and stricter inquiries in the search of truth, but lest thou also be a fool upon record; for so is every man that hastily judges what he slowly understands. Is it not a monument of a lasting reproach, that one of the popes of Rome condemned the bishop of Sulzbach, for saying that there were antipodes? And is not Pope Nicholas deserted by his own party, for correcting the sermons of Berengarius, and making him recant into a worse error? and posterity will certainly make themselves very merry with the wise sentences made lately at Rome, against Galileo and the Jansenists. To condemn one truth is more shameful than to broach two errors: for he that, in an honest and diligent inquiry, misses something of the mark, will have the apologies of human infirmity, and the praise of doing his best; but he that condemns a truth, when it is told him, is an envious fool, and is a murderer of his brother's fame and his brother's reason.

3. Let no man, upon his own head, reprove the religion that is established by law, and a just supreme authority; for no reproofs are so severe as the reproofs of law; and a man will very hardly defend his opinion, that is already condemned by the wisdom of all his judges. A man's doctrine possibly may be true though against law; but it cannot be ἀκατάγνωστος, "unreprovable;" and a schismatic can, in no case, observe this rule of the apostle. If something may be amiss when it is declared by laws, much easier may he be in an error, who goes upon his own account, and declares alone: and, therefore, it is better to let things alone, than to be troublesome to our superiors by an impertinent wrangling for reformation. We find that some kings of Judah were greatly praised, and yet they did not destroy all the temples of the false gods which Solomon had built: and if such public persons might let some things alone that were amiss, and yet be innocent, trouble not yourself that all the world is not amended according to your pattern; see that you be perfect at home, that all be rightly reformed there; as for reformation of the church, God will never call you to an account. Some things cannot be reformed, and very many need not, for all thy peevish dreams; and after all, it is twenty to one but thou art mistaken, and thy superior is in the right; and if thou wert not proud thou wouldst think so too. Certain it is, he that sows in the furrows of authority, his doctrine cannot so easily be reproved as he that ploughs and sows alone. When Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, fell into the hands of the Egyptian monks, who were ignorant and confident, they handled him with great rudeness, because he had spoken of the immateriality of the Divine nature; the good man, to escape their fury, was forced to give them crafty and soft words, saying, "Vidi faciem vestram ut faciem Dei:" which because they understood in the sense of the anthropomorphites, and thought he did so too, they let him depart in peace. When private persons are rude against the doctrines of authority, they are seldom in the right; but, therefore, are the more fierce, as wanting the natural supports of truth, which are reason and authority, gentleness and plain conviction; and, therefore, they fall to declamation and railing, zeal and cruelty, trifling and arrogant confidences. They seldom go asunder: it is the same word in Greek that signifies, "disobedience," and "cruelty:" ἀπηνὴς is both; "He that will endure no bridle," "that man hath no mercy." Αὐθάδεια, ἀπήνεια ὁμιλίας ἐν λόγοις. Confidence is that which will endure no bridle, no curb, no superior. It is worse in the Hebrew; "The sons of Belial," signify "people that will endure no yoke, no government, no imposition;" and we have found them so, they are sons of Belial indeed. This is that αὐθάδεια, that kind of boldness and refractory confidence, that St. Paul forbids to be in a minister of religion;[1] μὴ αὐθάδη, "not confident;" that is, let him be humble and modest, distrusting his own judgment, believing wiser men than himself; never bold against authority, never relying on his own wit. Αὐθάδης ἐστὶν αὐτοάδης, said Aristotle; "that man is bold and presumptuous, who pleases himself," and sings his own songs, all voluntary, nothing by his book.

> Οὐδ' ἀστὸν ἥνες', ὅστις αὐθάδης γεγὼς,
> Πικρὸς πολίταις ἐστὶν ἀμαθίας ὕπο, said the tragedy.
> EURIP.

Every confident man is ignorant, and by his ignorance, troublesome to his country, but will never do it honour.

4. Whatever scriptures you pretend for your doctrine, take heed that it be not chargeable with foul consequences; that it lay no burden upon God, that it do not tempt to vanity, that it be not manifestly serving a temporal end, and nothing else; that it be not vehemently to be suspected to be a design of state, like the sermon at Paul's Cross, by Dr. Shaw, in Richard the Third's time; that it do not give countenance and confidence to a wicked life; for then your doctrine is reprovable for the appendage, and the intrinsic truth or falsehood will not so much be inquired after, as the visible and external objection: if men can reprove it in the outside, they will inquire no further. But, above all things, nothing so much will reproach your doctrine, as if you preach it in a railing dialect; we have had too much of that within these last thirty years. Optatus observes it was the trick of the Donatists, "Nullus vestrûm est, qui non convitia nostra suis tractatibus misceat:" "There is none of you but with his own writings mingles our reproaches;"[m] you begin to read chapters, and you expound them to our injuries; you comment upon the gospel, and revile your brethren that are absent; you imprint hatred and enmity in your people's hearts, and you teach them war when you pretend to make them saints. They that do so, their doctrine is not ἀκατάγνωστος; that is the least which can be said. If you will not have your doctrine reprehensible, do nothing with offence; and above all offences avoid the doing or saying those things, that give offence to the king and to the laws, to the voice of christendom and the public customs of the church of God. Frame your life and preachings to the canons of the church, to the doctrines of antiquity, to the sense of the ancient and holy fathers. For it is otherwise in theology than it is in other learnings. The experiments of philosophy are rude at first, and the observations weak, and the principles unproved; and he that made the first lock, was not so good a workman as we have now-a-days: but in christian religion, they that were first were best, because God, and not man, was the teacher; and ever since that, we have been unlearning the wise notices of pure religion, and mingling them with human notices and human interest. "Quod primum, hoc verum:" and although concerning antiquity, I may say as he in the tragedy;[n]

Συσσωφρονεῖν σοι βούλομ', ἀλλ' οὐ συννοσεῖν,

I would have you be wise with them, and under them, and follow their faith, but not their errors; yet this can never be of use to us, till antiquity be convicted of an error, by an authority great as her own, or a reason greater, and declared by an authorized master of sentences. But, however, be very tender in reproving a doctrine for which good men and holy have suffered martyrdom, and of which they have made public confession; for nothing reproves a doctrine so much as to venture it abroad with so much scandal and objection: and what reason can any schismatic have against the common prayer-book, able to weigh against that argument of blood, which for the testimony of it was shed by the Queen Mary martyrs? I instance the advice in this particular, but it is true in all things else of the like nature. It was no ill advice, whoever gave it, to the favourite of a prince; "Never make yourself a professed enemy to the church; for their interest is so complicated with the public, and their calling is so dear to God, that one way or other, one time or other, God and man will be their defender."—The same I say concerning authority and antiquity; never do any thing, never say or profess any thing against it: for besides that if you follow their measures, you will be secured in your faith, and in your main duty; even in smaller things they will be sure to carry the cause against you, and no man is able to bear the reproach of singularity. It was in honour spoken of St. Malachias, my predecessor in the see of Down, in his life written by St. Bernard; "Apostolicas sanctiones et decreta Ss. pp. in cunctis ecclesiis statuebat." I hope to do something of this for your help and service, if God gives me life, and health, and opportunity: but for the present, I have done. These rules if you observe, your doctrine will be ἀκατάγνωστος, "it will need no pardon;" and ἀνέγκλητος, "never to be reproved in judgment." I conclude all with the wise saying of Bensirach: "Extol not thyself in the counsel of thine own heart, that thy soul be not torn in pieces as a bull straying alone."[o]

PREACHED AT

THE FUNERAL OF THAT WORTHY KNIGHT

SIR GEORGE DALSTON, OF DALSTON IN CUMBERLAND.

Sept. 28, 1657.

If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.—1 Cor. xv. 19.

When God, in his infinite and eternal wisdom, had decreed to give to man a life of labour, and a body of mortality; a state of contingency, and a composition of fighting elements; and having designed to be glorified by a free obedience, would also permit sin in the world, and suffer evil men to go on in their wickedness, to prevail in their impious machinations, to vex the souls and grieve the bodies of the righteous, he knew that this would not only be very hard to be suffered by his servants, but also be very difficult to be understood by them who know God to be a "Lawgiver" as well as a "Lord;" a "Judge" as well as a "King;" a "Father" as well as a "Ruler;" and that, in order to his own glory, and for the manifestation of his goodness, he had promised to reward his servants, to give good to them that did good: therefore, to take off all prejudices, and evil resentments, and temptations, which might trouble those good men who suffered evil things,—he was pleased to do two great things which might confirm the faith, and endear the services, and entertain the hopes of them who are indeed his servants, but yet were very ill used in the accidents of this world.

1. The one was, that he sent his Son into the world to take upon him our nature; and him, being the "Captain of our salvation, he would perfect through sufferings;" that no man might think it much to suffer, when God spared not his own Son; and every man might submit to the necessity, when the Christ of God was not exempt; and yet that no man should fear the event which was to follow such sad beginnings, when "it behoved even Christ to suffer, and so to enter into glory."

2. The other great thing was, that God did not only by revelation, and the sermons of the prophets to his church, but even to all mankind competently teach, and effectively persuade, that the soul of man does not die; but that although things were ill here, yet they should be well hereafter; that the evils of this life were short and tolerable, and that to the good, who usually feel most of them, they should end in honour and advantages. And, therefore, Cicero had reason on his side to conclude, that there is to be a time and place after this life, wherein the wicked shall be punished, and the virtuous well rewarded, when he considered that Orpheus and Socrates, Palamedes and Thraseas, Lucretia and Papinian, were either slain or oppressed to death by evil men. But to us christians, εἰ μὴ ἐπαχθές ἐστιν εἰπεῖν, πάνυ ἱκανῶς, ἀποδέδεῖχθαι, as Plato's[a] expression is; we have a necessity to declare, and a demonstration to prove it, when we read that Abel died by the hands of Cain, who was so ignorant, that though he had malice and strength, yet he had scarce art enough to kill him; when we read that John the Baptist, Christ himself, and his apostles, and his whole army of martyrs, died under the violence of evil men; when virtue made good men poor, and free speaking of brave truths made the wise to lose their liberty; when an excellent life hastened an opprobrious death, and the obeying God destroyed ourselves; it was but time to look about for another state of things, where justice should rule, and virtue find her own portion: where the men that were like to God in mercy and justice, should also partake of his felicity; and, therefore, men cast out every line, and turned every stone, and tried every argument, and sometimes proved it well; and when they did not, yet they believed strongly; and they were sure of the thing, even when they were not sure of the argument.

Thus, therefore, would the old priests of the capitol, and the ministers of Apollo, and the mystic persons at their oracles believe, when they made apotheoses of virtuous and braver persons, ascribing every braver man into the number of their gods;

[a] Phæd. c. 37.

Hercules and Romulus, Castor and Pollux, Liber Pater,[b] him that taught the use of vines, and her that taught them the use of corn. For they knew that it must needs be, that they who like to God do excellent things, must like to God have an excellent portion.

This learning they also had from Pherecydes the Syrian, from Pythagoras of Samos, and from Zamolxis the Gete, from the neighbours of Euphrates, and the inhabitants by Ister, who were called ἀθανατίζοντες, "Immortalists;" because, in the midst of all their dark notices of things, they saw this clearly, ὅτι ἀγαθὰ ποιοῦντες οὐκ ἀποθανοῦνται, ἀλλὰ ἥξουσι ἐς χῶρον τοῦτον, ἵνα ἔχωσι τὰ πάντα ἀγαθά; "that virtuous and good men do not die, but their souls do go into blessed regions, where they shall enjoy all good things;" and it was never known that ever any good man was of another opinion. Hercules and Themistocles, Epaminondas and Cicero, Socrates and Cimon, Ennius and Phidias, all the flower of mankind have preached this truth. Κυρίοτερα τὰ τῶν θείων ἀνδρῶν μαντεύματα, ἢ τὰ τῶν μὴ· οἱ δὲ ἐπιεικέστατοι πάντα ποιοῦσιν, ὁπῶς ἂν ἐς τὸν ἔπειτα χρόνον εὖ ἀκούωσιν. "The discoursings and prophesyings of divine men are much more proper and excellent than of others, because they do equal and good things, until the time comes that they shall hear well for them:" τεκμήριον δὲ ποιοῦμαι, ὅτι ἐστί τις αἴσθησις τεθνεῶσ τῶν ἐνθάδε· αἱ δὲ βέλτισται ψυχαὶ μαντεύονται ταῦτα οὕτως ἔχειν· αἱ δὲ μοχθηρόταται οὐ φασίν. "And this is the sign, that when we die we have life and discerning; because though the wicked care not for believing it, yet all the prophets and the poets, the wise and the brave heroes say so;" they are the words of Plato. For though that which is compounded of elements, returns to its material and corruptible principles, yet the soul, which is a particle of the Divine breath, returns to its own Divine original, where there is no death or dissolution; and because the understanding is neither hot nor cold, it hath no moisture in it, and no dryness, it follows that it hath nothing of those substances, concerning which alone we know that they are corruptible. There is nothing corruptible that we know of, but the four elements, and their sons and daughters; nothing dies that can discourse, that can reflect in perfect circles upon their own imperfect actions; nothing can die that can see God, and converse with spirits, that can govern by laws and wise propositions. For fire and water can be tyrannical, but not govern; they can bear every thing down that stands before them, and rush like the people; but not rule like judges, and therefore they perish as tumults are dissolved. Λείπεται δὲ τὸν νοῦν μόνον θύραθεν ἐπεισιέναι, καὶ θεῖον εἶναι μόνον· οὐδὲ γὰρ αὐτοῦ τῇ ἐνεργείᾳ κοινωνεῖ σωματικὴ ἐνέργεια· says Aristotle:[c] "But the soul only comes from abroad, from a Divine principle; (for so saith the scripture, —'God breathed into Adam the spirit of life;') and that which in operation does not communicate with the body," shall have no part in its corruption.

Thus far they were right; but when they descended to particulars, they fell into error. That the rewards of virtue were to be hereafter, that they were sure of; that the soul was to survive the calamities of this world, and the death of the body, that they were sure of; and upon this account they did bravely and virtuously: and yet they that thought best amongst them, believed that the souls departed should be reinvested with other bodies, according to the dispositions and capacities of this life.

Thus Orpheus, who sang well, should transmigrate into a swan; and the soul of Thamyris, who had as good a voice as he, should wander till it were confined to the body of a nightingale; Ajax to a lion, Agamemnon to an eagle, tyrant princes into wolves and hawks, the lascivious into asses and goats, the drunkards into swine, the crafty statesmen into bees and pismires, and Thersites to an ape. This fancy of theirs prevailed much amongst the common people, and the uninstructed amongst the Jews: for when Christ appeared so glorious in miracle, Herod presently fancied him to be the soul of John the Baptist in another body; and the common people said he was Elias, or Jeremias, or one of the old prophets. And true it is, that although God was pleased, in all times, to communicate to mankind notices of the other world, sufficient to encourage virtues, and to contest against the rencounters of the world,—yet he was ever sparing in telling the secrets of it; and when St. Paul had his rapture into heaven, he saw fine things, and heard strange words, but they were ἄῤῥητα ῥήματα, "words that he could not speak," and secrets that he could not understand, and secrets that he could not communicate. For as a man staring upon the broad eye of the sun at his noon of solstice, feels his heat, and dwells in light, and loses the sight of his eyes, and perceives nothing distinctly; but the organ is confounded, and the faculty amazed with too big a beauty: so was St. Paul in his ecstasy; he saw that he could see nothing to be told below, and he perceived the glories were too big for flesh and blood, and that the beauties of separate souls were not to be understood by the soul in conjunction; and, therefore, after all the fine things that he saw, we only know what we knew before, viz. that the soul can live when the body is dead; that it can subsist without the body; that there are very great glories reserved for them that serve God; that they who die in Christ, shall live with him; that the body is a prison, and the soul is in fetters, while we are alive; and that when the body dies, the soul springs and leaps from her prison, and enters into the first liberty of the sons of God. Now much of this did rely upon the same argument, upon which the wise gentiles of old concluded the immortality of the soul; even because we are here very miserable and very poor: we are sick, and we are afflicted; we do well, and we are disgraced; we speak well, and we are derided; we tell truths, and few believe us; but the proud are exalted, and the wicked are delivered, and evil men reign over us, and the covetous snatch our little bundles of money from us, and the "fiscus" gathers our rents; and every where the wisest and the best men are oppressed; but, therefore, because it is thus, and thus it is not well, we hope for some great good thing hereafter. "For if, in this life only, we had hope," —then we christians, all we to whom persecution is allotted for our portion, we who must be patient under the cross, and receive injuries, and say nothing but prayers,—"we certainly were of all men the most miserable."

Well then: in this life we see plainly that our portion is not; here we have hopes; but not here only, we shall go into another place, where we shall have more hopes: our faith shall have more evidence, it shall be of things seen afar off; and our hopes shall be of more certainty and perspicuity, and next to possession; we shall have very much good, and be very sure of much more. Here then are three propositions to be considered.

1. The servants of God in this world are very miserable, were it not for their hopes of what is to come hereafter.

2. Though this be a place of hopes, yet we have not our hopes only here. "If in this life only we had hopes," saith the apostle; meaning, that in another life also we have hopes; not only metonymically, taking hopes for the thing we hope for; but properly, and for the acts, objects, and causes of hope. In this state of separation the godly shall have the vast joys of a certain intuitive hope, according to their several proportions and capacities.

3. The consummation and perfection of their felicity, when all their miseries shall be changed into glories, is in the world to come, after the resurrection of the dead; which is the main thing which St. Paul here intends.

1. The servants of God in this life are calamitous and afflicted; they must live under the cross. "He that will be my disciple, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me," said our glorious Lord and Master. And we see this prophetic precept, (for it is both a prophecy and a commandment, and, therefore, shall be obeyed whether we will or no,) but I say, we see it verified by the experience of every day. For here the violent oppress the meek; and they that are charitable, shall receive injuries. The apostles who preached Christ crucified, were themselves persecuted, and put to violent deaths; and christianity itself, for three hundred years, was the public hatred; and yet then it was that men loved God best, and suffered more for him; then they did most good, and least of evil. In this world, men thrive by villany; and lying and deceiving is accounted just; and to be rich is to be wise; and tyranny is honourable; and though little thefts, and petty mischiefs, are interrupted by the laws; yet if a mischief become public and great, acted by princes, and effected by armies, and robberies be done by whole fleets, it is virtue, and it is glory: it fills the mouths of fools that wonder, and employs the pens of witty men that eat the bread of flattery. How many thousand bottles of tears, and how many millions of sighs does God every day record, while the oppressed and the poor pray unto him, worship him, speak great things of his holy name, study to please him, beg for helps that they may become gracious in his eyes, and are so, and yet never sing in all their life, but when they sing God's praises out of duty, with a sad heart and a hopeful spirit, living only upon the future, weary of to-day, and sustained only by the hope of to-morrow's event! and after all, their eyes are dim with weeping and looking upon distances, as knowing they shall never be happy till the "new heavens and the new earth" appear.

But I need not instance in the "miserabili," in them that dwell in dungeons, and lay their head in places of trouble and disease: take those servants of God who have greatest plenty, who are encircled with blessings, whom this world calls prosperous, and see if they have not fightings within, and crosses without, contradiction of accidents, and perpetuity of temptations, the devil assaulting them, and their own weakness betraying them; fears encompassing them round about, lest they lose the favour of God, and shame sitting heavily upon them, when they remember how often they talk foolishly, and lose their duty, and dishonour their greatest relations, and walk unworthy of those glories which they would fain obtain; and all this is besides the unavoidable accidents of mortality, sickly bodies, troublesome times, changes of government, loss of interests, unquiet and peevish accidents round about them: so that when they consider to what they are primarily obliged; that they must in some instances deny their appetite, in others they must quit their relations, in all they must deny themselves, when their natural or secular danger tempts to sin and danger; and that for the support of their wills, and the strengthening their resolutions, against the arguments and solicitation of passions, they have nothing but the promises of another world; they will easily see that all the splendour of their condition, which fools admire, and wise men use temperately, and handle with caution, as they try the edge of a razor, is so far from making them recompence for the sufferings of this world, that the reserves and expectations of the next is, that conjugation of aids, by which only they can well and wisely bear the calamities of their present plenty.

But if we look round about us, and see how many righteous causes are oppressed, how many good men are reproached, how religion is persecuted, upon what strange principles the greatest princes of the world transact their greatest affairs, how easily they make wars, and how suddenly they break leagues; and at what expense, and vast pensions, they corrupt each other's officers; and how the greatest part of mankind watches to devour one another: and they that are devoured are commonly the best, the poor and the harmless, the gentle and uncrafty, the simple and religious; and then how many ways all good men are exposed to danger; and that our scene of duty lies as much in passive graces as in active; it must be confessed that this is a place of wasps and insects, of vipers and dragons, of tigers and bears; but the sheep are eaten by men, or devoured by wolves and foxes, or die of the rot; and when they do not, yet every year they redeem their lives by giving their fleece and their milk, and must die, when their death will pay the charges of the knife.

Now, from this, I say, it was that the very heathen, Plutarch and Cicero, Pythagoras and Hierocles, Plato, and many others, did argue and conclude, that there must be a day of recompences to come hereafter, which would set all right again: and from hence also our blessed Saviour himself did convince the Sadducees in their fond and pertinacious denying of the resurrection: for that is the meaning of that argument, which our blessed Lord did choose as being clearly and infallibly the aptest of any in the Old Testament, to prove the resurrection; and though the deduction is not at first so plain and evident, yet upon nearer intuition, the interpretation is easy, and the argument excellent and proper.

For it is observed by the learned among the Jews, that when God is by way of particular relation, and especial benediction, appropriated to any one, it is intended that God is to him "a rewarder and benefactor," Θεὸς εὐεργέτης, Θεὸς μισθαποδότης; for that is the first thing and the last, that every man believes and feels of God; and, therefore, St. Paul sums up the gentiles' creed in this compendium: "He that cometh to God, must believe that God is; and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him."[c] And as it is in the indefinite expression, so it is in the limited; as it is in the absolute, so also in the relative. God is the rewarder; and to be their God, is to be their rewarder, to be their benefactor, and their gracious Lord. "Ego ero Deus vester,"—"I will be your God;" that is, "I will do good," says Aben Esra: and Philo; τὸ δὲ Θεὸς αἰώνιος ἴσον ἐστὶ τῷ, ὁ χαριζόμενος, οὐ τότε μὲν, πότε δὲ οὐ, ἀεὶ δὲ, καὶ συνεχῶς. "The everlasting God, that is, as if he had said, one that will do you good; not sometimes some, and sometimes none at all, but frequently, and for ever:" and this we find also observed by St. Paul: "Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God;"[d] and that by which the relative appellative is verified, is the consequent benefit; He is "called their God; for he hath provided for them a city."

Upon this account, the argument of our blessed Saviour is this: "God is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob;" that is, the gracious God, the benefactor, the rewarder; and, therefore, Abraham is not dead, but is fallen asleep, and he shall be restored in the resurrection to receive those blessings and rewards, by the title of which, God was called the "God of Abraham." For in this world Abraham had not that harvest of blessings, which is consigned by that glorious appellative; he was an exile from his country; he stood far off from the possession of his hopes; he lived in ambulatory life; he spent most of his days without an heir; he had a constant piety; and at the latter end of his life, one great blessing was given him; and because that was allayed by the anger of his wife, and the expulsion of his handmaid, and the ejection of Ishmael, and the danger of the lad; and his great calamity about the matter of Isaac's sacrifice; and all his faith, and patience, and piety, was rewarded with nothing but promises of things a great way off; and before the possession of them, he went out of this world: it is undeniably certain that God, who, after the departure of the patriarchs, did still love to be called "their God," did intend to signify that they should be restored to a state of life, and a capacity of those greatest blessings, which were the foundation of that title and that relation. "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living;" but God is the God of Abraham, and the other patriarchs; therefore they are not dead; dead to this world, but alive to God; that is, though this life be lost, yet they shall have another and a better; a life in which God shall manifest himself to be their God, to all the purposes of benefit and eternal blessings.

This argument was summed up by St. Peter, and the sense of it is thus rendered by St. Clement, the bishop of Rome, as himself testifies: "Si Deus est justus, animus est immortalis;" which is perfectly rendered by the words of my text, "If in this life only we have hope, then are we of all men the most miserable;" because this cannot be, that God who is just and good, should suffer them that heartily serve him, to be really and finally miserable; and yet in this world they are so, very frequently; therefore, in another world, they shall live to receive a full recompence of reward.

Neither is this so to be understood, as if the servants of God were so wholly forsaken of him in this world, and so permitted to the malice of evil men, or the asperities of fortune, that they have not many refreshments, and great comforts, and the perpetual festivities of a holy conscience; for "God my maker is he that giveth songs in the night," said Elihu;[e] that is, God, as a reward, giveth a cheerful spirit, and makes a man to sing with joy, when other men are sad with the solemn darkness, and with the affrights of conscience, and with the illusions of the night. But God, who intends vast portions of felicity to his children, does not reckon these little joys into the account of the portion of his elect. The good things which they have in this world, are not little, if we account the joys of religion, and the peace of conscience, amongst things valuable; yet whatsoever it is, all of it, all the blessings of themselves, and of their posterity, and of their relatives, for their sakes, are cast in for intermedial entertainments; but "their good" and their prepared portion shall be hereafter. But for the evil itself, which they must suffer and overcome, it is such a portion of this life, as our blessed Saviour had; injuries and temptations, care and persecutions, poverty and labour, humility and patience: it is well; it is very well; and who can long for or expect better here, when his Lord and Saviour had a state of things, so very much worse than the worst of our calamities? but bad as it is, it is to be chosen rather than a better; because it is the high way of the cross; it is Jacob's ladder, upon which the saints and the King of saints did descend, and at last ascend to heaven itself; and bad as it is, it is the method and inlet to the best; it is a sharp, but it is a short step to bliss: for it is remarkable, in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, that the poor man, the afflicted saint, died first, Dives being permitted to his purple and fine linen, to his delicious fare, and (which he most of all needed) to a space of repentance: but, in the mean time, the poor man was rescued from his sad portion of this life, and carried into Abraham's bosom; where he who was denied in this world to be feasted even with the portion of dogs, was placed in the bosom of the patriarch, that is, in the highest room; for so it was in their "discubitus," or lying down to meat, the chief guest, the most beloved person, did lean upon the bosom of the master of the feast; so St. John did lean upon the breast of Jesus, and so did Lazarus upon the breast of Abraham; or else κόλπος Ἀβραὰμ, "sinus Abrahami," may be rendered "the bay of Abraham," alluding to the place of rest, where ships put in after a tempestuous and dangerous navigation; the storm was quickly over with the poor man, and the angel of God brought the good man's soul to a safe port, where he should be disturbed no more: and so saith the Spirit; "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord; for they rest from their labours."

[c] Heb. xi. 6. [d] Heb. xi. 16. [e] Job xxxv. 10.

But this brings me to the second great inquiry; if here we live upon hopes, and that this is a place of hopes, but not this only; what other place is there, where we shall be blessed in our hope, where we shall rest from our labour and our fear, and have our hopes in perfection; that is all the pleasures which can come from the greatest and the most excellent hope?

"Not in this life only:"—So my text. Therefore hereafter; as soon as we die; as soon as ever the soul goes from the body it is blessed. Blessed, I say, but not perfect: it rejoices in peace and a holy hope: here we have hopes mingled with fear, there our hope is heightened with joy and confidence; it is all the comfort that can be, in the expectation of unmeasurable joys: it is only, not fruition, not the joys of a perfect possession; but less than that, it is, every good thing else.

But that I may make my way plain: I must first remove an objection, which seems to overthrow this whole affair. St Paul intends these words of my text, as an argument to prove the resurrection; we shall rise again with our bodies; for "if in this life only we had hope, then we were of all men most miserable;" meaning, that unless there be a resurrection, there is no good for us any where else; but if "they who die in the Lord," were happy before the resurrection, then we were not of all men most miserable, though there were to be no resurrection; for the godly are presently happy. So that one must fail; either the resurrection, or the intermedial happiness; the proof of one relies upon the destruction of the other; and because we can no other ways be happy, therefore there shall be a resurrection.

To this I answer, that if the godly, instantly upon their dissolution, had the vision beatifical, it is very true, that they were not most miserable, though there be no resurrection of the dead, though the body were turned into its original nothing: for the joys of the sight of God would, in the soul alone, make them infinite recompence for all the sufferings of this world. But that which the saints have after their dissolution, being only the comforts of a holy hope, the argument remains good: for these intermedial hopes being nothing at all, but in relation to the resurrection, these hopes do not destroy, but confirm it rather; and if the resurrection were not to be, we should neither have any hopes here, nor hopes hereafter, and therefore the apostle's word is, "If here only we had hopes;" that is, if our hopes only related to this life; but because our hopes only relate to the life to come, and even after this life we are still but in the regions of an enlarged hope, this life and that interval are both but the same argument to infer a resurrection: for they are the hopes of that state, and the joys of those hopes, and it is the comfort of that joy, which makes them blessed who die in the love of God, and the faith and obedience of the Lord Jesus.

And now to the proposition itself.

In the state of separation, the souls departed perceive the blessing and comfort of their labours; they are alive after death; and after death, immediately they find great refreshments. "Justorum animæ in manu Dei sunt, et non tanget illos tormentum mortis:" "The torments of death shall not touch the souls of the righteous, because they are in the hands of God."[f] And fifteen hundred years after the death of Moses, we find him talking with our blessed Saviour in his transfiguration upon mount Tabor: and as Moses was then, so are all the saints immediately after death, "præsentes apud Dominum," "they are present with the Lord;" and to be so, is not a state of death; and yet of this it is, that St. Paul affirms it to be much better than to be alive.

And this was the undoubted sentence of the Jews before Christ, and since; and therefore our blessed Saviour told the converted thief, that he should "that day be with him in paradise." Now without peradventure, he spake so as he was to be understood: meaning by "paradise," that which the schools and pulpits of the Rabbins did usually speak of it. By paradise, till the time of Esdras, it is certain, the Jews only meant the blessed garden, in which God only placed Adam and Eve: but in the time of Esdras, and so downword, when they spake distinctly of things to happen after this life, and began to signify their new discoveries, and modern philosophy by names, they called the state of souls, expecting the resurrection of their bodies, by the name of גן ערן, "the garden of Eden." Hence came that form of comprecation and blessing to the soul of an Israelite, "Sit anima ejus in horto Eden," "Let his soul be in the garden of Eden;" and in their solemn prayers at the time of their death, they were wont to say, "Let his soul rest; and let his sleep be in peace, until the Comforter shall come, and open the gates of paradise unto him:" expressly distinguishing paradise from the state of the resurrection: and so it is evident, in the intercourse on the cross, between Christ and the converted thief. "That day both were to be in paradise;" but Christ himself was not then ascended into heaven, and therefore paradise was no part of that region, where Christ now, and hereafter the saints, shall reign in glory. For παράδεισος did, by use and custom, signify "any place of beauty and pleasure." So the LXX read Eccles. ii. 5. "I made me gardens and orchards," "I made me a paradise," so it is in the Greek; and Cicero[g] having found this strange word in Xenophon, renders it by "conseptum agrum ac diligenter consitum:" "a field well hedged and set with flowers and fruit."—"Vivarium," Gellius renders it, "a place to keep birds and beasts alive for pleasure." Pollux says this word was Persian by its original; yet because by traduction it became a Hebrew, we may best learn the meaning of it from the Jews, who used it most often, and whose sense we better understand. Their meaning, therefore, was this; that as paradise, or the garden of Eden, was a place of great beauty, pleasure, and tranquillity; so the state of separate souls was a state of peace and excellent delights. So Philo allegorically does expound paradise. Λέγουσι γὰρ ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ φύτα εἶναι μηδὲν ἐοικότα τοῖς παρ' ἡμῖν, ἀλλὰ ζωῆς, ἀθανασίας, εἰδήσεως. "For the trees that grow in paradise are not like ours, but they bring forth knowledge, and life, and immortality."—It is, therefore, more than probable, that when the converted thief heard our blessed Saviour speak of "paradise," or "Gan Eden," he who was a Jew, and heard that on that day he should be there, understood the meaning to be, that he should be there where all the good Jews did believe the souls of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to be placed. As if Christ had said; Though you only ask to be remembered when I come into my kingdom, not only that shall be performed in time, but even to-day thou shalt have great refreshment; and this the Hellenish Jews called ἀνάπαυσιν τοῦ παραδείσου, "the rest of paradise:" and παράκλησιν, "the comfort" of paradise; the word being also warranted from that concerning Lazarus; παρακαλεῖται, "he is comforted."

But this we learn more perfectly from the raptures of St. Paul: "He knew a man" (meaning himself) "rapt up into the third heaven: and I knew such a man how that he was caught up into paradise."[h] The raptures and visions were distinct; for St. Paul being a Jew, and speaking after the manner of his nation, makes "paradise" a distinct thing from "the third heaven." For the Jews deny any "orbes" to be in heaven; but they make three regions only, the one of clouds, the second of stars, and the third of angels. To this third or supreme heaven was St. Paul rapt; but he was also borne to paradise, to another place distinct and separate by time and station; for by paradise his countrymen never understood the third heaven. But there also it was that he heard τὰ ἄῤῥητα ῥήματα, "unspeakable words, great glorifications of God, huge excellencies, such which he might not or could not utter below. The effect of these considerations is this; that although the saints are not yet admitted to the blessings consequent to a happy resurrection, yet they have the intermedial entertainments of a present and a great joy.

To this purpose are those words to be understood: "To him that overcomes, will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."[i] That is, if I may have leave to expound these words, to mean what the Jews did about that time understand by such words: δένδρον τῆς ζωῆς, "the tree of life," does signify the principle of peace and holiness, of wisdom and comforts for ever. Philo, expounding it, calls it τὴν μεγίστην τῶν ἀρετῶν θεοσεβείαν, δι' ἧς ἀθανατίζεται ἡ ψυχή: "The worship of God, the greatest of all virtues, by which the soul is made to live for ever:" as if by eating of this tree of life in the paradise of God, they did mean, that they who die well, shall immediately be feasted with the deliciousness of a holy conscience, which the Spirit of God expresses by saying, "They shall walk up and down in white garments, and their works shall follow them;" their tree of life shall germinate; they shall then feel the comforts of having done good works; a sweet remembrance and a holy peace shall caress and feast them, and there they shall "walk up and down in white;"[k] that is, as candidates of the resurrection to immortality.

And this allegory of the garden of Eden and paradise was so heartily pursued by the Jews, to represent the state of separation, that the Essenes describe that state by the circumstances and ornaments of a blessed garden: Χῶρον οὔτε ὄμβροις, οὔτε νιφετοῖς, οὔτε κύμασι βαρυνόμενον: "a region that is not troubled with clouds or showers, or storms or blasts:" ἀλλ' ὃν ἐξ ὠκεανοῦ πρανὴς ἀεὶ ζέφυρος ἐπιπνέων ἀναψυχει; "but a place which is perpetually refreshed with delicious breaths." This was it which the heathens did dream concerning the Elysian fields; for all the notices περι ᾅδου, concerning the regions of separate souls, came into Greece from the barbarians, says Diodorus Siculus; and Tertullian observes, although we call that paradise, which is a place appointed to receive the souls of the saints, and that this is separated from the notices of the world by a wall of fire, a portion of the torrid zone (which he supposes to be meant by the flaming sword of the angel placed at the gates of paradise); yet, says he, the Elysian fields have already possessed the faith and opinions of men. All comes from the same fountain, the doctrine of the old synagogue, confirmed by the words of Christ and the commentaries of the apostles; viz. that after death, before the day of judgment, there is a paradise for God's servants, a region of rest, of comfort, and holy expectations. And, therefore, it is remarkable that these words of the psalmist, "Ne rapias me in medio dierum meorum;"[l] "snatch me not away in the midst of my days:" in the Hebrew it is, "Ne facias me ascendere;" "make me not to ascend," or to go upwards; meaning, to the supernatural regions of separate souls, who, after death, are in their beginnings of exultation. For to them that die in the Lord, death is a preferment, it is a part of their great good fortune; for death hath not only lost the sting, but it brings a coronet in his hand, which will invest and adorn the heads of saints, till that day come in which the crown of righteousness shall be brought forth, to give them the investiture of an everlasting kingdom.

But that I may take up this proposition useful and clear, I am to add some things by way of supplement.

1. This place of separation was called "paradise" by the Jews, and by Christ, and after Christ's ascension, by St. John, because it signifies a place of pleasure and rest; and, therefore, by the same analogy, the word may be still used in all the periods of the world, though the circumstances, or though the state of things, be changed. It is generally supposed that this had a proper name, and in the Old Testament was called "Abraham's bosom;" that is, the region where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob did dwell, till the coming of Christ. But I suppose myself to have great reason to dissent from this common opinion; for this word of "Abraham's bosom," being but once used in both the Testaments, and then particularly applied to the person of Lazarus, must needs signify the eminence and privilege of joy that Lazarus had; for all that were in the blessed state of separation, were not in "Abraham's bosom," but only the best and most excellent persons; but they were μετὰ τοῦ Ἀβραὰμ, "with Abraham;" and the analogy of the phrase to the manner of the Jewish feasting, where the best guest did lie in the bosom of the master, that is, had the best place, makes it most reasonable to believe that "Abraham's bosom" does not signify the general state of separation, even of the blessed, but the choicest place in that state, a greater degree of blessedness. But because he is the father of the faithful, therefore, to be with Abraham, or to sit down with Abraham, in the time of the Old Testament, did signify the same thing as to be in paradise; but to be in "Abraham's bosom" signifies a great eminence of place and comfort, which is indulged to the most excellent and the most afflicted.

2. Although the state of separation may now also, and is by St. John called paradise, because the allegory still holds perfectly, as signifying comfort and holy pleasures; yet the spirits of good men are not to be said "to be with Abraham," but "to be with Christ;" and as being with Abraham was the specification of the more general word of paradise in the Old Testament, so "being with Christ" is the specification of it in the New. So St. Stephen prayed, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit;" and St. Paul said, "I desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ;" which expression St. Polycarp also used in his epistle to the Philippians, ὅτι εἰς τὸν ὀφειλόμενον αὐτοῖς τόπον, εἰσὶ παρὰ Κυρίῳ; "they are in the place that is due to them, they are with the Lord;" that is, in the hands, in the custody of the Lord Jesus; as appears in the words of St. Stephen and St. Paul. So St. Jerome; "Scimus Nepotianum nostrum esse cum Christo, et sanctorum mixtum choris:" "We know that our Nepotian is with Christ, mingled in the choirs of saints." Upon this account (and it is not at all unreasonable) the church hath conjectured, that the state of separate souls, since the glorification of our Lord, is much bettered and advanced, and their comforts greater; because, as before Christ's coming, the expectation of the saints that slept, was fixed upon the revelation of the Messias in his first coming, so now it is upon the second coming unto judgment, and in his glory. This improvement of their condition is well intimated by their being said to be under the altar; that is, under the protection of Christ, under the powers and benefits of his priesthood, by which he makes continual intercession both for them and us. This place some of the old doctors understood too literally, and from hence they believed that the souls of departed saints were under their material altars; which fancy produced that fond decree of the council of Eliberis,[m] that wax lights should not by day be burnt in cemeteries, "inquietandi enim spiritus sanctorum non sunt:" "lest the spirits of saints should, by the light of the diurnal tapers, be disquieted." This reason, though it be trifling and impertinent, yet it declares their opinion, that they supposed their souls to be near their relics, which were placed under the altars. But better than this their state is described by St. John, in these words: "Therefore they are before the throne of God, and serve him night and day in his temple, and he that sits upon the throne shall dwell among them." With which general words, as being modest bounds to our inquiries, enough to tell us it is rarely well, but enough also to chastise all curious questions, let us remain content; and labour with faith and patience, with hope and charity, to be made worthy to partake of those comforts, after which when we have long inquired, when at last we come to try what they are, we shall find them much better, and much otherwise than we imagine.

3. I am to admonish this also, that although our blessed Saviour is, in the creed, said to descend εἰς ᾅδου, "into hell" (so we render it); yet this does not at all prejudice his other words, "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise:" for the word εἰς ᾅδου signifies indefinitely the state of separation, whether blessed or accursed; it means only "the invisible place," or the region of darkness, whither whoso descends shall be no more seen. For as among the heathens the "Elysian fields," and "Tartara," are both ἐν ᾅδου; so amongst the Jews and christians, "paradisus" and "gehenna" are the distinct states of hades. Of the first we have a plain testimony in Diphilus:

> Καὶ γὰρ καθ' ᾅδην δύο τρίβους νομίζομεν,
> Μίαν δικαίων, κἀτέραν ἀσεβῶν ὁδόν.

"In hades there are two ways, one for just men, and another for the impious." Of the second we have the testimony of Josephus, who speaking of the Sadducees, says, τὰς καθ' ᾅδου τιμωρίας καὶ τιμὰς ἀναιροῦσι, "they take away or deny the rewards and punishments respectively which are in hades," or in the state of separation; so that if Christ's soul was in paradise, he was in hades. In vain, therefore, does St. Austin torment himself to tell how Christ could be in both places at once, when it is no harder than to tell how a man may be in England and London at the same time.

4. It is observable, that in the mentions of paradise by St. John, he twice speaks of "the tree of life," but never of "the tree of knowledge of good and evil;" because this was the symbol of secular knowledge, of prudence and skill of doing things of this world, which we can naturally use; we may smell and taste them, but not feed upon them; that is, these are no part of our enjoyment; and if we be given up to the study of such notices, and be immerged in the things of this world, we cannot attend to the studies of religion and of the Divine service. But these cares and secular divertisements shall cease, when our souls are placed in paradise; there shall be no care taken for raising portions for our children, nor to provide bread for our tables; no cunning contrivances to be safe from the crafty snare of an enemy; no amazement at losses, no fear of slanderings or of the gripes of publicans; but we shall feed on the tree of life, love of God, and longings for the coming of Christ: we are then all spirit, and our employment shall be symbolical, that is, spiritual, holy, and pleasant.

I have now made it as evident as questions of this nature will bear, that in the state of separation, the spirits of good men shall be blessed and happy souls,—they have an antepast or taste of their reward; but their great reward itself, their crown of righteousness, shall not be yet; that shall not be until the day of judgment; and this was the third proposition I undertook to prove; the consummation and perfection of the saints' felicity shall be at the resurrection of the dead.

Ἐν παρουσίᾳ αὐτοῦ, "at his coming;" so St. John expresses the time, "that we may not then be ashamed: for now we are the sons of God, but it does not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like unto him, and see him as he is."[n] At his glorious appearing, we shall also appear glorious; we shall see him as he is; but till then, this beatific vision shall not be at all; but for the interval, the case is otherwise. Tertullian affirms, "Puniri et foveri animam interim in inferis, sub exspectatione utriusque judicii, in quâdam usurpatione et candidâ ejus:" "the souls are punished or refreshed in their regions, expecting the day of their judgment and several sentences."[o] "Habitacula illa, animarum promptuaria, nominavit Scriptura," saith St. Ambrose: "the Scripture calls these habitations, the promptuaries or repositories of souls."[p] There is comfort, but not the full reward; a certain expectation, supported with excellent intervals of joy: "refrigerium," so the Latins call it, "a refreshment." "Donec consummatio rerum resurrectionem omnium plenitudine mercedis expungat, tunc apparituræ cœlesti promissione," saith Tertullian: "until the consummation of all things points out the resurrection, by the fulness of reward, and the appearing of the heavenly promise." So the author of the questions "ad orthodoxos:"[q] "Immediately after death, presently there is a separation of the just from the unjust; for they are borne by angels εἰς ἀξίους αὐτῶν τόπους, "into the places they have deserved;" and they are in those places φυλαττόμεναι ἕως τῆς ἡμέρας της ἀναστάσεως καὶ ἀνταποδόσεως, "kept unto the day of resurrection and retribution." But what do they in the mean time? how is it with them? Θαυμασίαν τίνα ἡδονὴν ἥδεται, καὶ ἀγάλλεται, says Nazianzen:[r] "they rejoice and are delighted in a wonderful joy." "They see angels and archangels, they converse with them, and see our blessed Saviour Jesus in his glorified humanity:" so Justin Martyr.[s] But in these great joys they look for greater. They are now "in paradiso," but they long that the body and soul may be in heaven together; but this is the glory of the day of judgment, the fruit of the resurrection. And this whole affair is agreeable to reason and the analogy of the whole dispensation, as it is generally and particularly described in Scripture.

For when the greatest effect of the Divine power, the mightiest promise, that hardest thing to christian faith, that impossible thing to gentile philosophy, the expectation of the whole world, the new creation, when that shall come to pass, viz. that the souls shall be reinvested with their bodies, when the ashes of dissolved bones shall stand up a new and living frame, to suppose that then there shall be nothing done in order to eternity, but to publish the salvation of saints, of which they were possessed before, is to make a great solemnity for nothing, to do great things for no great end, and therefore, it is not reasonable to suppose it.

For if it were a good argument of the apostle, that the patriarchs and saints of the Old Testament received not the promises signified by Canaan and the land of promise, because "God hath provided some better thing for us, that without us they should not be made perfect," it must also conclude of all alike; that they who died since Christ, must stay till the last day, that they and we and all may be made perfect together. And this very thing was told to the spirits of the martyrs, who under the altar cried, "How long, O Lord,"[t] &c. that they should "rest yet for a little season," until their fellow-servants also shall be fulfilled.

Upon this account it is, that the day of judgment is a day of recompence. So said our blessed Lord himself: "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just."[u] And this is the day in which all things shall be restored; for "the heavens must receive Jesus till the time of restitution of all things:"[x] and till then, the reward "is said to be laid up." So St. Paul: "Henceforth is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge shall give me in that day." And that you may know he means the resurrection and the day of judgment, he adds; "and not to me only, but to all them that love his coming;"[y] of whom it is certain many shall be alive at that day, and therefore cannot, before that day, receive the crown of righteousness: and then also, and not till then, shall be his appearing; but till then, it is a "depositum." The sum is this: in the world, we walk and live by faith; in the state of separation, we live by hope; and in the resurrection, we shall live by an eternal charity. Here we see God as "in a glass, darkly:" in the separation we shall behold him, but it is afar off; and after the resurrection we shall see him "face to face," in the everlasting comprehensions of an intuitive beatitude. In this life we are warriors; in the separation we are conquerors; but we shall not triumph till after the resurrection.

And in proportion to this is also the state of devils and damned spirits. "Art thou come to torment us before the time," said the devils to our blessed Saviour. There is for them also an appointed time, and when that is we learn from St. Jude:[z] "They are reserved in chains under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day." Well, therefore, did St. James affirm, "that the devils believe and tremble;" and so do the damned souls, with an insupportable amazement, fearing the revelation of that day. They know that day will come, and they know they shall find an intolerable sentence on that day; and they fear infinitely, and are in amazement and confusion, feeling the worm of conscience, and are in the state of devils, who fear God and hate him; they tremble, but they love him not; and yet they die because they would not love him, because they would not with their powers and strengths keep his commandments.

This doctrine, though of late it hath been laid aside, upon the interest of the church of Rome, and for compliance with some other schools, yet was it universally the doctrine of the primitive church; as appears out of Justin Martyr, who, in his dialogues with Tryphon, reckons this amongst the ἑτεροδοξίαι, "errors" of some men, who say there shall be no resurrection of the dead; but that, as soon as good men are dead, τὰς ψυχὰς αὐτῶν ἀναλαμβάνεσθαι εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν, "their souls are taken up immediately into heaven." And the writer of the questions "ad orthodoxos," asks,[a] whether, before the resurrection, there shall be a reward of works? because to the thief paradise was promised that day. He answers: "It was fit the thief should go to paradise, and there perceive what things should be given to the works of faith; but there he is kept, ἕως τῆς ἡμέρας τῆς ἀναστάσεως καὶ ἀνταποδόσεως, "until the day of resurrection and reward." But in paradise the soul hath an intellectual perception, both of herself, and of those things which are under her.

Concerning which I shall not need to heap up testimonies. This only: it is the doctrine of the Greek church unto this day; and was the opinion of the greatest part of the ancient church, both Latin and Greek; and by degrees was, in the west, eaten out by the doctrine of purgatory and invocation of saints; and rejected a little above two hundred years ago, in the council of Florence; and since that time it hath been more generally taught, that the souls of good men enjoy the beatific vision before the resurrection, even presently upon the dissolution. According to which new opinion, it will be impossible to understand the meaning of my text, and of divers other places of Scripture, which I have now alleged and explicated; or at all to perceive the economy and dispensation of the day of judgment; or how it can be a day of discerning; or how the reapers (the angels) shall bind up the wicked into bundles, and throw them into the unquenchable fire; or yet how it can be useful, or necessary, or prudent for Christ to give a solemn sentence upon all the world; and how it can be, that that day should be so formidable and full of terrors, when nothing can affright those that have long enjoyed the beatific presence of God; and no thunders or earthquakes can affright them, who have upon them the biggest evil in the world, I mean the damned, who, according to this opinion, have been in hell for many ages: and it can mean nothing but to them that are alive; and then it is but a particular, not a universal judgment; and after all it can pretend to no piety, to no Scripture, to no reason, and only can serve the ends of the church of Rome, who can no way better be confuted in their invocations of saints than by this truth, that the saints do not yet enjoy the beatific vision; and though they are in a state of ease and comfort, yet are not in a state of power and glory and kingdom, till the day of judgment.

This also perfectly does overthrow the doctrine of purgatory. For as the saints departed are not perfect, and therefore certainly not to be invocated, not to be made our patrons and advocates; so neither are they in such a condition as to be in torment; and it is impossible that any wise man should believe, that the souls of good men after death should endure the sharp pains of hell, and yet at the same time believe those words of Scripture, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them."[b] If they can rest in beds of fire, and sing hymns of glory in the torments of the damned, if their labours are done when their pains are almost infinite, then these words of the Spirit of God, and that doctrine of purgatory, can be reconciled; else never to eternal ages. But it is certain they are words that cannot deceive us: "Non tanget eos tormentum mortis:" "torment in death shall never touch them."

But having established the proposition, and the intended sense of the text, let us awhile consider,

1. That God is our God when we die, if we be his servants while we live: and to be our God signifies very much good to us. He will rescue us from the powers of hell; the devil shall have no part or portion in us; we shall be kept in safe custody, we shall be in the hands of Christ, out of which all the powers of hell shall never snatch us; and therefore we may die with confidence, if we die with a good conscience; we have no cause of fear, if we have just grounds to hope for pardon. The Turks have a saying, that the christians do not believe themselves, when they talk such glorious things of heaven and the state of separation; for if they did, they would not be so afraid to die: but they do not so well consider that christians believe all this well enough, but they believe better than they live; and therefore they believe and tremble, because they do not live after the rate of going to heaven; they know that for good men glorious things are prepared; but "Tophet is prepared for evil kings" and unjust rulers, for vicious men and degenerate christians; there is a hell for accursed souls, and men live without fear of it so long, till their fear as soon as it begins in an instant passes into despair, and the fearful groans of the damned. It is no wonder to see men so unwilling to die, to be impatient of the thought of death, to be afraid to make their will, to converse with the solemn scarecrow. He that is fit to die, must have long dwelt with it, must handle it on all sides, must feel whether the sting be taken out: he must examine "whether he be in Christ;" that is, whether "he be a new creature." And indeed I do not so much wonder that any man fears to die, as when I see a careless and a wicked person descend to his grave with as much indifference as he goes to sleep; that is, with no other trouble than that he leaves the world, but he does not fear to die; and yet, upon the instant of his dissolution, he goes into the common receptacle of souls, where nothing can be addressed to him but the consequence of what he brings along with him, and he shall presently know whether he shall be saved or damned.

We have read of some men, who by reading or hearing strange opinions have entered into desperate melancholy, and divers who have perfectly despaired of the Divine mercy; who feeling such horrid convulsions in their souls, such fearful expectations of an eternal curse, that not finding themselves able to bear so intolerable a fear, have hanged or drowned themselves; and yet they only thought so, or feared it; and might have altered it if they would have hoped and prayed: but then let it be considered, when the soul is stripped of the cloud, her body,—when she is entered into strange regions, and converses only with spirits, and sees plainly all that is within her,—when all her sins appear in their own natural ugliness, and set out by their aggravating circumstances; then she remembers her filthy pleasures, and hates them infinitely, as being such things to which she then can have no appetite: then she perceives she shall perish for that which is not, for that whose remembrance is intolerable; when she sees many new secrets which she understood not before, and hath stranger apprehensions of the wrath of God, than ever could be represented in this life: when she hath the notices of a spirit, and an understanding pure enough to see essences, and rightly to weigh all the degrees of things; when, possibly, she is often affrighted with the alarms and conjectures of the day of judgment; or if she be not, yet certainly knows not only by faith and fear, but by a clear light and proper knowledge, that it shall certainly come, and its effects shall remain for ever, then she hath time enough to bewail her own folly and remediless infelicity; if we could not think seriously that things must come to that pass, and place ourselves, by holy meditation, in the circumstances of that condition, and consider what we should then think,—how miserably deplore our folly, how comfortless remember our ill-gotten wealth; with how much asperity and deep sighing we should call to mind our foolish pride, our trifling swearing, our beastly drinkings, our unreasonable and brutish lusts; it could not be but we must grow wiser on a sudden, despise the world, betake ourselves to a strict religion, reject all vanities of spirit, and be sober and watch unto prayer. If any of us had but a strange dream, and should, in the fears of the night, but suppose ourselves in hell, and be affrighted with those circumstances of damnation which we can tell of, and use in our imperfect notices of things, it would effect strange changes upon a ductile and malleable spirit. A frequent, severe meditation can do more than a seldom and a fantastic dream; but an active faith can do more than all the arts and contingencies of fancy or discourse.

Now it is well with us, and we may yet secure it shall be well with us for ever; but within an hour it may be otherwise with any of us all, who do not instantly take courses of security. But he that does not, would, in such a change, soon come to wish, that he might exchange his state with the meanest, with the miserablest of all mankind; with galley-slaves and miners, with men condemned to tortures for a good conscience.

Sed cum pulcra minax succidet membra securis,

In the day of felling timber, the shrub and the bramble are better than the tallest fir, or the goodliest cedar; and a poor saint, whose soul is in the hand of Jesus, placed under the altar, over which our High Priest, like the cherubim over the propitiatory, intercedes perpetually for the hastening of his glory, is better than the greatest tyrant, who if he dies, is undone for ever. For, in the interval, there shall be rest and comfort to the one; and torment, and amazement, and hellish confusion to the other; and the day of judgment will come, and it shall appear to all the world, that they whose joys were not in this world, were not, "of all men, most miserable," because their joys and their life were hid with Christ in God, and at the resurrection of the just, shall be brought forth, and be illustrious, beyond all the beauties of the world.

I have now done with my text, and been the expounder of this part of the divine oracle; but here is another text, and another sermon yet. Ye have heard Moses and the prophets; now hear one from the dead, whose life and death would each of them make an excellent sermon, if this dead man had a good interpreter: for he being dead, yet speaketh, and calleth upon us to live well, and to live quickly, to watch perpetually, and to work assiduously; for we shall descend into the same shadows of death.

Linquenda tellus, et domus, et placens
Uxor; neque harum, quas colis, arborum
Te, præter invisas cupressos,
Ulla brevem dominum sequetur. HOR.

"Thou must leave thy rich land, and thy well-built house, and thy pleasing wife; and of all the trees of thy orchard or thy wood, nothing shall attend thee to the grave, but oak for thy coffin, and cypress for thy funeral." It shall not then be inquired how long thou hast lived, but how well. None below will be concerned, whether thou wert rich or poor, but all the spirits of light and darkness shall be busy in the scrutiny of thy life; for the good angels would fain carry thy soul to Christ; and if they do, the devils will follow, and accuse thee there; and when thou appearest before the righteous Judge, what will become of thee, unless Christ be thy advocate, and God be merciful and appeased, and the angels be thy guards, and a holy conscience be thy comfort. There will to every one of us come a time, when we shall with great passion, and great interest, inquire, how have I spent my days, how have I laid out my money, how have I employed my time, how have I served God, and how repented me of my sins? and upon our answer to these questions depends a happy or an unhappy eternity: and blessed is he, who concerning these things, takes care in time; and of this care I may with much confidence and comfort propound to you the example of this good man, whose relics lay before you: Sir George Dalston, of Dalston in Cumberland, a worthy man, beloved of his country, useful to his friends, friendly to all men, careful of his religion, and a true servant of God.

He was descended of an ancient and worthy house in Cumberland; and he adorned his family and extraction with a more worthy comportment; for to be of a worthy family, and to bring to it no stock of our proper virtue, is to be upbraided by our family; and a worthy father can be no honour to his son, when it shall be said, "behold the difference, this crab descended from a goodly apple-tree;" but he who beautifies the escutcheon of his ancestors by worthy achievements, by learning, or by wisdom, by valour and by great employments, by a holy life and a useful conversation, that man is the parent of his own fame, and a new beginner of an ancient family; for as conversion is a perpetual creation, so is the progression of a family in a line of worthy descendants, a daily beginning of its honour, and a new stabiliment.

He was bred in learning, in which Cambridge was his tiring room, and the court of Queen Elizabeth was his stage, in which he first represented the part of a hopeful young man; but there he stayed not; his friends not being desirous, that the levities of youth should be fermented by the liberties of a rich and splendid court, caused him to lie in the restraints and to grow ripe in the sobrieties of a country life and a married state; in which, as I am informed, he behaved himself with so great worthiness, and gave such probation of his love of justice, popular regards of his country's good, and abilities to serve them, that, for almost forty years together, his country chose him for their knight, to serve in all the intervening parliaments. "Magistratus, indicatorium;" "employment shows the man;" he was a leading man in parliaments, prevailing there by the great reputation of his justice and integrity; and yet he was not unpleasant and hated at court: for he had well understood, that the true interests of courts and parliaments were one, and that they are like the humours of the body, if you increase one beyond its limit, that destroys all the rest, and itself at last; and when they look upon themselves as enemies, and that hot and cold must fight, the prevailing part is abated in the conflict, and the vanquished part is destroyed: but when they look upon themselves as varieties serving the differing aspects and necessities of the same body, they are for the allay of each other's exorbitances and excesses, and, by keeping their own measures, they preserve the man: this the good man well understood; for so he comported himself, that he was loud in parliaments and valued at court; he was respected in very many parliaments, and was worthily regarded by the worthy kings; which, without an orator, commends a man: "Gravissimi principis judicium in minoribus etiam rebus consequi pulcrum est," said Pliny; "To be approved, though but in lesser terms, by the judgment of a wise prince, is a great ornament to a man."—For as King Theodoric, in Cassiodore, said, "Neque dignus est à quopiam redargui, qui nostro judicio meretur absolvi:" "No man to reprove him, whom the king aught commends."

But I need no artifices to represent him worthy, his arguments of probation were within, in the magazines of a good heart, and represented themselves by worthy actions. For God was pleased to invest him with a marvellous sweet nature, which is certainly to be reckoned as one half of the grace of God: because a good nature, being the relics and remains of that shipwreck which Adam made, is the proper and immediate disposition to holiness, as the corruption of Adam was to disobedience and peevish counsels. A good nature will not upbraid the more imperfect persons, will not deride the ignorant, will not reproach the erring man, will not smite sinners on the face, will not despise the penitent. A good nature is apt to forgive injuries, to pity the miserable, to rescue the oppressed, to make every one's condition as tolerable as he can; and so would he. For, as when good nature is heightened by the grace of God, that which was natural becomes now spiritual; so these actions which proceeded from an excellent nature, and were pleasing and useful to men,—when they derive from a new principle of grace, they become pleasant in the eyes of God: then obedience to laws is duty to God; justice is righteousness, bounty becomes graciousness, and alms is charity.

And, indeed, this is a grace in which this good man was very remarkable, being very frequent and much in alms, tender-hearted to the poor, open-handed to relieve their needs; the bellies of the poor did bless him, he filled them with food and gladness; and I have heard that he was so regular, so constant, so free in this duty, that in these late unhappy wars, being in a garrison, and near the suffering some rude accidents, the beggars made themselves guard, and rescued him from that trouble, who had so often rescued them from hunger.

He was of a meek and gentle spirit, but not too soft; he knew how to do good, and how to put by an injury; but I have heard it told by them that knew his life, that being, by the unavoidable trouble of a great estate, engaged in great suits at law, he was never plaintiff, but always upon the defensive part; and that he had reason on his side, and justice for him, I need allege no other testimony, but that the sentence of his judges so declared it.

But that in which I propound this good man most imitable, was in his religion; for he was a great lover of the church, a constant attender to the sermons of the church; a diligent hearer of the prayers of the church, and an obedient son to perform the commands of the church. He was diligent in his times and circumstances of devotion; he would often be at church so early, that he was seen to walk long in the churchyard before prayers, being as ready to confess his sins at the beginning, as to receive the blessing at the end of prayers. Indeed he was so great a lover of sermons, that though he knew how to value that which was the best, yet he was patient of that which was not so; and if he could not learn any thing to improve his faith, yet he would find something to exercise his patience, and something for charity; yet this his great love of sermons could not tempt him to a willingness of neglecting the prayers of the church, of which he was a great lover to his dying day. "Oves meæ exaudiunt vocem meam," says Christ; "my sheep hear my voice;" and so the church says, "my sheep hear my voice, they love my words, they pray in my forms, they observe my orders, they delight in my offices, they revere my ministers, and obey my constitutions:" and so did he; loving to have his soul recommended to God, and his needs represented, and his sins confessed, and his pardon implored, in the words of his mother, in the voice and accent of her that nursed him up to a spiritual life, to be a man in Christ Jesus.

He was indeed a great lover, and had a great regard for God's ministers, ever remembering the words of God, "keep my rest, and reverence my priests;" he honoured the calling in all, but he loved and revered the persons of such who were conscientious keepers of their "depositum," "that trust," which was committed to them: such which did not for interest quit their conscience, and did not, to preserve some parts of their revenue, quit some portions of their religion. He knew that what was true in 1639, was also true in 1644, and so to 57, and shall continue true to eternal ages; and they that change their persuasions by force or interest, did neither believe well nor ill, upon competent and just grounds; they are not just, though they happen on the right side. Hope of gain did by chance teach them well, and fear of loss abuses them directly. He pitied the persecuted, and never would take part with persecutors: he prayed for his prince, and served him in what he could: he loved God, and loved the church; he was a lover of his country's liberties, and yet an observer of the laws of his king.

Thus he behaved himself to all his superior relatives; to his equals and dependants he was also just, and kind, and loving. He was an excellent friend, laying out his own interests to serve theirs; sparing not himself, that he might serve them: as knowing society to be the advantage of man's nature; and friendship the ornament of society, and usefulness the ornament of friendship, and in this he was well known to be very worthy. He was tender and careful of his children, and so provident and so wise, so loving and obliging to his whole family, that he justly had that love and regard, that duty and observance from them, which his kindness and his care had merited. He was a provident and careful conductor of his estate; but far from covetousness, as appeared toward the evening of his life, in which that vice does usually prevail amongst old men, who are more greedy, when they have least need, and load their sumpters so much the more, by how much nearer they are to their journey's end; but he made a demonstration of the contrary; for he washed his hands and heart of the world, gave up his estate long before his death or sickness, to be managed by his only son, whom he left since, but then first made and saw him his heir; he emptied his hands of secular employment; meddled not with money, but for the uses of the poor, for piety, justice, and religion.

And now having divested himself of all objections and his conversation with the world, quitting his affections to it, he wholly gave himself to religion and devotion: he awakened early, and would presently be entertained with reading; when he rose, still he would be read to, and hear some of the Psalms of David: and excepting only what time he took for the necessities of his life and health, all the rest he gave to prayer, reading, and meditation, save only that he did not neglect, nor rudely entertain the visits and kind offices of his neighbours.

But in this great vacation from the world he espied his advantage, he knew well, according to that saying of the emperor Charles V., "Oportet inter vitæ negotia et diem mortis spatium aliquod intercedere;" there ought to be a valley between two such mountains, the business of our life, and the troubles of our death; and he stayed not till the noise of the Bridegroom's coming did awaken and affright him; but by daily prayers twice a day, constantly with his family, besides the piety and devotion of his own retirements, by a monthly communion, by weekly sermons, and by the religion of every day, he stood in procincts, ready with oil in his lamp, watching till his Lord should call.

And, indeed, when he was hearing what God did speak to him of duty, he also received his summons to give his account. For he was so pertinacious and attendant to God's holy word, and the services of the church, that though he found himself sick, he would not off, but stay till the solemnity was done; but it pleased God at church to give him his first arrest; and since that time I have often visited him, and found him always doing his work, with the greatest evenness and indifferency of spirit, as to the event of life and death, that I have observed in any. He was not unwilling to live; but if he should, he resolved to spend his life wholly in the service of God: but yet neither was he unwilling to die, because he then knew he should weep no more, and he should sin no more. He was very confident, but yet with great humility and great modesty, of the pardon of his sins; he had indeed lived without scandal, but he knew he had not lived without error; but as God had assisted him to avoid the reproach of great crimes, so he doubted not but he should find pardon for the less; and, indeed, I could not but observe, that he had, in all the time of his sickness, a very quiet conscience; which is to me an excellent demonstration of the state of his life, and the state of his grace and pardon. For though he seemed to have a conscience tender and nice, if any evil thing had touched it; yet I could not but apprehend that his peace was a just peace, the mercy of God, and the price and effect of the blood of Jesus.

He was so joyful, so thankful, so pleased in the ministries of the church, that it gave in evidence where his soul was most delighted, what it did apprehend the quickest, where it did use to dwell, and what it did most passionately love. He discoursed much of the mercies of God to him, repeated the blessings of his life, the accidents and instruments of his trouble; he loved the cause of his trouble, and pardoned them that neither loved it nor him.

When he had spent great portions of his time of sickness in the service of God, and in expectation of the sentence of his life or death, at last he understood the still voice of God, and that he was to go where his soul loved to be; he still increased his devotion, and being admonished, as his strength failed him, to supply his usual forms, and his want of strength and words, by short exercise of virtues, of faith and patience, and the love of God; he did it so willingly, so well, so readily, making his eyes, his hands, and his tongue, as long as he could, the interpreters of his mind, that as long as he was alive, he would see what his soul was doing. He doubted not of the truth of the promises, nor of the goodness of God, nor the satisfaction of Christ, and the merits of his death, nor the fruit of his resurrection, nor the prevalency of his intercession, nor yet doubted of his own part in them; but expected his portions in the regions of blessedness, with those who loved God, and served him heartily and faithfully in their generations.

He had so great a patience in his sickness, and was so afraid lest he should sin at last; that his piety outdid his nature, and though the body cannot feel but by the soul, yet his soul seemed so little concerned in the passions of the body, that I neither observed, nor heard of him, that he in all his sickness so much as complained with any semblance of impatience.

He so continued to pray, so delighted in hearing psalms sung, which I wish were made as fit to sing by their numbers as they are by their weight, that so very much of his time was spent in them, that it was very likely when his Lord came he would find him so doing; and he did so: for in the midst of prayers he went away, and got to heaven as soon as they; and saw them (as we hope) presented to the throne of grace; he went along with them himself, and was his own messenger to heaven; where although he possibly might prevent his last prayers, yet he would not prevent God's early mercy, which, as we humbly hope, gave him pardon for his sins, ease of his pain, joy after his sorrow, certainty for his fears, heaven for earth, innocence and impeccability instead of his infirmity.

Faith and justice, modesty and pure righteousness, made him equal to the worthiest examples; he was χρηστὸς ἀνὴρ, "a good man," loving and humble, meek and patient, he would be sure to be the last in contention, and the first at a peace; he would injure no man, but yet if any man was displeased with him, he would speak first, and offer words of kindness; if any did dispute concerning priority, he knew how to get it, even by yielding and compliance; walking profitably with his neighbours, and humbly with his God; and having lived a life of piety, he died in a full age, an honourable old age, in the midst of his friends, and in the midst of prayer: and although the events of the other world are hidden to us below, that we might live in faith, and walk in hope, and die in charity, yet we have great reason to bless God for his mercies to this our brother, and endeavour to comport ourselves with a strict religion, and a severe repentance; with an exemplar patience, and an exemplar piety; with the structures of a holy life, and the solemnities of a religious death, that we also may, as our confident and humble hope is, this our brother doth, by the conduct of angels, pass into the hands and bosom of Jesus, there to expect the most merciful sentence of the right hand, "Come, ye blessed children of my Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world." Amen, Lord Jesus, Amen.

Grant this, eternal God, for Jesus Christ's sake; to whom with thee, O Father, and the Holy Spirit, be all glory and honour, service and dominion, love and obedience be confessed due, and ever paid by all angels, and all men, and all the creatures, this day, henceforth and for evermore. Amen.

GENERAL DEDICATION

TO

THE POLEMICAL DISCOURSES.

CHRISTOPHER LORD HATTON,

BARON HATTON OF KIRBY,

PRIVY COUNCILLOR AND COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD TO HIS LATE MAJESTY, AND KNIGHT OF THE HONOURABLE ORDER OF THE BATH.

My Lord,

When we make books and publish them, and by dedications implore the patronage of some worthy person, I find by experience that we cannot acquire that end, which is pretended to by such addresses; for neither friendship nor power, interest or favour, can give those defences to a book, which it needs: because the evil fortune of books comes from causes discernible indeed, but irremediable; and the breath of the people is like the voice of an exterminating angel, not so killing but so secret. But that is not all; it is also as contingent as the smiles of an infant, or the fall of a die, which is determined by every part of motion which can be in any part of the hand or arm. For when I consider that the infinite variety of understandings is greater than that of faces, not only because the lines that make our faces are finite, but the things that integrate and actuate the understanding are not; but also because every man hath a face, but every man hath not understanding; and men with their understandings, or with their no understandings, give their sentence upon books, not only before they understand all, not only before they read all, but before they read three pages, receiving their information from humour or interest, from chance or mistake, from him that reads in malice, or from him that reads after dinner; I find it necessary that he that writes, should secure himself, and his own reputation, by all the ways of prudence and religion; that God, who takes care of fame as certainly as of lives, may do that which is best in this instance; for no other patron can defend him that writes from him that reads, and understands either too much or too little. And therefore, my Lord, I could not choose you to be the patron of my book, upon hopes you can, by greatness or interest, secure it against the stings of insects and imperfect creatures; nothing but Domitian's style can make them harmless; but I can, from your wisdom and your learning, the great reputation you have abroad, and the honour you have at home, hope that, for the relation sake, some will be civil to it, at least until they read it, and then I give them leave to do what they please, for I am secure enough in all this; because my writings are not intended as a stratagem for noises; I intend to do not only what is good, but what is best; and therefore I am not troubled at any event, so I may but justly hope that God is glorified in the ministration: but he that seeks any thing but God's service, shall have such a reward as will do him no good.

But finding nothing reasonable in the expectation that the dedication should defend the book, and that the gate should be a fortification to the house, I have sometimes believed that most men intend it to other purposes than this, and that, because they design or hope to themselves (at least at second hand) an artificial immortality, they would also adopt their patron or their friend into a participation of it: doing as the Cæsars did, who, taking a partner to the empire, did not divide the honour or the power, but the ministration. But in this also I find, that this address to your Lordship must be destitute of any material event, not only because you have secured to yourself a great name in all the registers of honour, by your skill and love to all things that are excellent, but because, of all men in the world, I am the unfittest to speak those great things of your Lordship, which your worthiness must challenge of all that know you. For, though I was wooed to love and honour you by the beauties of your virtue, and the sweetness of your disposition, by your worthy employments at court, and your being so beloved in your country, by the value your friends put upon you, and the regard that strangers paid to you, by your zeal for the church, and your busy care in the promoting all worthy learnings, by your religion and your nobleness; yet when I once came into a conversation with these excellencies, I found from your Lordship not only the example of so many virtues, but the expressions of so many favours and kindnesses to my person, that I became too much interested to look upon you with indifferency, and too much convinced of your worthiness to speak of it temperately; and therefore I resolve to keep where I am, and to love and enjoy what I am so unfit to publish and express.

But, my Lord, give me leave to account to you concerning the present collection; and I shall no otherwise trouble your Lordship than I do almost every day, when my good fortune allows me the comfort and advantages of your conversation. The former impressions of these books being spent, and the world being willing enough to receive more of them, it was thought fit to draw into one volume* all these lesser books, which at several times were made public, and which, by some collateral improvements they were to receive now from me, might do some more advantages to one another, and better struggle with such prejudices, with which any of them hath been at any time troubled. For, though I have great reason to adore the goodness of God, in giving that success to my labours, that I am also obliged to the kindness of men for their friendly acceptance of them; yet when a persecution did arise against the church of England, and that I intended to make a defensative for my brethren and myself, by pleading for a liberty to our consciences to persevere in that profession, which was warranted by all the laws of God and our superiors, some men were angry and would not be safe that way, because I had made the roof of the sanctuary so wide that more might be sheltered under it than they had a mind should be saved harmless: men would be safe alone, or not at all, supposing that their truth and good cause was warranty enough to preserve itself; and they thought true; it was indeed warranty enough against persecution, if men had believed it to be truth; but because we were fallen under the power of our worst enemies, (for brethren turned enemies are ever the most implacable,) they looked upon us as men in mispersuasion and error; and therefore I was to defend our persons, that whether our cause were right or wrong, (for it would be supposed wrong,) yet we might be permitted in liberty and impunity. But then the consequent would be this: that if we, when we were supposed to be in error, were yet to be indemnified, then others also, whom we thought as ill of, were to rejoice in the same freedom, because this equality is the great instrument of justice; and if we would not do to others as we desired should be done to us, we were no more to pretend religion, because we destroy the law and the prophets. Of this some men were impatient; and they would have all the world spare them, and yet they would spare nobody. But because this is too unreasonable, I need no excuse for my speaking to other purposes. Others complained that it would have evil effects, and all heresies would enter at the gate of toleration; and because I knew that they would crowd and throng in as far as they could, I placed such guards and restraints there as might keep out all unreasonable pretenders; allowing none to enter here that speak against the apostles' creed, or weakened the hands of government, or were enemies to good life.

But the most complained, that in my ways to persuade a toleration, I helped some men too far, and that I armed the anabaptists with swords instead of shields, with a power to offend us, besides the proper defensatives of their own. To this I shall need no reply but this; I was to say what I could to make their persons safe, by showing how probably they were deceived; and they who thought it too much, had either too little confidence, or too little knowledge of the goodness of their own cause; and yet if any one made ill use of it, it was more than I allowed or intended to him, but so all kindness may be abused: but if a criminal be allowed counsel, he would be scorned if he should avow his advocate as a real patron of his crime, when he only says what he can to alleviate the sentence. But wise men understand the thing and are satisfied; but because all men are not of equal strength; I did not only in a discourse on purpose demonstrate the true doctrine in that question, but I have now in this edition of that book answered all their pretensions, not only fearing lest some be hurt with their offensive arms, but lest others, like Tarpeia the Roman lady, be oppressed with shields, and be brought to think well of their cause by my pleading for their persons.

And now (my Lord) I have done all that I can do, or can be desired, only I cannot repent me of speaking truth, or doing charity; but when the loins of the presbytery did lie heavy upon us, and were like to crush us into flatness and death, I ought not to have been reproached for standing under the ruin, and endeavouring to defend my brethren; and if I had strained his arm whom I was lifting up from drowning, he should have deplored his own necessity and not have reproved my charity, if I say I had been too zealous to preserve them whom I ought to love so zealously.

But I have been told, that my Discourse of Episcopacy, relying so much upon the authority of fathers and councils, whose authority I so much diminish in my Liberty of Prophesying, I seem to pull down with one hand what I build with the other: to these men I am used to answer, that they ought not to wonder to see a man pull down his out-houses, to save his father and his children from the flames; and, therefore, if I had wholly destroyed the topic of ecclesiastical antiquity, which is but an outward guard to episcopacy to preserve the whole ecclesiastical order; I might have been too zealous, but in no other account culpable: but, my Lord, I have done nothing of this as they mistake

* This and similar expressions refer to the original folio edition.

For episcopacy relies, not upon the authority of fathers and councils, but upon Scripture, upon the institution of Christ, or the institution of the apostles, upon a universal tradition, and a universal practice, not upon the words and opinions of the doctors: it hath as great a testimony as Scripture itself hath; and it is such a government, as although every thing in antiquity does minister to it, and illustrate or confirm it; yet, since it was before the fathers and councils, and was in full power before they had a being, and they were made up of bishops for the most part, they can give no authority to themselves, as a body does not beget itself, or give strength to that from whence themselves had warranty, integrity, and constitution. We bring the sayings of the fathers in behalf of episcopacy, because the reputation they have justly purchased from posterity, prevails with some, and their reason with others, and their practice with very many; and the pretensions of the adversaries are too weak to withstand that strength; but that episcopacy derives from a higher fountain, appears by the justification of it against them who value not what the fathers say. But now, he that says that episcopacy, besides all its own proper grounds, hath also the witness of antiquity, to have descended from Christ and his apostles; and he that says, that, in questions of religion, the sayings of the fathers alone is no demonstration of faith, does not speak things contradictory. He that says that we may dissent from the fathers, when we have a reason greater than that authority, does no way oppose him that says, you ought not to dissent from what they say, when you have no reason great enough to outweigh it. He that says the words of the fathers are not sufficient to determine a nice question, stands not against him, who says they are excellent corroboratives in a question already determined and practised accordingly. He that says, the sayings of fathers are no demonstration in a question, may say true; and yet he that says, it is a degree of probability, may say true too. He that says they are not our masters, speaks consonantly to the words of Christ; but he that denies them to be good instructors, does not speak agreeably to reason or to the sense of the church. Sometimes they are excellent arbitrators, but not always good judges: in matters of fact they are excellent witnesses; in matters of right or question they are rare doctors, and because they bring good arguments, are to be valued accordingly; and he that considers these things, will find that ecclesiastical antiquity can give very great assistances to episcopal government, and yet be no warranty for tyrannical: and although even the sayings of the fathers is greater warranty for episcopacy, and weighs more than all that can be said against it; yet, from thence nothing can be drawn to warrant to any man an empire over consciences; and, therefore, as the probability of it can be used to one effect, so the fallibility of it is also of use to another; but yet even of this no man is to make any use in general, but when he hath a necessity and a greater reason in the particular; and I, therefore, have joined these two books in one volume, because they differ not at all in the design, nor in the real purposes, to which, by their variety, they minister.

I will not pretend to any special reason of the inserting any of the other books into this volume; it is the design of my bookseller to bring all that he can into a like volume; excepting only some books of devotion, which, in a lesser volume, are more fit for use. As for the Doctrine and Practice of Repentance, which, because I suppose it may so much contribute to the interest of a good life, and is of so great and so necessary consideration to every person that desires to be instructed in the way of godliness, and would assure his salvation by all means; I was willing to publish it first in the lesser volume, that men might not, by the increasing price of a larger, be hindered from doing themselves the greatest good to which I can minister; which I humbly suppose to be done, I am sure I intended to have done, in that book.

And now, my Lord, I humbly desire, that although the presenting this volume to your Lordship can neither promote that honour, which is and ought to be the greatest, and is, by the advantages of your worthiness, already made public, nor obtain to itself any security or defence from any injury, to which, without remedy, it must be exposed: yet if you please to expound it as a testimony of that great value I have for you, though this signification is too little for it, yet I shall be at ease awhile, till I can converse with your Lordship, by something more proportionable to those greatest regards which you have merited of mankind; but more especially of,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most affectionate Servant,

JER. TAYLOR.

TO THE

TRULY WORTHY AND MOST ACCOMPLISHED

SIR CHRISTOPHER HATTON,

KNIGHT OF THE HONOURABLE ORDER OF THE BATH.

Sir,

I am engaged in the defence of a great truth, and I would willingly find a shroud to cover myself from danger and calumny; and although the cause both is, and ought to be, defended by kings, yet my person must not go thither to sanctuary, unless it be to pay my devotion, and I have now no other left for my defence; I am robbed of that which once did bless me, and indeed still does, (but in another manner,) and I hope will do more; but those distillations of celestial dews are conveyed in channels not pervious to an eye of sense, and now-a-days we seldom look with other, be the object never so beauteous or alluring. You may then think, Sir, I am forced upon you; may that beg my pardon and excuse; but I should do an injury to your nobleness, if I should only make you a refuge for my need (pardon this truth); you are also of the fairest choice, not only for your love of learning, (for although that be eminent in you, yet it is not your eminence,) but for your duty to holy church, for your loyalty to his sacred majesty. These did prompt me, with the greatest confidence, to hope for your fair encouragement and assistance, in my pleadings for episcopacy, in which cause religion and majesty, the king and the church, are interested, as parties of mutual concernment.

There was an odd observation made long ago, and registered in the law, to make it authentic: "Laici sunt infensi clericis." Now the clergy pray, but fight not; and, therefore, if not specially protected by the king, "contra ecclesiam malignantium," they are made obnoxious to all the contumelies and injuries, which an envious multitude will inflict upon them. It was observed enough in King Edgar's time, "Quamvis decreta pontificum, et verba sacerdotum inconvulsis ligaminibus velut fundamenta montium fixa sunt, tamen plerumque tempestatibus, et turbinibus sæcularium rerum religio S. Matris Ecclesiæ maculis reproborum dissipatur ac rumpitur. Ideirco decrevimus nos," &c.[a] There was a sad example of it in King John's time. For when he threw the clergy from his protection, it is incredible what injuries, what affronts, what robberies, yea, what murders, were committed upon the bishops and priests of holy church; whom neither the sacredness of their persons, nor the laws of God, nor the terrors of conscience, nor fears of hell, nor church censures, nor the laws of hospitality, could protect from scorn, from blows, from slaughter. Now there being so near a tie as the necessity of their own preservation, in the midst of so apparent danger, it will tie the bishops' hearts and hands to the king, faster than all the ties of law-allegiance, (all the political ties, I mean,) all that are not precisely religious, and obligations in the court of conscience.

2. But the interest of the bishops is conjunct with the prosperity of the king, besides the interest of their own security; by the obligation of secular advantages. For they who have their livelihood from the king, and are in expectance of their fortune from him, are more likely to pay a tribute of exacter duty, than others whose fortunes are not in such immediate dependence on his majesty. Æneas Sylvius once gave a merry reason, why clerks advanced the pope above a council; viz. because the pope gave spiritual promotions, but the councils gave none. It is but the common expectation of gratitude, that a patron paramount shall be more assisted by his beneficiaries in cases of necessity, than by those who receive nothing from him but the common influences of government.

3. But the bishops' duty to the king derives itself from a higher fountain. For it is one of the main excellencies in christianity, that it advances the state, and well-being of monarchies and bodies politic. Now, then, the fathers of religion, the reverend bishops, whose peculiar office it is to promote the interests of christianity, are, by the nature and essential requisites of their office, bound to promote the honour and dignity of kings, whom christianity would have so much honoured, as to establish the just subordination of people to their prince, upon better principles than ever; no less than their precise duty to God, and the hopes of a blissful immortality. Here, then, is "utile, honestum," and "necessarium," to tie bishops in duty to kings; and a threefold cord is not easily broken.

In pursuance of these obligations, episcopacy pays three returns of tribute to monarchy.

1. The first is the duty of their people. For they being, by God himself, set over souls, judges of the most secret recesses of our consciences, and the venerable priests under them, have more power to keep men in their duteous subordination to the prince, than there is in any secular power; by how much more forcible the impressions of the conscience are, than all the external violence in the world. And this power they have fairly put into act: for there was never any protestant bishop yet in rebellion, unless he turned recreant to his order: and it is the honour of the church of England, that all her children and obedient people are full of indignation against rebels, be they of any interest or party whatsoever. For here (and for it we thank God and good princes) episcopacy hath been preserved in fair privileges and honour; and God hath blessed and honoured episcopacy with the conjunction of a loyal people. As if because, in the law of nature, the kingdom and priesthood were joined in one person, it were natural and consonant to the first justice, that kings should defend the rights of the church, and the church advance the honour of kings. And when I consider that the first bishop that was exauctorated, was a prince too, prince and bishop of Geneva: methinks it was an ill omen, that the cause of the prince and the bishop should be in conjunction ever after.

2. A second return that episcopacy makes to royalty, is that which is the duty of all christians, the paying tributes and impositions. And though all the king's liege people do it, yet the issues of their duty and liberality are mightily disproportionate, if we consider their unequal number and revenues. And if clergy-subsidies be estimated according to the smallness of their revenue, and paucity of persons, it will not be half so short of the number and weight of crowns from lay-dispensation, as it does far exceed in the proportion of the donative.

3. But the assistance that the kings of England had in their councils and affairs of greatest difficulty, from the great ability of bishops, and other the ministers of the church, I desire to represent, in the words of King Alfred to Walfsigeus, the bishop, in an epistle, where he deplores the misery of his own age, by comparing it with the former times, when the bishops were learned, and exercised in public councils: "Felicia tum tempora fuerunt inter omnes Angliæ populos; reges Deo, et scriptæ ejus voluntati obsecundârunt in suâ pace, et bellicis expeditionibus, atque regimine domestico domi se semper tutati fuerint, atque etiam foris nobilitatem suam dilataverint." The reason was, as he insinuates before, "Sapientes exstiterunt in Anglicâ gente de spirituali gradu," &c. The bishops were able, by their great learning and wisdom, to give assistance to the king's affairs. And they have prospered in it: for the most glorious issues of Divine benison upon this kingdom were conveyed to us by bishops' hands: I mean the union of the houses of York and Lancaster, by the counsels of Bishop Morton,[b] and of England and Scotland, by the treaty of Bishop Fox;[c] to which if we add two other, "in materiâ religionis." I mean the conversion of the kingdom from paganism, by St. Augustin, archbishop of Canterbury: and the reformation, begun and promoted by bishops: I think we cannot call to mind four blessings equal to these in any age or kingdom, in all which God was pleased by the mediation of bishops, as he used to do, to bless the people. And this may not only be expected in reason, but in good divinity: for amongst the gifts of the Spirit, which God hath given to his church, are reckoned doctors, teachers, and helps in government.[d] To which may be added this advantage, that the services of churchmen are rewardable upon the church's stock: no need to disimprove the royal banks to pay thanks to the bishops.

But, Sir, I grow troublesome. Let this discourse have what ends it can; the use I make of it, is but to pretend reason for my boldness, and to entitle you to my book: for I am confident you will own any thing that is but a friend's friend to a cause of loyalty. I have nothing else to plead for your acceptance, but the confidence of your goodness, and that I am a person capable of your pardon, and of a fair interpretation of my address to you, by being,

SIR,

Your most affectionate Servant,

JER. TAYLOR.

OF THE

SACRED ORDER AND OFFICES OF EPISCOPACY.

IN all those accursed machinations, which the device and artifice of hell hath invented for the supplanting of the church, "inimicus homo," that old superseminator of heresies and crude mischiefs, hath endeavoured to be curiously compendious, and, with Tarquin's device, "putare summa papaverum." And, therefore, in the three ages of martyrs, it was a ruled case in that Burgundian forge, "Qui prior erat dignitate, prior trahebatur ad martyrium." The priests, but, to be sure the bishops, must pay for all, "Tolle impios, Polycarpus requiratur." Away with these peddling persecutions; ἀξίνην πρὸς τὴν ῥίζαν· "lay the axe at the root of the tree." Insomuch that in Rome, from St. Peter and St. Paul to St. Sylvester, thirty-three bishops of Rome, in immediate succession, suffered an honourable and glorious martyrdom, unless Meltiades[a] be perhaps excepted, whom Eusebius and Optatus report to have lived all the time of the third consulship of Constantine and Lucinius. "Conteret caput ejus," was the glorious promise, Christ should "break the devil's head;" and though the devil's active part in the duel was far less, yet he would venture at that too, even to strike at the heads of the church, "capita vicaria," for "the head of all" was past his striking now; and this I say he offered to do by martyrdom, but that, instead of breaking, crowned them.

His next onset was by Julian, and "occidere presbyterium," that was his province. To shut up public schools, to force christians to ignorance, to impoverish and disgrace the clergy, to make them vile and dishonourable, these are his arts; and he did the devil more service in this fineness of undermining, than all the open battery of the ten great rams of persecution. But this would not take. For, "that which is without, cannot defile a man." So it is in the church too. "Cedunt in bonum" all violences "ab extra."

But, therefore, besides these, he attempted by heresies to rend the church's bowels all in pieces; but the good bishops gathered up the scattered pieces, and re-united them at Nice, at Constantinople, at Ephesus, at Chalcedon, at Carthage, at Rome, and in every famous place of christendom; and by God's goodness, and the bishops' industry, catholic religion was conserved in unity and integrity. Well; however it is, antichrist must come at last, and the great apostasy foretold must be, and this not without means proportionable to the production of so great declensions of christianity. "When ye hear of wars, and rumours of wars, be not afraid," said our blessed Saviour, "the end is not yet." It is not war that will do "this great work of destruction," for then it might have been done long ere now. What then will do? We shall know when we see it. In the mean time, when we shall find a new device, of which indeed the platform was laid, in Aerius and the Acephali, brought to a good possibility of completing a thing, that whosoever shall hear, his ears shall tingle, "an abomination of desolation standing where it ought not," "in sacris," in holy persons, and places, and offices,—it is too probable that this is the preparatory for the antichrist and grand apostasy.

For if antichrist shall exalt himself above all that is called God, and in Scripture none but kings and priests are such, "dii vocati, dii facti," I think we have great reason to be suspicious, that he that divests both of their power, (and they are, if the king be christian, in very near conjunction,) does the work of antichrist for him; especially if the men, whom it most concerns, will but call to mind, that the discipline or government which Christ hath instituted, is that kingdom by which he governs all christendom (so themselves have taught us); so that, in case it be proved that episcopacy is that government, then they (to use their own expressions) throw Christ out of his kingdom; and then either they leave the church without a head, or else put antichrist in substitution.

[a] "Maximini jussu martyrio coronatur," saith Platina; but that is wholly uncertain.

We all wish, that our fears in this and all things else may be vain, that what we fear may not come upon us; but yet that the abolition of episcopacy is the forerunner, and preparatory to the great apostasy, I have these reasons to show at least the probability. First, because here is a concourse of times; for now, after that these times have been called the last times for 1600 years together, our expectation of the great revelation is very near accomplishing; and what a grand innovation of ecclesiastical government contrary to the faith and practice of christendom, may portend now in these times, when we all expect antichrist to be revealed, is worthy of a jealous man's inquiry. Secondly: episcopacy, if we consider the final cause, was instituted as an obstructive to the diffusion of schism and heresy. So St. Jerome,[b] "In toto orbe decretum est, ut unus de presbyteris electus superponeretur cæteris, ut schismatum semina tollerentur." And therefore if unity and division be destructive of each other, then episcopacy is the best deletery in the world for schism: and so much the rather because they are "in eâdem materiâ:" for schism is a division for things either personal or accidental, which are matters most properly the subject of government, and there to be tried, there to receive their first and last breath, except where they are starved to death by a desuetude; and episcopacy is a unity of person-governing, and ordering persons and things, accidental and substantial: and therefore a direct confronting of schism, not only in the intention of the author of it, but in the nature of the institution. Now then, although schisms always will be, and this by Divine prediction; (which clearly shows the necessity of perpetual episcopacy, and the intention of its perpetuity, either by Christ himself ordaining it, who made the prophecy, or by the apostles and apostolic men at least, who knew the prophecy;) yet, to be sure, these divisions and dangers shall be greater about and at the time of the great apostasy; for then, were not the hours turned into minutes, a universal ruin should seize all christendom: "No flesh should be saved, if those days were not shortened." Is it not next to an evidence of fact, that this multiplication of schisms must be "removendo prohibens?" and therefore that must be by invalidating episcopacy, ordained as the remedy and obex of schism, either tying their hands behind them, by taking away their coercion, or by putting out their eyes, by denying them cognizance of causes spiritual, or by cutting off their heads, and so destroying their order. How far these will lead us, I leave to be considered. This only: "Percute pastores, atque oves dispergentur;" and I believe it will be verified at the coming of that wicked one; "I saw all Israel scattered upon the mountains, as sheep having no shepherd."

I am not new in this conception, I learned it of St. Cyprian: "Christi adversarius, et ecclesiæ ejus inimicus ad hoc, ecclesiæ præpositum suâ infestatione persequitur, ut gubernatore sublato, atrocius, atque violentius circa ecclesiæ naufragia grassetur:"[c] "The adversary of Christ, and enemy of his spouse, therefore perscecutes the bishop, that having taken him away, he may, without check, pride himself in the ruins of the church." And a little after, speaking of them that are enemies to bishops, he says, that "Antichristi jam propinquantis adventum imitantur:" "Their deportment is just after the guise of antichrist, who is shortly to be revealed."

But be this conjecture vain or not, the thing of itself is of deep consideration; and the catholic practice of christendom for 1500 years is so insupportable a prejudice against the enemies of episcopacy, that they must bring admirable evidence of Scripture, or a clear revelation proved by miracles, or a contrary undoubted tradition apostolical for themselves, or else hope for no belief against the prescribed possession of so many ages.

But before I begin, methinks in this contestation, "ubi potior est conditio possidentis," it is a considerable question; what will the adversaries stake against? For if episcopacy cannot make its title good, they lose the benefit of their prescribed possession. If it can; I fear they will scarce gain so much as the obedience of the adverse party by it, which yet already is their due. It is very unequal; but so it is ever, when authority is the matter of the question. Authority never gains by it; for although the cause go on its side, yet it loses costs and damages: for it must either by fair condescension to gain the adversaries, lose something of itself, or, if it asserts itself to the utmost, it is but that seldom or never happens; for the very questioning of any authority, hoc ipso, makes a great intrenchment even to the very skirts of its clothing.

But "huc deventum est." Now we are in, we must go over.

SECTION I.

Christ did institute a Government in his Church.

First, then, that we may build upon a rock. Christ did institute a government to order and rule his church by his authority, according to his laws, and by the assistance of the blessed Spirit.

1. If this were not true, how shall the church be governed? For I hope the adversaries of episcopacy, that are so punctual to pitch all upon Scripture ground, will be sure to produce clear Scripture for so main a part of christianity, as is the form of the government of Christ's church. And if for our private actions, and duties economical, they will pretend a text, I suppose it will not be thought possible Scripture should make default in assignation of the public government, insomuch as all laws intend the public, and the general directly; the private, and the particular, by consequence only and comprehension within the general.

2. If Christ himself did not take order for a government, then we must derive it from human prudence and emergency of conveniences, and concourse of new circumstances, and then the government must often be changed, or else time must stand still, and things be ever in the same state and possibility. Both the consequents are extremely full of inconvenience. For if it be left to human prudence, then either the government of the church is not in immediate order to the good and benison of souls, or if it be, that such an institution, in such immediate order to eternity, should be dependent upon human prudence, it were to trust such a rich commodity in a cock-boat, that no wise pilot will be supposed to do. But if there be often changes in government ecclesiastical, (which was the other consequent,) in the public frame I mean, and constitution of it; either the certain infinity of schisms will arise, or the dangerous issues of public inconsistency and innovation, which in matters of religion is good for nothing, but to make men distrust all; and come the best that can come, there will be so many church-governments as there are human prudences. For so (if I be not misinformed[a]) it is abroad in some towns that have discharged episcopacy. As St. Galles, in Switzerland; there the ministers and laymen rule in common, but a layman is president. But the consistories of Zurick and Bazil are wholly consistent of laymen, and ministers are joined as assistants only, and counsellors; but at Schaffhausen the ministers are not admitted to so much, but in the Huguenot churches of France the ministers do all.

3. In such cases, where there is no power of the sword for a compulsory, (and confessedly of all sides there can be none in causes and courts ecclesiastical,) if there be no opinion of religion, no derivation from a Divine authority, there will be sure to be no obedience, and indeed nothing but a certain public, calamitous irregularity. For why should they obey? Not for conscience, for there is no derivation from Divine authority; not for fear, for they have not the power of the sword.

4. If there be such a thing as the power of the keys, by Christ concredited to his church, for the binding and loosing delinquents and penitents respectively on earth, then there is clearly a court erected by Christ in his church; for here is the delegation of judges, "Tu Petrus, vos apostoli:" whatsoever ye shall bind; here is a compulsory, "ligaveritis:" here are the causes of which they take cognizance, "quodcunque;" viz. "in materiâ scandali." For so it is limited Matt. xviii., but it is indefinite Matt. xvi., and universal John xx., which yet is to be understood, "secundum materiam subjectam," in causes which are emergent from christianity, "ut sic," that secular jurisdictions may not be intrenched upon. But of this hereafter. That Christ did in this place erect a jurisdiction, and establish a government, (besides the evidence of fact,) is generally asserted by primitive exposition of the fathers, affirming, that to St. Peter the keys were given, that to the church of all ages a power of binding and loosing might be communicated. "Has igitur claves dedit ecclesiæ, ut quæ solveret in terrâ, soluta essent in cœlo; scil. ut quisquis in ecclesiâ ejus dimitti sibi peccata crederet, seque ab iis correctus averteret, in ejusdem ecclesiæ gremio constitutus eâdem fide atque correctione sanaretur." So St. Austin.[b] And again, "Omnibus igitur sanctis ad Christi corpus inseparabiliter pertinentibus, propter hujus vitæ procellosissimæ gubernaculum, ad liganda et solvenda peccata claves regni cœlorum primus apostolorum Petrus accepit; quoniam nec ille solus, sed universa ecclesia ligat, solvitque peccata:" "St. Peter first received the government in the power of binding and loosing: but not he alone, but all the church," to wit, all succession and ages of the church. "Universa ecclesia," viz. "in pastoribus solis," as St. Chrysostom;[c] "In episcopis et presbyteris," as St. Jerome;[d] the whole church, as it is represented "in the bishops and presbyters." The same is affirmed by Tertullian,[e] St. Cyprian,[f] St. Chrysostom,[g] St. Hilary,[h] Primasius,[i] and generally by the fathers of the elder, and divines of the middle ages.

5. When our blessed Saviour had spoken a parable of the sudden coming of the Son of man, and commanded them therefore with diligence to stand upon their watch, the disciples asked him, "Speakest thou this parable to us, or even to all? And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward, whom his Lord shall make ruler over his household to give them their portion of meat in due season?"[k] As if he had said, "I speak to you; for to whom else should I speak, and give caution for the looking to the house in the master's absence? You are by office and designation my stewards, to feed my servants, to govern my house."

6. In Scripture, and other writers, "to feed," and "to govern," is all one, when the office is either political, or economical, or ecclesiastical. "So he fed them with a faithful and true heart, and ruled them prudently with all his power."[l] And St. Peter joins ἐπισκοποῦντες and ποιμαίνοντες together, ποιμάνατε τὸ ἐν ὑμῖν ποίμνιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἐπισκοποῦντες.[m] So does St. Paul, προσέχετε οὖν ἑαυτοῖς καὶ πάντι τῷ ποιμνίῳ, ἐν ᾧ ὑμᾶς τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον ἔθετο Ἐπισκόπους."[n]—Ἐπισκόπους ἐν ποιμνίῳ, Rulers or "Overseers in a flock;" Pastors. It is ordinary. Ποιμένα λαῶν, Homer; i. e. βασιλέα ὄχλων. Euripides calls the governors and guides of chariots, ποιμένας ὄχων. And our blessed Saviour himself is called the "great Shepherd of our souls;" and that we may know the intentum of that compellation, it is in conjunction also with Ἐπίσκοπος. He is, therefore, our Shepherd, for he is our Bishop, our Ruler, and Overseer. Since, then, Christ hath left pastors or feeders in his church, it is also as certain he hath left rulers, they being both one in name, in person, in office. But this is of a known truth to all that understand either law or languages: οἱ δὲ ποιμαίνοντες ἀρχόντων καὶ ἡγεμόνων ἔχοντες δύναμιν, saith Philo;[o] "They that feed have the power of princes and rulers:" the thing is an undoubted truth to most men; but because all are not of a mind, something was necessary for confirmation of it.

SECTION II.

This Government was first committed to the Apostles by Christ.

This government was, by immediate substitution, delegated to the apostles by Christ himself, "in traditione clavium, in spiratione Spiritûs, in missione in Pentecoste." When Christ promised them the "keys," he promised them "power to bind and loose;" when he breathed on them the Holy Ghost, he gave them that actually, to which, by the former promise, they were entitled; and in the octaves of the passion, he gave them the same authority which he had received from his Father, and they were the "faithful and wise stewards, whom the Lord made rulers over his household." But I shall not labour much upon this.[a] Their founding all the churches from east to west, and so, by being fathers, derived their authority from the nature of the thing; their appointing rulers in every church; their synodal decrees "de suffocato et sanguine," and letters missive to the churches of Syria and Cilicia; their excommunications of Hymeneus and Alexander, and the incestuous Corinthian; their commanding and requiring obedience of their people in all things, as St. Paul did of his subjects of Corinth, and the Hebrews, by precept apostolical; their threatening the pastoral rod; their calling synods and public assemblies; their ordering rites and ceremonies; composing a symbol as the tessera of christianity; their public reprehension of delinquents, and, indeed, the whole execution of their apostolate, is one continued argument of their superintendency, and superiority of jurisdiction.

SECTION III.

With a Power of joining others, and appointing Successors in the Apostolate.

This power, so delegated, was not to expire with their persons; for when the great Shepherd had reduced his wandering sheep into a fold, he would not leave them without "guides to govern" them, so long as the wolf might possibly prey upon them, and that is, till the last separation of the sheep from the goats. And this Christ intimates in that promise, "Ero vobiscum (apostolis) usque ad consummationem seculi." "Vobiscum;" not with your persons, for they died long ago; but "vobiscum et vestri similibus," with apostles to the end of the world. And, therefore, that the apostolate might be successive and perpetual, Christ gave them a power of ordination, that, by imposing hands on others, they might impart that power which they received from Christ. For in the apostles there was something extraordinary, something ordinary. Whatsoever was extraordinary, as "immediate mission, unlimited jurisdiction, and miraculous operations," that was not necessary to the perpetual regiment of the church, for then the church should fail, when these privileges extraordinary did cease. It was not, therefore, in extraordinary powers and privileges that Christ promised his perpetual assistance; not in speaking of tongues, not in doing miracles, whether "in materiâ censuræ," as delivering to Satan; or "in materiâ misericordiæ," as healing sick people; or "in re naturali," as in resisting the venom of vipers, and quenching the violence of flames; in these Christ did not promise perpetual assistance, for then it had been done, and still these signs should have followed them that believe. But we see they do not. It follows, then, that in all the ordinary parts of power and office, Christ did promise to be with them to the end of the world, and, therefore, there must remain a power of giving faculty and capacity to persons successively, for the execution of that, in which Christ promised perpetual assistance. For since this perpetual assistance could not be meant of abiding with their persons, who, in few years, were to forsake the world, it must needs be understood of their function, which either it must be succeeded to, or else it was as temporary as their persons. But, in the extraordinary privileges of the apostles, they had no successors; therefore, of necessity, must be constituted in the ordinary office of apostolate. Now what is this ordinary office? Most certainly since the extraordinary, as is evident, was only a help for the founding and beginning, the other are such as are necessary for the perpetuating of a church. Now, in clear evidence of sense, these offices and powers are "preaching, baptizing, consecrating, ordaining, and governing." For these were necessary for the perpetuating of a church, unless men could be christians that were never christened, nourished up to life without the eucharist, become priests without calling of God and ordination, have their sins pardoned without absolution, be members, and parts, and sons of a church, whereof there is no coadunation, no authority, no governor. These the apostles had without all question; and whatsoever they had they had from Christ, and these were eternally necessary; these, then, were the offices of the apostolate, which Christ promised to assist for ever, and this is that which we now call the order and office of episcopacy.

SECTION IV.

The Succession into the ordinary Office of Apostolate is made by Bishops.

FOR although deacons and priests have part of these offices, and therefore, though in a very limited sense, they may be called "successores apostolorum," to wit, in the power of baptizing, consecrating the eucharist, and preaching; (an excellent example whereof, though we have none in Scripture, yet, if I mistake him not, we have in Ignatius, calling the college of presbyters σύνδεσμον Ἀποστόλων, "a combination of apostles;") yet the apostolate and episcopacy, which did communicate in all the power and offices which are ordinary and perpetual, are, in Scripture, clearly all one in ordinary ministration, and their names are often used in common, to signify exactly the same ordinary function.

1. The name was borrowed from the prophet David, in the prediction of the apostasy of Judas, and surrogation of St. Matthias; Καὶ τὴν Ἐπισκοπὴν αὐτοῦ λάβοι ἕτερος· "His bishopric," that is, his apostolate,[a] "let another take." The same word, according to the translation of the Seventy, is used by the prophet Isaiah, in an evangelical prediction, Καὶ δώσω τοὺς ἄρχοντάς σου ἐν εἰρήνῃ, καὶ τοὺς Ἐπισκόπους σοῦ ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ· "I will give thy princes in peace, and thy bishops in righteousness."— "Principes ecclesiæ vocat futuros episcopos," saith St. Jerome,[b] herein admiring God's majesty in the destination of such ministers, whom himself calls princes. And to this issue it is cited by St. Clement, in his famous epistle to the Corinthians. But this is no way unusual in Scripture: for,

2. St. James, the brother of our Lord, is called "an apostle," and yet he was not in the number of the twelve, but he was bishop of Jerusalem. First: That St. James was called "an apostle" appears by the testimony of St. Paul: "But other apostles saw I none, save James, the Lord's brother."[c] Secondly: That he was none of the twelve appears also, because among the twelve apostles there were but two Jameses, the son of Alpheus, and James, the son of Zebedee, the brother of John. But neither of these was the James whom St. Paul calls "the Lord's brother." And this St. Paul intimates, in making a distinct enumeration of all the appearances which Christ made after the resurrection:[d] "First to Cephas, then to the twelve, then to the five hundred brethren, then to James, then to all the apostles." So that here St. James is reckoned distinctly from the twelve, and they from the whole college of the apostles; for there were, it seems, more of that dignity than the twelve. But this will also safely rely upon the concurrent testimony of Hegesippus, Clement, Eusebius, Epiphanius, St. Ambrose, and St. Jerome.[e] Thirdly: That St. James was bishop of Jerusalem, and therefore called "an apostle," appears by the often commemoration of his presidency, and singular eminency in Holy Scripture. Priority of order is mentioned, Gal. ii. even before St. Peter, who yet was "primus apostolorum, naturâ unus homo, gratiâ unus Christianus, abundantiore gratiâ unus idemque primus apostolus," as St. Augustin; yet in his own diocess, St. James had priority of order before him, verse 9. And then, 1. James, 2. Cephas, and, 3. John, &c. First, James before Cephas and St. Peter. St. James, also, was president of that synod, which the apostles convocated at Jerusalem about the question of circumcision; as is to be seen, Acts xv.;[f] to him St. Paul made his address, Acts xxi.; to him the brethren carried him, where he was found sitting in his college of presbyters, there he was always resident, and his seat fixed; and that he lived bishop of Jerusalem for many years together, is clearly testified by all the faith of the primitive fathers and historians. But of this hereafter.

3. Epaphroditus is called "the apostle of the Philippians."[g] "I have sent unto you Epaphroditus," σύνεργὸν καὶ συστρατιώτην μου, ὑμῶν δὲ ἀπόστολον, "my compeer and your apostle." "Gradum apostolatus recepit Epaphroditus," saith Primasius; and what that is, we are told by Theodoret; "dictus Philippensium apostolus à S. Paulo, quid hoc aliud nisi episcopus?" "Because he also had received the office of being an apostle among them," saith St. Jerome upon the same place; and it is very observable, that those apostles to whom our blessed Saviour gave immediate substitution, are called ἀπόστολοι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, "apostles of Jesus Christ;" but those other men, which were bishops of churches, and called apostles by Scripture, are called ἀπόστολοι Ἐκκλησιῶν, "apostles of churches," or sometimes "apostles" alone, but never are entitled "of Jesus Christ." "Other of the apostles saw I none, but James, the Lord's brother," Gal. i. There St. James, the bishop of Jerusalem, is called an "apostle" indefinitely. But St. Paul calls himself often "the apostle of Jesus Christ, not of man, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ." So Peter, an "apostle of Jesus Christ;" but St. James, in his epistle to the Jews of the dispersion, writes not himself "the apostle of Jesus Christ," but δοῦλος Θεοῦ καὶ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, "James, the servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ."

Further yet: St. Paul, although as having an immediate calling from Christ to the office of apostolate, at large calls himself the apostle of Jesus Christ; yet when he was sent to preach to the gentiles, by the particular direction indeed of the Holy Ghost, but by human constitution, and imposition of hands;[h] in relation to that part of his office, and his cure of the uncircumcision, he limits his apostolate to his diocess, and calls himself, Ἀπόστολον ἐθνῶν, "the apostle of the gentiles;"[i] as St. Peter, for the same reason, and in the same modification, is called Ἀπόστολος περιτομῆς, that is, "the apostle of those who were of the circumcision."[k] And thus Epaphroditus is called "the apostle of the Philippians," who clearly was their bishop, (as I shall show in the sequel,) that is, he had an apostolate limited to the diocess of Philippi. "Paulatim verò tempore procedente, et alii ab his quos Dominus elegerat, ordinati sunt apostoli, sicut ille ad Philippenses sermo declarat, dicens, Necessarium autem existimo Epaphroditum," &c., so St. Jerome;[l] "In process of time, others, besides those whom the Lord had chosen, were ordained apostles:" and particularly he instances in Epaphroditus, from the authority of this instance, adding also, that by the apostles themselves, Judas and Silas were called "apostles."

4. Thus Titus, and some other with him, who came to Jerusalem with the Corinthian benevolence, are called Ἀπόστολοι Ἐκκλησιῶν, "the apostles of the churches:"[m] apostles, I say, in the episcopal sense. They were none of the twelve, they were not of immediate Divine mission, but of apostolic ordination; they were actually bishops, as I shall show hereafter. Titus was bishop of Crete, and Epaphroditus of Philippi; and these were the apostles; for Titus came with the Corinthian, Epaphroditus with the Colossian liberality. Now these men were not Ἀπόστολοι, called "messengers" in respect of these churches sending them with their contributions. 1. Because they are not called the "apostles of these churches," to wit, whose alms they carried, but simply Ἐκκλησιῶν, "of the churches," viz. of their own, of which they were bishops. For if the title of apostle had related to their mission from these churches, it is unimaginable that there should be no term of relation expressed. 2. It is very clear that, although they did indeed carry the benevolence of the several churches, yet St. Paul, not those churches, sent them; "And we have sent with them our brother,"[n] &c. 3. They we called "apostles of the churches," not going from Corinth with the money, but before they came thither, from whence they were to be despatched in legation to Jerusalem: "If any inquire of Titus, or the brethren, they are the apostles of the church, and the glory of Christ."[o] So they were "apostles" before they went to Corinth, not for their being employed in the transportation of their charity. So that it is plain, that their apostolate being not relative to the churches, whose benevolence they carried, and they having churches of their own, as Titus had Crete, Epaphroditus had Philippi, their apostolate was a fixed residence, and superintendency of their several churches.

SECTION V.

And Office.

BUT in Holy Scripture, the identity of the ordinary office of apostleship and episcopacy is clearer yet. For when the Holy Spirit had sent seven letters to the seven Asian bishops, the angel of the church of Ephesus is commended for trying them, which say they are apostles, and are not, and hath found them liars.[a] This angel of the church of Ephesus, as antiquity hath taught us, was at that time Timothy, or Gaius;[b] the first a disciple, the other had been an entertainer of the apostles, and either of them knew them well enough: it could not be, that any man should dissemble their persons, and counterfeit himself St. Paul or St. Peter. And if they had, yet little trying was needful to discover their folly in such a case; and whether it was Timothy or Gaius, he could deserve but small commendations for the mere believing of his own eyes and memory. Besides, the apostles, except St. John, all were then dead, and he known to live in Patmos; known by the public attestation of the sentence of relegation "ad insulam." These men, therefore, dissembling themselves to be apostles, must dissemble an ordinary function, not an extraordinary person. And, indeed, by the concourse of story, place, and time, Diotrephes was the man St. John chiefly pointed at. For he, seeing that at Ephesus there had been an episcopal chair placed, and Timothy a long while possessed of it, and perhaps Gaius after him,[c] if we may trust Dorotheus, and the like in some other churches; and that St. John had not constituted bishops in all other churches of the lesser Asia, but kept the jurisdiction to be ministered by himself, would arrogantly take upon him to be a bishop without apostolical ordination, obtruding himself upon the church of Ephesus; so becoming ἀλλοτριο-επίσκοπος, "a busy man in another's diocess." This, and such impostors as this, the angel of the church of Ephesus did try, and discover, and convict; and in it he was assisted by St. John himself, as is intimated in St. John's third epistle, written to his Gaius, (ver. 9.) "I wrote unto the church," to wit, of Asia, "but Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them, receiveth us not." Clearly this ψευδο-απόστολος would have been a bishop. It was a matter of ambition, a quarrel for superintendence and pre-eminence, that troubled him; and this also appears further, in that he exercised jurisdiction and excommunication, where he had nothing to do; (ver. 10.) "He forbids them that would receive the brethren, and casteth them out of the church." So that here it is clear, this false apostolate was his ambitious seeking of episcopal pre-eminence and jurisdiction, without lawful ordination. Φιλοπρωτεύων Διοτρεφὴς, that was his design; he loved to be the first in the church, "esse apostolum, esse episcopum;" "to be an apostle, or a bishop."

SECTION VI.

Which Christ himself hath made distinct from Presbyters.

But this office of the ordinary apostleship or episcopacy, derives its fountain from a rock; Christ's own distinguishing the apostolate from the function of presbyters. For when our blessed Saviour had gathered many disciples, who believed him at his first preaching, "Vocavit discipulos suos, et elegit duodecim ex ipsis quos et apostolos nominavit,"[a] saith St. Luke: "He called his disciples and out of them chose twelve, and called them apostles." That was the first election. "Post hæc autem designavit Dominus et alios septuaginta-duos." That was his second election; the first were called "apostles," the second were not, and yet he sent them by two and two.

We hear but of one commission granted them, which when they had performed, and returned joyful at their power over devils, we hear no more of them in the gospel, but that their names were written in heaven. We are likely, therefore, to hear of them after the passion, if they can but hold their own. And so we do. For after the passion, the apostles gathered them together, and joined them in clerical commission, by virtue of Christ's first ordination of them; for a new ordination we find none in Holy Scripture recorded, before we find them doing clerical offices. Ananias, we read, baptizing of Saul: Philip, the evangelist, we find preaching in Samaria, and baptizing his converts; others also, we find, presbyters at Jerusalem, especially at the first council; for there was Judas, surnamed Justus; and Silas, and St. Mark; and John, (a presbyter, not an apostle, as Eusebius reports him,[b]) and Simeon Cleophas, who tarried there till he was made bishop of Jerusalem. These, and divers others, are reckoned to be of the number of the seventy-two, by Eusebius and Dorotheus.

Here are plainly two offices of ecclesiastical ministries, apostles and presbyters; so the Scripture calls them. These were distinct, and not temporary, but succeeded to; and if so, then here is clearly a Divine institution of two orders, and yet deacons neither of them. Here let us fix awhile.

SECTION VII.

Giving to Apostles a Power to do some Offices perpetually necessary, which to others he gave not.

Then, it is clear in Scripture, that the apostles did some acts of ministry, which were necessary to be done for ever in the church, and, therefore, to b committed to their successors; which acts th seventy disciples or presbyters could not do. 'Ε- κρίτως δὲ αὐτῇ παρὰ τὰς λοιπὰς τάξεις εἰς λειτουργία ὁ θεῖος θεσμὸς ἀπονενέμηκε τὰς θειοτέρας ἱερουργία saith St. Denis, of the highest order of the hie archy:[c] "The law of God hath reserved the greate and diviner offices to the highest order."

First: The apostles imposed hands in ordination which the seventy-two did not. The case is known Acts vi. The apostles called the disciples, willin them to choose seven men, whom they might con stitute in the ministration and oversight of the poo They did so, and set them before the twelve apos tles; so they are specified and numbered, verse 2 cum 6. "and when they had prayed, they laid thei hands on them." They, not the disciples, not th seventy-two, who were there actually present, an seven of them were then ordained to this ministry for they were not now ordained to be διάκονοι μι στηρίων, but τραπέζων, as the council of Constanti nople calls them;[d] and that these were the numbe of the seventy-two disciples, Epiphanius bears wit ness.[e] He sent other seventy-two to preach, ἐξ ὧ ἦσαν οἱ ἑπτὰ ἐπὶ τῶν χηρῶν τεταγμένοι, "of which number were those seven ordained and set over th widows." And the same is intimated by St. Chry sostom, if I understand him right; Ποῖον δὲ ἄρ ἀξίωμα εἶχον οὗτοι, καὶ ποίαν ἐδέξαντο χειροτονία ἀναγκαῖον μαθεῖν· ἆρα τὴν τῶν διακόνων; καὶ μὴ τοῦτο ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις οὐκ ἔστιν, ἀλλὰ τῶν πρεσ βυτέρων ἐστιν ἡ οἰκονομία.[f] What dignity ha these seven here ordained? Of deacons? No; fo this dispensation is made by priests, not deacons and Theophylact, more clearly repeating the word of St. Chrysostom, "pro more suo," adds this: Τῶ πρεσβυτέρων οἶμαι τὸ ὄνομα εἶναι, καὶ τὸ ἀξίωμ αὐτῶν· ἀλλὰ τέως εἰς τοῦτο διακονεῖν τοῖς πιστοῖς τ πρὸς τὴν χρείαν ἐχειροτονήθησαν.[g] The name an dignity of these seven was no less, but even th dignity of presbyters, only for the time they were appointed to dispense the goods of the church fo the good of the faithful people. Presbyters they were, say St. Chrysostom and Theophylact; of th number of the seventy-two, saith Epiphanius. But however, it is clear, that the seventy-two were pre sent; for the whole multitude of the disciples was as yet there resident; they were not yet sen abroad, they were not scattered with persecution till the martyrdom of St. Stephen; but the twelve called the whole multitude of the disciples to them about this affair (verse 2). But yet themselves only did ordain them.

Secondly: An instance parallel to this, is in the imposition of hands upon St. Paul and Barnabas, in the first ordination that was held at Antioch.[h] "Now there were in the church that were at Antioch, certain prophets and teachers; as Barnabas, and Simeon, and Lucius, and Manaen, and Saul. Λειτουργούντων δὲ αὐτῶν, while these men were ministering, the Holy Ghost said to them, Separate me Barnabas and Saul." They did so; they "fasted, they prayed, they laid their hands on them, and sent them away. So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed into Seleucia." This is the story; now let us make our best of it. Here, then, was the ordination and imposition of hands complete; and that was said to be done by the Holy Ghost, which was done by the prophets of Antioch. For they sent them away; and yet the next words are, "so they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost." So that here was the thing done, and that by the prophets alone, and that by the command of the Holy Ghost, and said to be his act. Well! but what were these prophets? They were prophets in the church of Antioch: not such as Agabus, and the daughters of Philip the evangelist, prophets of prediction extraordinary, but prophets of ordinary office and ministration; προφῆται, διδάσκαλοι, καὶ λειτουργοῦντες, "prophets, and teachers, and ministers."[i] More than ordinary ministers, for they were doctors or teachers; and that is not all, for they were prophets too. This, even at first sight, is more than the ordinary office of the presbytery. We shall see this clear enough in St. Paul,[k] where the ordinary office of prophets is reckoned before pastors, before evangelists, next to apostles; that is, next to such apostles, οὓς αὐτὸς ἔδωκε, as St. Paul there expresses it; next to those apostles to whom Christ hath given immediate mission. And these are, therefore, apostles too; apostles "secundi ordinis;" none of the twelve, but such as St. James, and Epaphroditus, and Barnabas, and St. Paul himself. To be sure they were such prophets as St. Paul and Barnabas; for they are reckoned in the number by St. Luke; for here it was that St. Paul, although he had immediate vocation by Christ, yet he had particular ordination to his apostolate or ministry of the gentiles. It is evident, then, what prophets these were; they were, at the least, more than ordinary presbyters, and, therefore, they imposed hands, and they only. And yet, to make the business up complete, St. Mark was amongst them, but he imposed no hands; he was there as the deacon and minister, (verse 5.) but he meddled not. St. Luke fixes the whole action upon the prophets, such as St. Paul himself was, and so did the Holy Ghost too; but neither did St. Mark, who was an evangelist and one of the seventy-two disciples, (as he is reckoned in the primitive catalogues by Eusebius and Dorotheus,) nor any of the college of the Antiochian presbyters, that were less than prophets, that is, who were not more than mere presbyters.

The sum is this: Imposition of hands is a duty and office necessary for the perpetuating of a church, "ne gens sit unius ætatis," "lest it expire in one age." This power of imposition of hands for ordination, was fixed upon the apostles and apostolic men, and not communicated to the seventy-two disciples or presbyters; for the apostles and apostolic men did so "de facto," and were commanded to do so, and the seventy-two never did so. Therefore this office and ministry of the apostolate is distinct, and superior to that of presbyters; and this distinction must be so continued to all ages of the church; for the thing was not temporary, but productive of issue and succession; and, therefore, as perpetual as the clergy, as the church itself.

SECTION VIII.

And Confirmation.

Secondly: The apostles did impose hands for confirmation of baptized people; and this was a perpetual act of a power to be succeeded to, and yet not communicated, nor executed by the seventy-two, or any other mere presbyter. That the apostles did confirm baptized people, and others of the inferior clergy could not, is, beyond all exception, clear, in the case of the Samaritan christians, Acts viii. For when St. Philip had converted and baptized the men of Samaria, the apostles sent Peter and John to lay their hands on them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost. St. Philip was an evangelist; he was one of the seventy-two disciples,[a] a presbyter, and appointed to the same ministration that St. Stephen was, about the poor widows; yet he could not do this; the apostles must, and did. This giving of the Holy Ghost by imposition of the apostles' hands, was not for a miraculous gift, but an ordinary grace. For St. Philip could, and did do miracles enough; but this grace he could not give, the grace of consigning or confirmation. The like case is in Acts xii. where some people, having been baptized at Ephesus, St. Paul confirmed them, giving them the Holy Ghost by imposition of hands. The apostles did it; not the twelve only, but apostolic men, the other apostles. St. Paul did it. St. Philip could not, nor any of the seventy-two; or any other mere presbyters ever did it, that we find in Holy Scripture.

Yea, but this imposition of hands was for a miraculous issue; for the Ephesine christians received the Holy Ghost, and spake with tongues, and prophesied; which effect, because it is ceased, certainly the thing was temporary, and long ago expired. First: Not for this reason, to be sure. For extraordinary effects may be temporary, when the function which they attest may be eternal; and, therefore, are no signs of an extraordinary ministry. The apostles' preaching was attended by miracles, and extraordinary conversions of people, ut in exordio, "Apostolos divinorum signorum comitabantur effectus et Spiritûs Sancti gratia, ita ut videres unâ alloquutione integros simul populos ad cultum divinæ religionis adduci, et prædicantium verbis non esse tardiorem audientium fidem," as Eusebius tells,[b] of the success of the preaching of some evangelists; yet I hope preaching must not now cease, because no miracles are done; or that to convert one man now, would be the greatest miracle. The apostles, when they cursed and anathematized a delinquent, he died suddenly; as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, whom St. Peter slew with the word of his ministry; and yet now, although these extraordinary issues cease, it is not safe venturing upon the curses of the church. When the apostles did excommunicate a sinner, he was presently delivered over to Satan to be buffeted, that is, to be afflicted with corporal punishments; and now, although no such exterminating angels beat the bodies of persons excommunicate, yet the power of excommunication, I hope, still remains in the church, and the power of the keys is not also gone. So, also, in the power of confirmation;[c] which, however attended by a miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost, in gifts of languages and healing, yet, like other miracles in respect of the whole integrity of christian faith, these miracles at first did confirm the function and the faith for ever.

Now then, that this right of imposing hands, for confirming of baptized people, was not to expire with the persons of the apostles, appears from these considerations.

First: Because Christ made a promise of sending "Vicarium suum Spiritum," the Holy Ghost, in his stead; and this, by way of appropriation, is called "the promise of the Father." This was pertinent to all christendom, "Effundam de Spiritu meo super omnem carnem;" so it was in the prophecy. "For the promise is to you and to your children, καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς εἰς μακρὰν, ὅσους ἂν προσκαλέσηται Κύριος, and to all them that are afar off, even to as many as the Lord shall call."[d] So it was in the first accomplishing. To all: and this for ever; "for I will send the Holy Ghost unto you, and he shall abide with you for ever." For it was "in subsidium," to supply the comforts of his desired presence; and must, therefore, "ex vi intentionis," be remanent till Christ's coming again. Now, then, this promise being to be communicated to all, and that for ever, must either come to us by, 1. Extraordinary and miraculous mission; or by, 2. An ordinary ministry. Not the first; for we might as well expect the gift of miracles. If the second, (as it is most certain so,) then the main question is evicted; viz. that something perpetually necessary was in the power of the apostles, which was not in the power of the inferior ministers, nor of any but themselves and their colleagues; to wit, "ministerium S. Spiritûs," or the ordinary "office of giving the Holy Ghost" by imposition of hands. For this promise was performed to the apostles in Pentecost, to the rest of the faithful after baptism; "Quod enim nunc in confirmandis Neophytis manûs impositio tribuit singulis, hoc tunc Spiritûs Sancti descensio, in credentium populo donavit universis," saith Eusebius Emissenus.[e] Now we find no other way of performing it, nor any ordinary conveyance of the Spirit to all people, but this; and we find that the Holy Ghost actually was given this way. Therefore the effect, to wit, the Holy Ghost, being to continue for ever, and the promise of universal concernment, this way also of its communication, to wit, by apostolical imposition of hands, is also "perpetuum ministerium," to be succeeded to, and to abide for ever.

Secondly: This ministry of imposition of hands for confirmation of baptized people, is so far from being a temporary grace, and to determine with the persons of the apostles, that it is a fundamental point of christianity, an essential ingredient to it composition; St. Paul is my author, "Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection, not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, faith towards God, the doctrines of baptism, and of laying on of hands,"[f] &c. Here is imposition of hands reckoned as part of the foundation and a principle of christianity in St. Paul's catechism. Now imposition of hands is used by name in Scripture but for two ministrations: first, for ordination; and secondly for this, whatsoever it is. Imposition of hands for ordination does indeed give the Holy Ghost, but not as he is that promise which is called "the promise of the Father." For the Holy Ghost for ordination was given before the ascension, John xx. But the promises of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, (the Paraclete, I say, not the Ordainer or Fountain of priestly order, that) was not given till the day of Pentecost; and besides, it was promised to all christian people, and the other was given only to the clergy.

Add to this, that St. Paul having laid this in the foundation, makes his progress from this to "perfection," (as he calls it,) that is, to higher mysteries; and then his discourse is immediately of the priesthood evangelical, which is originally in Christ, ministerially in the clergy; so that, unless we will either confound the terms of his progress, or imagine him to make the ministry of the clergy the foundation of Christ's priesthood, and not rather contrary, it is clear, that by imposition of hands, St. Paul means not ordination, and therefore confirmation, there being no other ordinary ministry of imposition of hands, but these two, specified in Holy Scripture. For, as for benediction, in which Christ used the ceremony, and as for healing, in which Ananias and the apostles used it; the first is clearly no principle or fundamental point of christianity; and the second is confessedly extraordinary; therefore the argument is still firm upon its first principles.

3. Lastly: The primitive church did, "de facto," and believed themselves to be tied "de jure" to use this right of confirmation and giving of the Holy Ghost after baptism.

St. Clemens Alexandrinus, in Eusebius, tells a story of a young man whom St. John had converted and committed to a bishop to be brought up in the faith of christendom: "Qui," saith St. Clement, "eum baptismi sacramento illuminavit, postea verò sigillo Domini tanquam perfectâ et tutâ ejus animi custodiâ obsignavit."[g] The bishop first "baptized" him, then "consigned" him. Justin Martyr says, (speaking "pro more ecclesiæ," according to the custom of the church,) that when the mysteries of baptism were done, then the faithful are consigned or confirmed.[h]

St. Cyprian relates to this story of St. Philip and the apostles, and gives this account of the whole affair: "Et idcircò quia legitimum et ecclesiasticum baptismum consequuti fuerant, baptizari eos ultrà non oportebat; sed tantummodo id quod deerat, id à Petro et Johanne factum erat, ut, oratione pro eis habitâ, et manu impositâ, invocaretur et infunderetur super eos Spiritus Sanctus. Quod nunc quoque apud nos geritur, ut qui in ecclesiâ baptizantur, præpositis ecclesiæ offerantur; ut per nostram orationem ac manûs impositionem Spiritum Sanctum consequantur, et signaculo Dominico confirmentur,"[i] St. Peter and St. John, by imposing their hands on the converts of Samaria, praying over them, and giving them the Holy Ghost, made supply to them of what was wanting after baptism: and this is to this day done in the church; for new baptized people are brought to the bishops, and by imposition of their hands obtain the Holy Ghost.

But for this who pleases to be further satisfied in the primitive faith of christendom, may see it in the decretal epistles of Cornelius the martyr, to Fabianus, recorded by Eusebius; in the epistle[k] written to Julius and Julianus, bishops, under the name of St. Clement; in the epistle[l] of Urban P. and martyr; in Tertullian,[m] in St. Austin,[n] and in St. Cyril of Jerusalem, whose whole third Mystagogique catechism is concerning confirmation. This only: "the catholics, whose christian prudence it was, in all true respects, to disadvantage heretics, lest their poison should infect like a pest, laid it in Novatus's dish as a crime, "He was baptized in his bed, and was not confirmed," Unde nec Spiritum Sanctum unquam potuerit promereri; Therefore he could never receive the gift of the Holy Ghost:" So Cornelius in the fore-quoted epistle. Whence it is evident, that then it was the belief of christendom, that the Holy Ghost was, by no ordinary ministry, given to faithful people after baptism, but only by apostolical or episcopal consignation and imposition of hands.

What also the faith of Christendom was concerning the minister of confirmation, and that bishops only could do it, I shall make evident in the descent of this discourse. Here the scene lies in Scripture, where it is clear that St. Philip, one of the seventy-two disciples, as antiquity reports him, and an evangelist, and a disciple, as Scripture also expresses him, could not impose hands for application of the promise of the Father, and ministerial giving of the Holy Ghost, but the apostles must go to do it; and also there is no example in Scripture of any that ever did it but an apostle, and yet this is an ordinary ministry which "de jure" ought, and "de facto" always was continued in the church. Therefore there must always be an ordinary office of apostleship in the church to do it, that is, an office above presbyters, for in Scripture they could never do it; and this is it which we call episcopacy.

SECTION IX.

And Superiority of Jurisdiction.

THIRDLY: The apostles were rulers of the whole church, and each apostle respectively of his several diocess, when he would fix his chair; and had superintendency over the presbyters and the people, and this by Christ's donation. The charter is by the fathers said to be this: "Sicut misit me Pater sic ego mitto vos;" "as my Father hath sent me, even so I send you."[a] Manifesta enim est sententia Domini nostri Jesu Christi apostolos suos mittentis, et ipsis solis potestatem à Patre sibi datam permittentis, quibus nos successimus eâdem potestate ecclesiam Domini gubernantes;" said Clarus à Musculâ, the bishop in the council of Carthage, related by St. Cyprian and St. Austin.[b] But, however, it is evident in Scripture, that the apostles had such superintendency over the inferior clergy, (presbyters I mean and deacons,) and a superiority of jurisdiction, and therefore it is certain that Christ gave it them, for none of the apostles took this honour, but he that was called of God, as was Aaron.

1. Our blessed Saviour gave to the apostles "plenitudinem potestatis." It was "Sicut misit me, Pater," &c. "As my Father sent, so I send you, my apostles, whom I have chosen." This was not said to presbyters, for they had no commission at all given to them by Christ, but at their first mission to preach repentance; I say no commission at all; they were not spoken to, they were not present. Now then consider. Suppose that, as Aerius did deny the Divine institution of bishops over the presbyters "cum grege," another as confident as he should deny the Divine institution of presbyters, what proof were there in all the Holy Scripture to show the Divine institution of them as a distinct order from apostles or bishops? Indeed Christ selected seventy-two and gave them commission to preach; but that commission was temporary, and expired before the crucifixion, for aught appears in Scripture. If it be said the apostles did ordain presbyters in every city, it is true, but not sufficient, for so they ordained deacons at Jerusalem, and in all established churches, and yet this will not tantamount to an immediate Divine institution for deacons; and how can it then for presbyters? If we say a constant catholic traditive interpretation of Scripture does teach us that Christ did institute the presbyterate together with episcopacy, and made the apostles presbyters as well as bishops; this is true. But then, 1. We recede from the plain words of Scripture, and rely upon tradition, which, in this question of episcopacy, will be of dangerous consequence to the enemies of it; for the same tradition, if that be admitted for good probation, is for episcopal pre-eminence, over presbyters, as will appear in the sequel. 2. Though no use be made of this advantage, yet to the allegation it will be quickly answered, that it can never be proved from Scripture, that Christ made the apostles priests first, and then bishops or apostles, but only that Christ gave them several commissions, and parts of the office apostolical, all which being in one person, cannot by force of Scripture prove two orders. Truth is, if we change the scene of war, and say that the presbyterate as a distinct order from the ordinary office of apostleship, is not of Divine institution, the proof of it would be harder than for the Divine institution of episcopacy. Especially if we consider, that, in all the enumerations of the parts of clerical offices, there is no enumeration of presbyters, but of apostles there is;[c] and the other members of the induction are of gifts of christianity, or parts of the apostolate; and either must infer many more orders than the church ever yet admitted of, or none distinct from the apostolate; insomuch as apostles were pastors, and teachers, and evangelists, and rulers, and had the gift of tongues, of healing, and of miracles. This thing is of great consideration; and this use I will make of it: That either Christ made the seventy-two to be presbyters, and in them instituted the distinct order of presbyterate, as the ancient church always did believe, or else he gave no distinct commission for any such distinct order. If the second be admitted, then the presbyterate is not of immediate Divine institution, but of apostolical only, as is the order of deacons; and the whole plenitude of power is in the order apostolical alone, and the apostles did constitute presbyters with a greater portion of their own power, as they did deacons with a less. But if the first be said, then the commission to the seventy-two presbyters being only of preaching that we find in Scripture, all the rest of their power which now they have, is by apostolical ordinance; and then, although the apostles did admit them "in partem solicitudinis," yet they did not admit them "in plenitudinem potestatis," for then they must have made them apostles, and then there will be no distinction of order neither by Divine nor apostolical institution neither.

[a] John xx. 21.
[b] Lib. vii. de Baptism. contra Donatist. c. 43. Vide etiam S. Cyprian de Unit. Eccles. et S. Cyril. in Joh. lib. xii. c. 55.

I care not which part be chosen, one is certain; but if either of them be true, then since to the apostles only Christ gave a plenitude of power, it follows, that either the presbyters have no power of jurisdiction, as affixed to a distinct order, and then the apostles are to rule them by virtue of the order and ordinary commission apostolical; or, if they have jurisdiction, they do derive it "à fonte apostolorum," and then the apostles have superiority of jurisdiction over presbyters, because presbyters only have it by delegation apostolical. And that I say truth, (besides that there is no possibility of showing the contrary in Scripture, by the producing any other commission given to presbyters, than what I have specified,) I will hereafter show it to have been the faith and practice of christendom, not only that presbyters were actually subordinate to bishops (which I contend to be the ordinary office of apostleship,) but that presbyters have no jurisdiction essential to their order, but derivative only from apostolical pre-eminence.

2. Let us now see the matter of fact. They that can inflict censures upon presbyters have certainly superiority of jurisdiction over presbyters, for "Æqualis æqualem coercere non potest," saith the law. Now it is evident, in the case of Diotrephes a presbyter, and a bishop would-be, that, for his peremptory rejection of some faithful people from the catholic communion without cause, and without authority, St. John the apostle threatened him in his epistle to Gaius, διὰ τοῦτο ἐὰν ἔλθω, ὑπομνήσω αὐτοῦ, &c. "Wherefore when I come, I will remember him;" and all that would have been to very little purpose, if he had not had coercive jurisdiction to have punished his delinquency.

3. Presbyters many of them did succeed the apostles by a new ordination, as Matthias succeeded Judas, who, before his new ordination, was one of the seventy-two, as Eusebius,[d] Epiphanius,[e] and St. Jerome[f] affirm, and in Scripture is expressed to be of the number of them that went in and out with Jesus; St. Clement succeeded St. Peter at Rome: St. Simeon Cleophas succeeded St. James at Jerusalem, St. Philip succeeded St. Paul at Cæsarea; and divers others of the seventy-two reckoned by Dorotheus, Eusebius, and others of the fathers, did govern the several churches after the apostles' death, which before they did not. Now it is clear that he that receives no more power after the apostles, than he had under them, can no way be said to succeed them in their charge or churches. It follows then, since (as will more fully appear anon) presbyters did succeed the apostles, that under the apostles they had not such jurisdiction as afterwards they had. But the apostles had the same to which the presbyters succeeded, therefore greater than the presbyters had, before they did succeed. When I say presbyters succeeded the apostles, I mean, not as presbyters, but by a new ordination to the dignity of bishops; so they succeeded, and so they prove an evidence of fact, for a superiority of jurisdiction in the apostolical clergy. Now, that this superiority of jurisdiction was not temporary, but to be succeeded in, appears from reason, and from ocular demonstration, or of the thing done.

1. If superiority of jurisdiction was necessary in the ages apostolical for the regiment of the church, there is no imaginable reason why it should not be necessary in succession, since, upon the emergency of schisms and heresies, which were foretold should multiply in descending ages, government and superiority of jurisdiction, unity of supremacy, and coercion, was more necessary than at first, when extraordinary gifts might supply, what now we expect to be performed by an ordinary authority.

2. Whatsoever was the regiment of the church in the apostles' times, that must be perpetual, (not so as to have[g] "all" that which was personal and temporary, but so as to have "no other,") for that, and that only, is of Divine institution which Christ committed to the apostles; and if the church be not now governed as then, we can show no Divine authority for our government; which we must contend to do, and do it too, or be called usurpers. For either the apostles did govern the church as Christ commanded them, or not. If not, then they failed in the founding of the church, and the church is built upon a rock. If they did, as most certainly they did, then either the same disparity of jurisdiction must be retained, or else we must be governed with an unlawful and unwarranted equality, because not by that which only is of immediate Divine institution; and then it must needs be a fine government, where there is no authority, and where no man is superior.

3. We see a disparity in the regiment of churches warranted by Christ himself, and confirmed by the Holy Ghost, in fairest intimation. I mean the seven angel-presidents of the seven Asian churches. If these seven angels were seven bishops, that is, prelates or governors of these seven churches, in which it is evident and confessed of all sides there were many presbyters,—then it is certain, that a superiority of jurisdiction was intended by Christ himself, and given by him, insomuch as he is the fountain of all power derived to the church; for Christ writes to these seven churches, and directs his epistles to the seven governors of these churches, calling them angels; which it will hardly be supposed he would have done, if the function had not been a ray of the Sun of righteousness; they had not else been angels of light, nor stars held in Christ's own right hand.

This is certain, that the function of these angels, whatsoever it be, is a Divine institution. Let us then see what is meant by these stars and angels. "The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches, and the seven candlesticks are the seven churches."[h]

1. Then it is evident, that although the epistles were sent, with a final intention for the edification and confirmation of the whole churches or people of the diocess, with an "attendite quid Spiritus dicit ecclesiis;" yet the personal direction was not to the whole church, for the whole church is called the candlestick, and the superscription of the epistles is not to the seven "candlesticks," but to the seven "stars," which are the angels of the seven churches, viz. the lights shining in the candlesticks. By the angel, therefore, is not, cannot be meant, the "whole church."

2. It is plain, that by the angel is meant the governor of the church; first, because of the title of eminency, the angel κατ' ἐξοχὴν, that is, the messenger, the legate, the apostle of the church.[i] Ἄγγελοι ἐαυτῶν. For these words, "angel" or "apostle," although they signify mission or legation, yet, in Scripture, they often relate to the persons to whom they are sent; as in the examples before specified. Ἄγγελοι ἐαυτῶν: "Their angels."—Ἀπόστολοι Ἐκκλησιῶν: "The apostles of the churches."—Ἄγγελος τῆς Ἐφησίκης Ἐκκλησίας: "The angel of the church of Ephesus;" and divers others. Their compellation, therefore, being a word of "office," in respect to him that sends them, and of "eminence," in relation to them to whom they are sent, shows that the angel was the ruler of each church respectively. 2. Because acts of jurisdiction are concredited to him; as not to suffer false apostles; so to the angel of the church of Ephesus, which is clearly a power of cognizance and coercion "in causis clericorum," to be "watchful" and "strengthen" the things that remain; as to the angel of the church in Sardis, γίνου γρηγορῶν, καὶ στήριξον τὰ λοιπά: "The 'first' is the office of rulers, for they 'watch' for your souls;"[j] and the second, of apostles and apostolic men. Ἰούδας δὲ καὶ Σίλας τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς ἐπεστήριξαν: "Judas and Silas confirmed the brethren;" for these men, although they were but of the LXXII. at first, yet by this time were made apostles and "chief men among the brethren." St. Paul, also, was joined in this work, διήρχετο ἐπιστηρίζων τὰς Ἐκκλησίας: "He went up and down confirming the churches."[k] And τὰ λοιπὰ διατάξομαι. St. Paul.[l] To confirm the churches, and to make supply of what is deficient in discipline and government, these were offices of power and jurisdiction, no less than episcopal or apostolical; and besides, the angel here spoken of had a propriety in the people of the diocess; "thou hast a few names even in Sardis;" they were the bishop's people, the angel had a right to them. And good reason that the people should be his, for their faults are attributed to him, as to the angel of Pergamus, and divers others, and, therefore, they are deposited in his custody. He is to be their ruler and pastor, and this is called "his ministry." To the angel of the church of Thyatira, οἶδά σου τὰ ἔργα, καὶ τὴν διακονίαν, "I have known thy ministry." His office, therefore, was clerical, it was an angel-minister; and this, his office, must make him the guide and superior to the rest, even all the whole church, since he was charged with all.

3. By the angel is meant a singular person, for the reprehensions and the commendations respectively, imply personal delinquency, or suppose personal excellencies. Add to this, that the compellation is singular, and of determinate number, so that we may as well multiply churches as persons; for the seven churches had but seven stars, and these seven stars were the angels of the seven churches. And if by seven stars they may mean seventy times seven stars, (for so they may, if they begin to multiply,) then, by one star, they must mean many stars; and so they may multiply churches too, for there were as many churches as stars, and no more angels than churches; and it is as reasonable to multiply these seven churches into seven thousand, as every star into a constellation, or every angel into a legion.

But besides the exigency of the thing itself, these seven angels are, by antiquity, called the seven governors or bishops of the seven churches, and their names are commemorated. Unto these seven churches, "St. John," saith Arethas,[m] "reckoneth ἰσαρίθμους ἐφόρους Ἀγγέλους, an equal number of angel-governors;" and Œcumenius, in his Scholia upon this place, saith the very same words, "Septem igitur angelos rectores septem ecclesiarum debemus intelligere eò quòd angelus nuntius interpretatur," saith St. Ambrose; and again, "Angelos episcopos dicit, sicut docetur in apocalypsi Johannis."[n] Let the woman have a covering on her head, "because of the angels;"[o] that is, in reverence and in subjection to the bishop of the church, for bishops are the angels, as is taught in the Revelation of St. John. "Divinâ voce sub angeli nomine laudatur præpositus ecclesiæ," so St. Austin: "By the voice of God, the bishop of the church is commended under the title of an angel."[p] Eusebius names some of these angels, who were then presidents and actually bishops of these churches. St. Polycarp was one to be sure, "apud Smyrnam et episcopus et martyr," saith Eusebius. He was the angel of the church of Smyrna; and he had good authority for it, for he reports it out of Polycrates,[q] who, a little after, was himself an angel of the church of Ephesus; and he also quotes St. Irenæus for it, and out of the encyclical epistle of the church of Smyrna itself; and, besides these authorities, it is attested by St. Ignatius,[r] and Tertullian.[s] St. Timothy was another angel, to wit, of the church of Ephesus; to be sure had been, and most likely was still surviving. Antipas is reckoned by name in the Revelation, and he had been the angel of Pergamus; but before this book was written, he was turned from an angel to a saint.[t] Melito, in all probability, was then the angel of the church of Sardis. "Melito quoque Sardensis ecclesiæ antistes, et Apollinaris apud Hierapolim ecclesiam regens celeberrimi inter cæteros habebantur," saith Eusebius.[u] These men were actually living when St. John writ his Revelation; for Melito writ his book de Paschate, when Sergius Paulus was proconsul of Asia, and writ after the Revelation; for he writ a treatise of it, as saith Eusebius. However, at least some of these were then, and all of these about that time, were bishops of these churches; and the angels St. John speaks of, were such who had jurisdiction over their whole diocess; therefore these, or such as these, were the angels to whom the Spirit of God writ hortatory and commendatory letters, such whom Christ held in his right hand, and fixed them in the churches like lights set on a candlestick, that they might give shine to the whole house.

The sum of all is this: that Christ did institute apostles and presbyters, or seventy-two disciples. To the apostles he gave a plenitude of power; for the whole commission was given to them in as great and comprehensive clauses as were imaginable; for by virtue of it, they received a power of giving the Holy Ghost in confirmation, and of giving his grace in the collation of holy orders, a power of jurisdiction and authority to govern the church: and this power was not "temporary," but "successive" and "perpetual," and was intended as an "ordinary" office in the church, so that the "successors" of the apostles had the same right and institution that the apostles themselves had; and though the personal mission was not immediate, as of the apostles it was, yet the commission and institution of the function was all one. But to the seventy-two Christ gave no commission but of "preaching," which was a very limited commission. There was all the immediate Divine institution of presbyterate, as a distinct order that can be fairly pretended. But yet further, these seventy-two the apostles did admit "in partem solicitudinis," and, by new ordination or delegation apostolical, did give them power of administering sacraments, of absolving sinners, or governing the church in conjunction and subordination to the apostles, of which they had a capacity by Christ's calling them at first "in sortem ministerii;" but the exercise, and the actuating of this capacity, they had from the apostles. So that, not by Divine ordination, or immediate commission from Christ, but by derivation from the apostles, and therefore, in minority and subordination to them, the presbyters did exercise acts of order and jurisdiction in the absence of the apostles or bishops, or in conjunction consiliary, and by way of advice, or before the consecration of a bishop to a particular church. And all this I doubt not but was done by the direction of the Holy Ghost, as were all other acts of apostolical ministration, and particularly the institution of the other order, viz. of deacons. This is all that can be proved out of Scripture, concerning the commission given in the institution of presbyters; and this I shall afterwards confirm by the practice of the catholic church, and so vindicate the practices of the present church from the common prejudices that disturb us; for, by this account, episcopacy is not only a Divine institution, but the only order that derives immediately from Christ.

For the present only, I sum up this with that saying of Theodoret, speaking of the seventy-two disciples. "Palmæ sunt isti qui nutriuntur ac eruditur ab apostolis. Nam quanquam Christus hos etiam eligit, erant tamen duodecim illis inferiores, et postea illorum discipuli et sectatores:" "The apostles are the twelve fountains, and the LXXII. are the palms that are nourished by the waters of those fountains. For though Christ also ordained the LXXII. yet they were inferior to the apostles, and afterwards were their followers and disciples."[x]

I know no objection to hinder a conclusion; only two or three words out of Ignatius are pretended against the main question, viz. to prove that he, although a bishop, yet had no apostolical authority, οὐχ ὡς ἀπόστολος διατάσσομαι, "I do not command this as an apostle, (for what am I, and what is my father's house, that I should compare myself with them,) but as your fellow-soldier and a monitor."[y] But this answers itself, if we consider to whom he speaks it. Not to his own church of Antioch, for there he might command as an apostle, but to the Philadelphians he might not, they were no part of his diocess, he was not "their" apostle, and then because he did not equal the apostles in their commission extraordinary, in their personal privileges, and in their universal jurisdiction, therefore he might not command the Philadelphians, being another bishop's charge, but admonish them with the freedom of a christian bishop, to whom the souls of all faithful people were dear and precious. So that still episcopacy and apostolate may be all one in ordinary office: this hinders not, and I know nothing else pretended, and that antiquity is clearly on this side is the next business.

For hitherto the discourse hath been of the "immediate Divine institution" of episcopacy, by arguments derived from Scripture; I shall only add two more from antiquity, and so pass on to tradition apostolical.

SECTION X.

So that Bishops are Successors in the Office of Apostleship, according to the general Tenent of Antiquity.

1. THE belief of the primitive church is, that bishops are the ordinary successors of the apostles, and presbyters of the seventy-two, and, therefore, did believe that episcopacy is as truly of Divine institution as the apostolate, for the ordinary office both of one and the other is the same thing. For this there is abundant testimony. Some I shall select, enough to give fair evidence of a catholic tradition.

St. Irenæus is very frequent and confident in this particular, "Habemus annumerare eos, qui ab apostolis instituti sunt episcopi in ecclesiis, et successores eorum usque ad nos.——Etenim si recondita mysteria scîssent apostoli, his vel maxime traderent ea, quibus etiam ipsas ecclesias committebant—quos successores relinquebant, suum ipsorum locum magisterii tradentes:" "We can name the men the apostles made bishops in their several churches, appointing them their successors, and most certainly those mysterious secrets of christianity which themselves knew, they would deliver to them, to whom they committed the churches, and left to be their successors in the same power and authority themselves had."[a]

Tertullian reckons Corinth, Philippi, Thessalonica, Ephesus, and others, to be churches apostolical, "apud quas ipsæ adhuc cathedræ apostolorum suis locis præsident:" "Apostolical they are from their foundation, and by their succession, for the apostles did found them, and apostles or men of apostolic authority still do govern them."[b]

St. Cyprian: "Hoc enim vel maximè, frater, et laboramus et laborare debemus, ut unitatem à Domino, et per apostolos nobis successoribus traditam, quantùm possumus obtinere curemus:" "We must preserve the unity commanded us by Christ, and delivered by his apostles to us, their successors."[c] "To us, Cyprian and Cornelius," for they only were then in view, the one bishop of Rome, the other of Carthage. And in his epistle ad Florentium Pupianum: "Nec hæc jacto, sed dolens profero, cum te judicem Dei constituas et Christi, qui dicit ad apostolos, ac per hoc ad omnes præpositos, qui apostolis vicariâ ordinatione succedunt, Qui vos audit, me audit," &c. "Christ said to his apostles, and in them to the governors or bishops of his church, who succeeded the apostles as vicars in their absence, He that heareth you, heareth me."[d]

Famous is that saying of Clarus à Muscula, the bishop, spoken in the council of Carthage, and repeated by St. Austin: "Manifesta est sententia Domini nostri Jesu Christi apostolos suos mittentis, et ipsis solis potestatem à patre sibi datam permittentis quibus nos successimus eâdem potestate ecclesiam Domini gubernantes. Nos successimus:" "We succeed the apostles, governing the church by the same power."[e] He spake it in full council in an assembly of bishops, and himself was a bishop.

The council of Rome under St. Silvester, speaking of the honour due to bishops, expresses it thus: "Non oportere quemquam Domini discipulis, id est, apostolorum successoribus detrahere:" "No man must detract from the disciples of our Lord, that is, from the apostles' successors."

St. Jerome, speaking against the Montanists for undervaluing their bishops, shows the difference of the catholics' honouring, and the heretics' disadvantaging that sacred order.[f] "Apud nos," saith he, "apostolorum locum episcopi tenent, apud eos episcopus tertius est:" "Bishops with us [Catholics] have the place or authority of apostles, but with them [Montanists] bishops are not the first but the third state of men." And upon that of the Psalmist, "Pro patribus nati sunt tibi filii," St. Jerome, and divers others of the fathers, make this gloss; "Pro patribus apostolis filii episcopi, ut episcopi apostolis, tanquam filii patribus, succedant:" "The apostles are fathers, instead of whom bishops do succeed, whom God hath appointed to be made rulers in all lands." So St. Jerome, St. Austin, and Euthymius, upon the 44th Psalm, aliàs 45th.

But St. Austin, for his own particular makes good use of his succeeding the apostles, which would do very well now also to be considered; "Si solis apostolis dixit, Qui vos spernit me spernit, spernite nos; si autem sermo ejus pervenit ad nos, et vocavit nos, et in eorum loco constituit nos videte ne spernatis nos."[g] It was good counsel not to despise bishops, for they being in the apostles' places and offices are concerned and protected by that saying, "He that despiseth you, despiseth me." I said it was good counsel, especially if, besides all these, we will take also St. Chrysostom's testimony. "Potestas anathematizandi ab apostolis ad successores eorum nimirum episcopos transit:" "A power of anathematizing delinquents is derived from the apostles to their successors, even to bishops."

St. Ambrose, upon that of St. Paul, Ephes. iv. "Quosdam dedit apostolos, apostoli episcopi sunt:" "He hath given apostles, that is, he hath given some bishops."[h] That is downright, and this came not by chance from him; he doubles his assertion. "Caput itaque in ecclesiâ apostolis posuit, qui legati Christi sunt, sicut dicit idem apostolus, 'pro quo legatione fungimur.' Ipsi sunt episcopi, firmante istud Petro apostolo, et dicente inter cætera de Judâ, Et episcopatum ejus accipiat alter."[i] And a third time: "Numquid omnes apostoli? verum est; quia in ecclesiâ unus est episcopus." Bishop and apostle was all one with St. Ambrose, when he spake of their ordinary offices; which puts me in mind of the fragment of Polycrates, of the martyrdom of Timothy in Photius, ὅτι ὁ Ἀπόστολος, Τιμόθεος ὑπὸ τοῦ μεγάλου Παύλου καὶ χειροτονεῖται τῆς Ἐφησίων μητροπόλεως ἐπίσκοπος καὶ ἐνθρονίζεται.[k] "The apostle Timothy was ordained bishop in the metropolis of Ephesus, by St. Paul, and there enthroned." To this purpose are those compellations and titles of bishopries usually in antiquity. St. Basil calls a bishopric, προεδρίαν τῶν Ἀποστόλων, and προεδρίαν Ἀποστολικήν. So Theodoret. "An apostolical presidency." The sum is the same which St. Peter himself taught the church, as St. Clement, his scholar, or some other primitive man in his name, reports of him. "Episcopos ergo vicem apostolorum gerere Dominum docuisse dicebat, et reliquorum discipulorum vicem tenere presbyteros debere insinuabat:" "He [Peter] said that our Lord taught, that bishops were to succeed in the place of the apostles, and presbyters in the place of the disciples."[l] Who desires to be farther satisfied concerning catholic consent, for bishops' succession to apostles in their order and ordinary office, he may see it in Pacianus, the renowned bishop of Barcinona,[m] in St. Gregory,[n] St. John Damascen,[o] in St. Sextus the First, his second decretal epistle, and most plentifully in St. Cœlestine writing to the Ephesine council,[p] in the epistle of Anacletus de Patriarchis et Primatibus,[q] &c. In Isidore,[r] and in venerable Bede.[s] His words are these; "Sicut duodecim apostolos formam episcoporum exhibere simul et demonstrare nemo est qui dubitet: sic et 72 figuram presbyterorum gessisse sciendum est, tametsi primis ecclesiæ temporibus, ut apostolica Scriptura testis est, utrique presbyteri, et utrique vocabantur episcopi, quorum unum scientiæ maturitatem, aliud industriam curæ pastoralis significat. Sunt ergo jure Divino episcopi à presbyteris prælatione distincti:" "As no man doubts but apostles were the order of bishops; so the seventy-two of presbyters, though at first they had names in common. Therefore, bishops by Divine right are distinct from presbyters, and their prelates or superiors."

SECTION XI.

And particularly of St. Peter.

To the same issue drive all those testimonies o antiquity, that call all bishops, "ex æquo," suc cessors of St. Peter. So St. Cyprian: "Dominu noster, cujus præcepta metuere et observare debe mus, episcopi honorem et ecclesiæ suæ rationen disponens in evangelio, loquitur et dicit Petro, Eg tibi dico, quia tu est Petrus, &c. Inde per tempo rum et successionum vices, episcoporum ordinati et ecclesiæ ratio decurrit, ut ecclesia super episco pos constituatur," &c. "When our blessed Saviou was ordering his church, and instituting episcopa dignity, he said to Peter: 'Thou art Peter, and o this rock will I build my church.' Hence come the order of bishops, and the constitution or being of the church, that the church be founded upo bishops."[a] &c.

The same also St. Jerome intimates, "Non es facile stare loco Pauli, tenere gradum Petri:" "I is not a small thing to stand in the place of Paul to obtain the degree of Peter."[b] So he, while h dissuades Heliodorus from taking on him the grea burden of the episcopal office. "Pasce oves meas," said Christ to Peter and "Feed the flock of God which is amongst you," said St. Peter to th bishops of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, an Bithynia. "Similia enim successoribus suis Petru scripsit præcepta," saith Theodoret: "St. Pete gave the same precepts to his successors, whic Christ gave to him."[c] And St. Ephrem speakin of St. Basil, the Bishop of Cæsarea Cappadocia "Et sicut rursus Petrus Ananiam et Sapphiran fraudantes de pretio agri enecavit: ita et Basilius locum Petri obtinens ejusque pariter authoritate libertatemque participans, suam ipsius promissionem fraudantem Valentem redarguit, ejusque filium mort mulctavit:" "As St. Peter did to Ananias and Sap phira, so Basil did to Valens and his son, for th same delinquency; for he had the place, liberty and authority of St. Peter."

Thus Gaudentius, of Brixia, calls St. Ambros the successor of St. Peter; and Gildas, surname the Wise, saith, "that all evil bishops whatsoeve do, with unhallowed and unclean feet, usurp th seat of St. Peter."[d] But this thing is of catholi belief, and of this use. If the order and office o the apostolate be eternal, and to be succeeded in and this office superior to presbyters; and not onl of Divine institution, but, indeed, the only ord which can clearly show an immediate Divine commission for its power and authority (as I have proved of the function apostolical); then those which do succeed the apostles in the ordinary office of apostolate, have the same institution and authority the apostles had; as much as the successors of the presbyters have with the first presbyters, and perhaps more.

For in the apostolical ordinations, they did not proceed as the church since hath done. Themselves had the whole priesthood, the whole commission of the ecclesiastical power, and all the offices. Now they, in their ordaining assistant ministers, did not in every ordination give a distinct order, as the church hath done since the apostles. For they ordained some to distinct offices, some to particular places; some to one part, some to another part, of clerical employment; as St. Paul, who was an apostle, yet was ordained by imposition of hands, to go to the churches of the uncircumcision; so was Barnabas, St. John, and James, and Cephas, to the circumcision; and there was scarce any public design or grand employment, but the apostolic men had a new ordination to it, a new imposition of hands; as is evident in the Acts of the Apostles. So that the apostolical ordinations of the inferior clergy, were only a giving of particular commissions to particular men, to officiate such parts of the apostolical calling as they would please to employ them in. Nay, sometimes their ordinations were only a delivering of jurisdiction, when the persons ordained had the order before; as it is evident in the case of Paul and Barnabas.[e] Of the same consideration is the institution of deacons to spiritual offices; and it is very pertinent to this question. For there is no Divine institution for these rising higher than apostolical ordinance; and so much there is for presbyters, as they are now authorized; for such power the apostles gave to presbyters as they have now, and sometimes more, as to Judas and Silas, and divers others; who, therefore, were more than mere presbyters, as the word is now used.

The result is this: The office and order of a presbyter is but part of the office and order of an apostle; so is a deacon, a lesser part; so is an evangelist; so is a prophet; so is a doctor; so is a helper, or a surrogate in government. But these will not be called orders; every one of them will not, I am sure; at least, not made distinct orders by Christ. For it was in the apostles' power to give any one, or all these powers, to any one man; or to distinguish them into so many men as there are offices, or to unite more or fewer of them. All these, I say, clearly make not distinct orders; and why are not all of them of the same consideration? I would be answered from grounds of Scripture; for there we fix, as yet.

Indeed the apostles did ordain such men, and scattered their power at first; for there was so much employment in any one of them, as to require one man for one office. But a while after, they united all the lesser parts of power into two sorts of men, whom the church hath since distinguished by the names of presbyters and deacons, and called them two distinct orders. But yet, if we speak properly and according to the exigence of Divine institution, there is "unum sacerdotium," "one priesthood" appointed by Christ; and that was the commission given by Christ to his apostles, and to their successors precisely; and those other offices of presbyter and deacon are but members of the great priesthood; and although the power of it is all of Divine institution, as the power to baptize, to preach, to consecrate, to absolve, to minister; yet that so much of it should be given to one sort of men, so much less to another, that is only of apostolical ordinance. For the apostles might have given to some only a power to absolve, to some only to consecrate, to some only to baptize. We see, that to deacons they did so. They had only a power to baptize and preach; whether all evangelists had so much or no, Scripture doth not tell us.

But if to some men they had only given a power to use the keys, or made them officers spiritual, to "restore such as are overtaken in a fault," and not to consecrate the eucharist; (for we see these powers are distinct, and not relative and of necessary conjunction, no more than baptizing and consecrating;) whether or no have those men, who have only a power of absolving or consecrating respectively; whether (I say) have they the order of a presbyter? If yea, then now every priest hath two orders, besides the order of deacon; for, by the power of consecration, he hath the power of a presbyter; and what is he, then, by his other power? But if such a man, ordained with but one of these powers, have not the order of a presbyter; then let any man show me, where it is ordained by Christ, or indeed by the apostles, that an order of clerks should be constituted with both these powers, and that these were called presbyters. I only leave this to be considered.

But all the apostolical power we find instituted by Christ; and we also find a necessity, that all that power should be succeeded in, and that all that power should be united in one order; for he that hath the highest, viz. a power of ordination, must needs have all the other, else he cannot give them to any else; but a power of ordination I have proved to be necessary and perpetual.

So that we have clear evidence of the Divine institution of the perpetual order of apostleship; marry, for the presbyterate, I have not so much either reason or confidence for it, as now it is in the church; but for the apostolate, it is beyond exception. And to this bishops do succeed. For that it is so, I have proved from Scripture; and because "no Scripture is of private interpretation," I have attested it with the catholic testimony of the primitive fathers,—calling episcopacy, the apostolate; and bishops, successors of St. Peter in particular; and of all the apostles in general, in their ordinary offices, in which they were superior to the seventy-two, the antecessors of the presbyterate.

One objection I must clear. For sometimes presbyters are also called apostles, and successors of the apostles; as in Ignatius, in Irenæus, in St. Jerome. I answer:—

1. They are not called "successores apostolorum," by any dogmatical resolution or interpretation of Scripture, as the bishops are, in the examples above alleged; but by illusion and participation, at the most. For true it is, that they succeed the apostles in the offices of baptizing, consecrating, and absolving, "in privato foro;" but this is but part of the apostolical power, and no part of their office, as apostles were superior to presbyters.

2. It is observable, that presbyters are never affirmed to succeed in the power and regiment of the church, but in subordination and derivation from the bishop; and, therefore, they are never said to succeed, "in cathedris apostolorum," in the apostolic sees.

3. The places which I have specified, and they are all I could ever meet with, are of peculiar answer. For as for Ignatius, in his epistle to the church of Trallis,[f] he calls the presbytery, or company of priests, "the college," or "combination of apostles." But here St. Ignatius, as he lifts up the presbyters to a comparison with apostles, so he also raises the bishop to the similitude and resemblance with God. "Episcopus typum Dei Patris omnium gerit; presbyteri verò sunt conjunctus apostolorum cœtus." So that, although presbyters grow high, yet they do not overtake the bishops, or apostles; who also, in the same proportion, grow higher than their first station. This, then, will do no hurt.

As for St. Irenæus, he indeed does say, that presbyters succeed the apostles; but what presbyters he means, he tells us; even such presbyters as were also bishops, such as St. Peter and St. John were, who call themselves presbyters. His words are these: "Propterea eis qui in ecclesiâ sunt presbyteris obaudire oportet, his qui successionem habent ab apostolis, qui cum episcopatûs successione charisma veritatis certum secundùm placitum Patris acceperunt."[g] And a little after: "Tales presbyteros nutrit ecclesia, de quibus et propheta ait, Et dabo principes tuos in pace, et episcopos tuos in justitiâ."[h] So that he gives testimony for us, not against us. As for St. Jerome, the third man, he, in the succession to the honour of the apostolate, joins presbyters with bishops; and that is right enough; for if the bishop alone does succeed, "in plenitudinem potestatis apostolicæ ordinariæ,[i] as I have proved he does, then, also, it is as true of the bishop, together with his "consessus presbyterorum." "Episcopi presbyteri habeant in exemplum apostolos et apostolicos viros; quorum honorem possidentes, habere nitantur et meritum:" these are his words, and enforce not so much as may be safely granted; for "reddendo singula singulis," bishops succeed apostles, and presbyters apostolic men; and such were many that had not at first any power apostolical: and that is all that can be inferred from this place of St. Jerome. I know nothing else to stay me, or to hinder our assent to those authorities of Scripture I have alleged, and the full voice o traditive interpretation.

SECTION XII.

And the Institution of Episcopacy, as well as th Apostolate, expressed to be Divine, by primitiv Authority.

The second argument from antiquity is the direc testimony of the fathers for a "Divine institution." In this St. Cyprian is most plentiful: "Dominus nos ter, episcopi honorem et ecclesiæ suæ rationen disponens in evangelio, dicit Petro,[a] &c. Inde pe temporum et successionum vices, episcoporum ordi natio et ecclesiæ ratio decurrit, ut ecclesia supe episcopos constituatur, et omnis actus ecclesiæ pe eosdem præpositos gubernetur. Cùm hoc itaqu Divinâ lege fundatum sit," &c. "Our Lord di institute in the gospel the honour of a bishop Hence comes the ordination of bishops; and th church is built upon them, and every action of th church is to be governed by them; and this is founde upon a Divine law." "Meminisse autem diacon debent quoniam apostolos, i. e. episcopos, et præ positos Dominus elegit:" "Our Lord hath chose apostles, that is, bishops and church governors." And a little after: "Quòd si nos aliquid auder contra Deum possumus qui episcopos facit, possun et contra nos audere diaconi, à quibus fiunt:" "W must not attempt any thing against God, who hath instituted bishops." The same father, in his epistl to Magnus, disputes against Novatianus's being bishop: "Novatianus in ecclesiâ non est, nec epis copus computari potest, qui evangelicâ et apostolic traditione contemptâ, nemini succedens à seips ordinatus est."[c] If there was both an evangelica and an apostolic tradition, for the successive ordina tion of bishops by other bishops, (as St. Cypria affirms there is, by saying "Novatianus contemne it,") then, certainly, the same evangelical power di institute that calling, for the modus of whose elec tion it took such particular order.

St. Ignatius, long before him, speaking concern ing his absent friend, Sotion, the deacon, οὗ ἐγ ὀναίμην, ὅτι ὑποτάσσεται τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ καὶ τῷ πρεσ βυτερίῳ χάριτι Θεοῦ, ἐν νόμῳ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. H wishes for the good man's company, because, "b the grace of God, and according to the law of Jesu Christ, he was obedient to the bishop and hi clergy."[d]—And a little after: πρέπον οὖν ἐστὶ κα ὑμᾶς ὑπακούειν τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ ὑμῶν, κατὰ μηδὲν αὐτ ἀντιλέγειν. οὐ γὰρ τουτονὶ τὸν βλεπόμενον πλανᾷ τι ἀλλὰ τὸν ἀόρατον παραλογίζεται, τὸν μὴ δυνάμενο παρὰ τίνος παραλογισθῆναι. τὸ δὲ τοιοῦτο, οὐ πρὸ ἄνθρωπον ἀλλὰ πρὸς Θεὸν, ἔχει τὴν ἀκαφοράν. I is home enough. "Ye ought to obey your bishop and to contradict him in nothing." It is a fearfu thing to contradict him; for whosoever does s

"does not mock a visible man, but the invisible, undeceivable God. For this contumely relates not to man, but to God." So St. Ignatius; which could not be true, were it a human constitution, and no Divine ordinance. But more full are those words of his, in his epistle to the Ephesians: Σπουδάσατε ἀγαπητοὶ ὑποταγῆναι τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ, καὶ τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις, καὶ τοῖς διακόνοις. ὁ γὰρ τούτοις ὑποτασσόμενος ὑπακούει Χριστῷ τῷ προχειρισαμένῳ αὐτούς. "He that obeys the bishop and clergy, obeys Christ, who did constitute and ordain them." This is plain and dogmatical; I would be loath to have two men so famous, so ancient, and so resolute, speak half so much against us.

But it is a general resolve and no private opinion. For St. Austin is confident in the case with a "Nemo ignorat episcopos Salvatorem ecclesiis instituisse. Ipse enim priusquam in cœlos ascenderet, imponens manum apostolis, ordinavit eos episcopos:" "No man is so ignorant but he knows that our blessed Saviour appointed bishops over churches; for before his ascension into heaven, he ordained the apostles to be bishops."[e] But long before him, Hegisippus, going to Rome, and by the way calling in at Corinth, and divers other churches, discoursed with their several bishops, and found them catholic and holy, and then stayed at Rome three successions of bishops, Anicetus, Soter, and Eleutherius. "Sed in omnibus istis ordinationibus, vel in cæteris quas per reliquas urbes videram, ita omnia habebantur, sicut lex antiquitùs tradidit, et prophetæ indicaverunt, 'Et Dominus statuit:'" "All things in these ordinations or successions were as our Lord had appointed."[f] All things, therefore, both of doctrine and discipline, and therefore the ordinations themselves too. Further yet, and it is worth observing, there was never any bishop of Rome, from St. Peter to St. Sylvester, that ever writ a decretal epistle now extant and transmitted to us, but, either professedly or accidentally, he said or intimated, "that the order of bishops did come from God."

St. Irenæus, speaking of bishops successors to the apostles, saith, that, with their order of bishopric, they have received "charisma veritatis certum," "a true, and certain or indelible character;" "secundum placitum Patris," "according to the will of God the Father."[g] And this also is the doctrine of St. Ambrose: "Ideò quanquam melior apostolus aliquando tamen eget prophetis; et quia ab uno Deo Patre sunt omnia, singulos episcopos singulis ecclesiis præesse decrevit:" "God, from whom all good things do come, did decree that every church should be governed by a bishop."[h] And again: "Honor igitur, fratres, et sublimitas episcopalis, nullis poterit comparationibus adæquari; si regum fulgori compares,"[i] &c. And a little after; "Quid jam de plebeiâ dixerim multitudine, cui non solùm præferri à Domino meruit, sed ut eam quoque jure tueatur patrio, præceptis imperatum est evangelicis:" "The honour and sublimity of the bishop is an incomparable pre-eminence, and is by God set over the people; and it is commanded by the precept of the holy gospel, that he should guide them by a father's right." And in the close of his discourse: "Sic certè à Domino ad B. Petrum dicitur, 'Petre, amas me?'—repetitum est à Domino tertiò, 'Pasce oves meas.' Quas oves, et quem gregem non solùm tunc B. suscepit Petrus, sed et cum illo nos suscepimus omnes:" "Our blessed Lord committed his sheep to St. Peter to be fed, and in him we (who have pastoral or episcopal authority) have received the same authority and commission." Thus also divers of the fathers, speaking of the ordination of St. Timothy to be bishop, and of St. Paul's intimation, that it was by prophecy, affirm it to be done by order of the Holy Ghost. Τὶ ἐστιν ἀπὸ προφητείας; ἀπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου, saith St. Chrysostom;[k] "He was ordained by prophecy, that is, by the Holy Ghost." Ὁ Θεὸς σε ἐξελέξατο· οὐκ ἀνθρωπίνῃ γέγονας ψήφῳ, "Thou wert not made bishop by human constitution." Πνεύματος προστάξει, so Oecumenius. "By Divine revelation," saith Theodoret. "By the command of the Holy Ghost," so Theophylact; and indeed so St. Paul, to the assembly of elders and bishops met at Miletus, "Spiritus Sanctus posuit vos episcopos," "The Holy Ghost hath made you bishops:"[l] and to be sure St. Timothy was amongst them, and he was a bishop, and so were divers others there present; therefore the order itself is a ray streaming from the Divine beauty, since a single person was made bishop by revelation. I might multiply authorities in this particular, which are very frequent and confident for the Divine institution of episcopacy, in Origen;[m] in the council of Carthage, recorded by St. Cyprian; in the collection of the Oriental canons by Martinus Bracarensis;[n] in the councils of Aquisgrane,[o] and Toledo,[p] and many more. The sum is that which was taught by St. Sextus:[q] "Apostolorum dispositione, ordinante Domino, episcopi primitùs sunt constituti:" "The Lord did at first ordain, and the apostles did so order it, and so bishops at first had their original constitution."

These, and all the former who affirm bishops to be successors of the apostles, and by consequence to have the same institution, drive all to the same issue, and are sufficient to make faith, that it was the doctrine primitive and catholic that episcopacy is a Divine institution, which "Christ planted" in the first founding of christendom, which the "Holy Ghost watered" in his first descent on Pentecost, and to which we are confident that "God will give an increase" by a never-failing succession, unless where God removes the candlestick, or, which is all one, takes away the star, the angel of light, from it, that it may be enveloped in darkness, "usque ad consummationem sæculi et aperturam tenebrarum." The conclusion of all, I subjoin in the words of venerable Bede before quoted: "Sunt ergo jure Divino episcopi à presbyteris prælatione distincti:"

"Bishops are distinct from presbyters, and superior to them by the law of God."[r]

The second basis of episcopacy is "apostolical tradition." We have seen what Christ did, now we shall see what was done by his apostles. And since they knew their Master's mind so well, we can never better confide in any argument to prove Divine institution of a derivative authority than the practice apostolical. "Apostoli enim, discipuli veritatis existentes, extra omne mendacium sunt; non enim communicat mendacium veritati, sicut non communicant tenebræ luci, sed præsentia alterius excludit alterum," saith St. Irenæus.[s]

SECTION XIII.

In pursuance of the Divine Institution, the Apostles did ordain Bishops in several Churches.

FIRST, then: the apostles did, presently after the ascension, fix an apostle or a bishop in the chair of Jerusalem. For they knew that Jerusalem was shortly to be destroyed; they themselves foretold of miseries and desolations to ensue; ("Petrus et Paulus prædicunt cladem Hierosolymitanam," saith Lactantius, lib. iv. Inst.) famines and wars, and not a stone left upon another, was the fate of that rebellious city by Christ's own prediction, which themselves recorded in scripture. And to say they understood not what they wrote, is to make them enthusiasts, and neither good doctors nor wise seers. But it is ἔξω βέλους that the Holy Spirit, which was promised "to lead them into all truth," would instruct them in so concerning an issue of public affairs, as was so great desolation; and therefore they began betimes to establish that church, and to fix it upon its perpetual base. Secondly: the church of Jerusalem was to be the precedent and platform for other churches. "The word of God went forth into all the world, beginning first at Jerusalem;" and therefore also it was more necessary a bishop should be there placed betimes, that other churches might see their government from whence they received their doctrine, that they might see from what stars their continual flux of light must stream. Thirdly; the apostles were actually dispersed by persecution, and this, to be sure, they looked for, and therefore (so implying the necessity of a bishop to govern in their absence or decession any ways) they ordained St. James the first bishop of Jerusalem; there he fixed his chair, there he lived bishop for thirty years, and finished his course with glorious martyrdom. If this be proved, we are in a fair way for practice apostolical.

First: Let us see all that is said of St. James in Scripture, that may concern this affair. Acts xv. We find St. James in the synod at Jerusalem, not disputing, but giving final determination to that great question about circumcision. "And when there had been much disputing, Peter rose up and said," &c. He first drave the question to an issue, and told them what he believed concerning it, with a πιστεύομεν σωθῆναι, "we trust it will go as well with us without circumcision, as with our forefathers who used it." But St. James, when he had summed up what had been said by St. Peter, gave sentence and final determination: Διὸ ἐγὼ κρίνω, "Wherefore I judge or give sentence." So he. The acts of council which the brethren or presbyters did use, were deliberative; "they disputed," ver. 7. St. Peter's act was declarative, but St. James's was decisive; which proves him clearly, (if, by reasonableness of the thing, and the successive practice of christendom in imitation of this first council apostolical, we may take our estimate,) that St. James was the president of this synod; which, considering that he was none of the twelve, (as I proved formerly,) is unimaginable, were it not for the advantage of the place, it being held in Jerusalem, where he was "Hierosolymorum episcopus," as St. Clement calls him; especially in the presence of St. Peter, who was "primus apostolus," and decked with many personal privileges and prerogatives.

Add to this, that although the whole council did consent to the sending of the decretal epistle, and to send Judas and Silas, yet, because they were of the presbytery, and college of Jerusalem, St. James's clergy, they are said, as by way of appropriation, to come from St. James, Gal. ii. ver. 12. Upon which place St. Austin saith thus: "Cùm vidisset quosdam venisse à Jacobo, i. e. à Judæâ, nam ecclesiæ Hierosolymitanæ Jacobus præfuit." To this purpose that of Ignatius is very pertinent, calling St. Stephen the deacon of St. James,[a] and, in his epistle to Hero, saying that he did minister to St. James and the presbyters of Jerusalem; which if we expound according to the known discipline of the church in Ignatius's time, who was "suppar apostolorum," only not a contemporary bishop, here is plainly the eminency of an episcopal chair, and Jerusalem the seat of St. James, and the clergy his own, of a college of which he was the "præpositus ordinarius," he was their "ordinary."

The second evidence of Scripture is Acts xxi. "And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly, and the day following Paul went in with us unto James, and all the elders were present." Why unto James? Why not rather unto the presbytery, or college of elders, if James did not "eminere," were not the ἡγούμενος, the "præpositus" or "bishop" of them all?

Now that these conjectures are not vain and impertinent, see it testified by antiquity, to which, in matter of fact and church-story, he that will not give faith upon current testimonies, and uncontradicted by antiquity, is a madman, and may as well disbelieve every thing that he hath not seen himself, and can no way prove that himself was christened; and to be sure, after sixteen hundred years there is no possibility to disprove a matter of fact, that was never questioned or doubted of before, and therefore can never obtain the faith of any man to his contradictory, it being impossible to prove it.

[r] Lib. iii. in Lucum, c. 15.

[s] Lib. iii. cap. 5.

Eusebius reports out of St. Clement: Πέτρον γάρ φησι καὶ Ἰάκωβον καὶ Ἰωάννην, μετὰ τὴν ἀνάληψιν τοῦ σωτῆρος, ὡς ἂν ὑπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου προτετιμημένους, μὴ ἐπιδικάζεσθαι δόξης, ἀλλὰ Ἰάκωβον, τὸν Δίκαιον, ἐπίσκοπον Ἱεροσολύμων ἑλέσθαι.[b] "St. Peter and St. John, although they were honoured of our Lord, yet they would not themselves be, but made James, surnamed the Just, bishop of Jerusalem." And the reason is that which is given by Hegesippus in Eusebius for his successor Simeon Cleophæ; for when St. James was crowned with martyrdom, and immediately the city destroyed, "Traditur apostolos qui supererant, in commune consilium habuisse, quem oportere dignum successione Jacobi judicare."[c] It was concluded for Simeon, because he was the kinsman of our Lord, as St. James also, his predecessor. The same concerning St. James is also repeated by Eusebius: "Judæi ergo, cùm Paulus provocâsset ad Cæsarem—in Jacobum fratrem Domini, 'cui ab apostolis sedes Hierosolymitana delata fuit,' omnem suam malevolentiam convertunt."[d]

In the apostolical constitutions under the name of St. Clement, the apostles are brought in speaking thus: "De ordinatis autem à nobis episcopis in vitâ nostrâ, significamus vobis quòd hi sunt; Hierosolymis ordinatus est Jacobus frater Domini:" "St. James, the brother of our Lord, was ordained bishop of Jerusalem by us,"[e] apostles. The same is witnessed by Anacletus: "Porrò et Hierosolymitarum primus episcopus B. Jacobus, qui Justus dicebatur, et secundum carnem Domini nuncupatus est frater, à Petro, Jacobo, et Johanne, apostolis, est ordinatus."[f] And the same thing in terms is repeated by Anicetus, with a "Scimus enim beatissimum Jacobum,"[g] &c. Just as Anacletus before. St. James was bishop of Jerusalem, and Peter, James, and John, were his ordainers.

But let us see the testimony of one of St. James's successors in the same chair, who certainly was the best witness of his own church-records. St. Cyril of Jerusalem is the man. "Nam de his non mihi solùm, sed etiam apostolis, et 'Jacobo hujus ecclesiæ olim episcopo' curæ fuit,"[h] speaking of the question of circumcision, and things sacrificed to idols; and again, he calls St. James "primum hujus parochiæ episcopum," "the first bishop of this diocess."[i]

St. Austin also attests this story. "Cathedra tibi quid fecit ecclesiæ, in quâ Petrus sedit, et in quâ hodiè Anastasius sedet? Vel ecclesiæ Hierosolymitanæ 'in quâ Jacobus sedit,' et in quâ hodiè Johannes sedet?"[k] I must not omit the testimony of St. Jerome, for it will be of great use in the sequel: "Jacobus," saith he, "post passionem Domini statim ab apostolis Hierosolymorum episcopus ordinatus;" and the same also he repeats out of Hegesippus.[l] There are many more testimonies to this purpose, as of St. Chrysostom,[m] Epiphanius,[n] St. Ambrose,[o] the council of Constantinople in Trullo.[p] But Gregorius Turonensis rises a little higher: "Jacobus, frater Domini vocitatus, ab ipso Domino nostro Jesu Christo episcopus dicitur ordinatus:" "St. James, the brother of our Lord, is said to have been ordained bishop by our Lord Jesus Christ himself."[q] If by "ordinatus" he means "designatus," he agrees with St. Chrysostom: but either of them both will serve the turn for the present. But either in one sense or the other, it is true and attested also by Epiphanius: "Et primus hic accepit cathedram episcopatûs, cui concredidit Dominus thronum suum in terra primò:" "St. James had first the episcopal chair, for our Lord first intrusted his earthly throne to him."[r] And thus we are encircled with a cloud of witnesses; to all which if we add what I before observed, that St. James is in Scripture called an apostle, and yet he was none of the twelve, and that, in the sense of Scripture and the catholic church, a bishop and an apostle is all one,—it follows from the premises, (and of them already there is faith enough made,) that St. James was, by Christ's own designation and ordination apostolical, made bishop of the church of Jerusalem, —that is, had power apostolical concredited to him which presbyters had not; and this apostolate was limited and fixed, as his successors' since have been.

But that this also was not a temporary business, and to expire with the persons of St. James and the first apostles, but a regiment of ordinary and successive duty in the church, it appears by the ordination of St. Simeon, the son of Cleophas, to be his successor. It is witnessed by Eusebius: "Post martyrium Jacobi—traditur apostolos, &c. habuisse in commune consilium quem oporteret dignum successione Jacobi judicare; omnesque uno consilio, atque uno consensu, Simeonem Cleophæ filium decrevisse, ut episcopatûs sedem susciperet."[s] The same also he transcribes out of Hegesippus: "Posteaquam Jacobus Martyr effectus est—electione Divinâ Simeon Cleophæ filius episcopus ordinatur, electus ab omnibus pro eo quòd esset consobrinus Domini." St. Simeon was ordained bishop "by a Divine election;"[t] and Epiphanius, in the catalogue of the bishops of Jerusalem, reckons first James and next Simeon, "qui sub Trajano crucifixus est."[u]

SECTION XIV.

St. Timothy at Ephesus.

The next bishop we find ordained by the apostles, was Timothy at Ephesus. That he was ordained by an apostle appears in Scripture. For St. Paul imposed hands on him; that is certain; "Excita gratiam, quæ in te est per impositionem manuum mearum;" "By the laying on of my hands."[a] That he was there a bishop is also apparent from the power and offices concredited to him. First, he was to be resident at Ephesus.[b] And although, for the public necessities of the church, and for assistance to St. Paul, he might be called sometimes from his charge; yet there he lived and died, as the church-story writes, there was his ordinary residence, and his avocations were but temporary and occasional. And when it was, his cure was supplied by Tychicus, whom St. Paul sent to Ephesus as his vicar, as I shall show hereafter.

2. St. Paul, in his epistles to him, gave directions to him for episcopal deportment, as is plain; "A bishop must be blameless, the husband of one wife,"[c] &c. Thirdly, St. Paul concredits jurisdiction to St. Timothy. Over the people; παραγγέλλε ταῦτα καὶ δίδασκε. παραγγέλλειν is of as great extent in St. Timothy's commission as διδάσκειν. "Commanding" as "teaching." Over presbyters; but yet so as to make difference between them and the neotericks in christianity, "the one as fathers, the other as brethren."[d] Ἐπίπληξις is denied to be used towards either of them: ἐπίπληξις, ἐπιτίμησις, saith Suidas, "a dishonourable upbraiding or objurgation." Nay, it is more; ἐπιπλήττω is "castigo, plagam infero," saith Budæus: so that that kind of rebuking the bishop is forbidden to use, either toward priest or deacon, clergy or laity, old or young. "For a bishop must be no striker." But παρακάλει, that is, given him in commission both to old and young, presbyters and catechumens, that is, "Require them; postula provoca." Παρακεκλῆσθαι εἰς συμμαχιαν· Synesius; "To be provoked to a duel, to be challenged." And παρακαλῶ ὑμᾶς εἰς προσευχήν.—Chrysostom: "Ad precandum vos provoco." Παρακαλεῖς με εἰς δάκρυα.—Eurip. "Thou makest me or compellest me to shed tears." "Suaviter omnia;" that is the way St. Paul takes: "Meekly," but yet so as to do his office, to keep all in their several duties, and that is by a παράγγελλε ταῦτα, "Command these things;" for so he sums up the bishop's duty towards presbyters, neophytes, and widows. "Give all these things in charge,"[e] command all to do their duty. Command, but not objurgate. "Et quid negotii esset episcopo ut presbyterum non objurgaret, si super presbyterum non haberet potestatem?"[f] So Epiphanius urges this argument to advantage.[f] For, indeed, it had been to little purpose for St. Paul to have given order to Timothy, how he should exercise his jurisdiction over presbyters and people, if he had had no jurisdiction and coercive authority at all. Nay, and howsoever St. Paul forbids Timothy to use ἐπίπληξις, which is, ἐπιτίμησις, yet St. Paul, in his second epistle, bids him use it, intimating, upon great occasion: Ἔλεγξον, ἐπιτίμησον, παρακάλησον.[g] To be sure παράκλησις, if it be but an urging, or an exhortation, is not all, for St. Paul gives him coercive jurisdiction, as well as directive. Over widows: νεωτέρας δὲ χήρας παραιτοῦ. "Reject the younger widows," viz. "à collegio viduarum, ab eleemosynis ecclesiæ." Over presbyters; for he commands him to have sufficient probate in the accusation of presbyters, of which if he was not to take cognizance, it was to no purpose to number witnesses. Κατὰ πρεσβυτέρου κατηγορίαν μὴ παραδέχου. "Receive not a public accusation 'foro externo' against a priest." "Non vocabis in jus, nisi in testimonio duorum," &c. to wit, in causes criminal. That is sufficient intimation of the bishop's power to take cognizance in causes criminal; then for his punishing in such causes, it follows in the next words, τοὺς ἁμαρτάνοντας ἐνώπιον πάντων ἔλεγχε. "Reprehend them publicly,"[h] that is, "disgrace them." For ἐλεγχὴς is ἐπονείδιστος, "indecorous."——Ἀργεῖοι, ἰόμωροι, ἐλεγχέες, οὔ νυ σέβεσθε;—Homer. Iliad. δ, 242. So that ἐνώπιον πάντων ἔλεγχε in St. Paul, is, "to call them to public account:" that is one part of the jurisdiction. Ἔλεγχον τούτου λαβεῖν, is, "to examine." Plato, Epist. διδόναι ἔλεγχον τοῦ βίου, "to give an account of one's life." Idem in Apolog. And then also it implies punishment upon conviction,

> Ἀτρείδη, νῦν δή σε, ἄναξ, ἐθέλουσιν Ἀχαιοὶ
> Πᾶσιν ἐλέγχιστον θέμεναι μερόπεσσι βροτοῖσι.
> HOM. ε. Iliad.

But the words in St. Paul will clear the business. "Let them that sin, be publicly shamed," ἵνα καὶ λοιποὶ φόβον ἔχωσι, "that the rest may fear;" a punishment most certainly, something that is ἐν φύσει τῶν φοβερῶν, "malum in genere pœnæ." What else should they fear? to sin? Most true. But why upon this reprehension, if not for fear of being punished?

Add to all this, that here is, in this chapter, the plain giving of a jurisdiction, an erection of a judicatory, and is all the way direction for his proceeding in cases criminal, appears most evidently, verse 21. "I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, that thou observe these things," χωρὶς προκρίματος, "without prejudging" the cause of any man, before it comes in open contestation under public test of witnesses, μηδὲν ποιῶν κατὰ πρόσκλισιν, "doing nothing for favour or partiality." Nothing in the world is plainer, for the erection of a consistory, than these mandates of St. Paul.

Lastly: to make up his episcopal function complete, St. Paul gives him also direction concerning giving of orders. "Lay hands suddenly on no man."[i] "Sub testatione ergo ea quæ ad ordinationem ecclesiæ mandat custodiri——Nè facilè aliquis accipiat ecclesiasticam dignitatem——peccat enim si non probet et sic ordinet. Melior enim cæteris debet probari qui ordinandus est. Hæc episcopus custodiens, castum se exhibebit religioni, cujus rei in futuro præmium consequetur." So St. Ambrose upon the place, who is so far from exempting presbyters from being submitted to the bishop's consistory, that he does appropriate all his former cautions concerning the judicature and coercive jurisdiction to causes of the clergy.

Add to this evidence of Scripture, the testimony of catholic and unquestioned antiquity, affirming St. Timothy to have been ordained bishop of Ephesus by St. Paul. Eusebius, speaking of the successions to St. Paul, "Sed et Lucas," saith he, "in actibus apostolorum plurimos ejus socios memorat, sicut Timothei et Titi, quorum alter in Epheso episcopus ——ab eo ordinatus præficitur."[k] St. Ambrose affirms that St. Paul, having ordained him bishop, writes his first epistle to him, to instruct him in his episcopal office: "Hunc igitur jam creatum episcopum instruit per epistolam, quomodo deberet ecclesiam ordinare."[l] And that this epistle was written to instruct St. Timothy for his own person, and all bishops in him, for their deportment in the office of a bishop, is the united concurrent testimony of St. Vincentius,[m] Tertullian,[n] St. Chrysostom,[o] St. Ambrose,[p] Œcumenius,[q] Epiphanius,[r] Primasius,[s] and St. Gregory.[t] As for Epiphanius, in the place now quoted, he uses it as an argument against the madness and stupidity of Aerius, contending a bishop and a presbyter to be all one: "Docet divinus apostoli sermo, quis sit episcopus et quis presbyter, quum dicit ad Timotheum, qui erat episcopus, Presbyterum ne objurges," &c. I shall transcribe no more testimonies for this particular, but that of the general council of Chalcedon, in the case of Bassianus and Stephanus; Leontius, the bishop of Magnesia, spake it in full council, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου Τιμοθέου μέχρι νῦν εἴκοσι ἑπτὰ ἐπίσκοποι ἐγένοντο, πάντες ἐν Ἐφέσῳ ἐχειροτονήθησαν: "from St. Timothy until now, there have been twenty-seven bishops ordained in Ephesus." Who desires a multitude of testimonies, (though enough already have deposed in the cause, besides the evidence of Scripture,) may to these add that saying of St. Chrysostom,[u] that to Timothy was committed ἔθνος ὁλόκληρον τοῦτο Ἀσίας: of Theodoret, calling him "episcopum Asianorum;" the subscription to the first epistle to Timothy; (which, if it were not writ by St. Paul, yet at least will prove a primitive record, and very ancient,) the fragment of the martyrdom of St. Timothy in Photius, St. Jerome,[x] St. Theophylact,[y] Isidore,[z] and Nicephorus.[a]

And now all is well, if, after all this, Timothy do not prove an evangelist, for this one objection will be sufficient to catch at, to support a drowning cause, and though neither pertinent nor true, yet shall be laid in the balance against all the evidence of Scripture and catholic antiquity. But "do the work of an evangelist," saith St. Paul; therefore it is clear St. Timothy was no bishop. No, was not? That is hard: but let us try however.

1. Τὴν διακονίαν σου πληροφόρησον, those are the next words; "fulfil thy deaconship." And therefore he was no bishop? As well this as the other; for if deaconship do not exclude episcopacy, why shall his being an evangelist exclude it? Or why may not his being a deacon exclude his being an evangelist, as well as his being an evangelist exclude his being a bishop? Whether is higher, a bishopric, or the office of an evangelist? If a bishop's office be higher, and, therefore, cannot consist with an evangelist, then a bishop cannot be a priest, and a priest cannot be a deacon, and an evangelist can be neither; for that also is thought to be higher than them both. But if the office of an evangelist be higher, then as long as they are not disparate, much less destructive of each other, they may have leave to consist in subordination. For as for the pretence that an evangelist is an office of a moveable employment, and a bishopric of fixed residence, that will be considered by and by.

2. All the former discourse is upon supposition, that the word διακονία implies the "office of a deacon;" and so it may, as well as St. Paul's other phrase implies St. Timothy to be an evangelist, for if we mark it well, it is ἔργον ποίησον εὐαγγελιστοῦ, "Do the work," not the "office, of an evangelist." And what is that? We may see it in the verses immediately going before, Κήρυξον τὸν λόγον, ἐπίστηθι εὐκαίρως, ἀκαίρως· ἔλεγξον, ἐπιτίμησον, παρακάλεσον ἐν πάσῃ μακροθυμίᾳ καὶ διδαχῇ. And if this be the work of an evangelist, which St. Paul would have Timothy perform, viz. "to preach, to be instant in season and out of season, to reprove, to rebuke, to exhort," there is no harm done; a bishop may, nay, he must do all this.

3. Consider what an "evangelist" is, and thence take our estimate for the present. 1. He that writes the story of the gospel is an evangelist; so the Greek scholiast calls him. And in this sense, indeed, St. Timothy was not an evangelist; but yet if he had, he might have been a bishop; because St. Mark was an evangelist to be sure, and perhaps as sure, that he was a bishop; sure enough; for they are both delivered to us by the catholic testimony of the primitive church, as we shall see hereafter, so far as concerns our question. But then again; an apostle might be an evangelist; St. Matthew was; St. John was; and the apostolical dignity is as much inconsistent with the office of an evangelist as episcopal pre-eminence; for I have proved these two names, apostle and bishop, to signify all one thing. Secondly, St. Ambrose gives another exposition of evangelists; "Evangelistæ diaconi sunt, sicut fuit Philippus."[b] St. Philip was one of the seven, commonly called deacons, and he was also a presbyter, and yet an evangelist; and yet a presbyter, in its proportion, is an office of as necessary residence as a bishop; or else why are presbyters cried out against so bitterly, in all cases, for non-residence? and yet nothing hinders, but that St. Timothy, as well as St. Philip, might have been a presbyter and an evangelist together; and then why not a bishop too? For why should a deaconship or a presbyterate consist with the office of an evangelist more than a bishopric? Thirdly; Another acceptation of evangelist is also in Eusebius: "Sed et alii plurimi per idem tempus apostolorum discipuli superstites erant—Nonnulli ex his ardentiores divinæ philosophiæ, animas suas verbo Dei consecrabant; ut si quibus fortè provinciis nomen fidei esset incognitum, prædicarent, primaque apud eos evangelii fundamenta collocantes, evangelistarum fungebantur officio."[c] They that planted the gospel "first" in any country, were evangelists. St. Timothy might be such a one, and yet be a bishop afterwards. And so were some of this sort of evangelists. For so Eusebius: "Primaque apud eos fundamenta evangelii collocantes, atque electis quibusque ex ipsis officium regendæ ecclesiæ, quam fundaverant, committentes, ipsi rursum ad alias gentes properabant." So that they first converted the nation, and then governed the church; first they were evangelists, and afterwards bishops; and so was Austin the monk, that converted England in the time of St. Gregory and Ethelbert; he was first our evangelist, and afterwards bishop of Dover. Nay, why may they not, in this sense, be both evangelists and bishops at the same time? insomuch as many bishops have first planted christianity in divers countries, as St. Chrysostom in Scythia, St. Trophimus, St. Denis, St. Mark, and many more.[d] By the way only, according to all these acceptations of the word "evangelist," this office does not imply a perpetual motion. Evangelists many of them did travel, but they were never the more evangelists for that; but only their office was writing or preaching the gospel; and thence they had their name.

4. The office of an evangelist was but temporary, and take it in either of the two senses of Eusebius or Œcumenius, which are the only true and genuine, was to expire when christianity was planted every where, and the office of episcopacy, if it was at all, was to be succeeded in, and therefore in no respect could these be inconsistent, at least, not always. And how St. Paul should intend that Timothy should keep those rules he gave him, "to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ,"[e] if the office, for the execution of which he gave him the rules, was to expire long before, is not so easily imagined. For if St. Paul did direct him in a temporary and expiring office, then in no sense, neither in person, nor in succession, could those rules of St. Paul be kept till Christ's coming, to wit, to judgment. But if he instructed him in the perpetual office of episcopacy, then it is easy to understand that St. Paul gave that caution to Timothy, to intimate that those his directions were not personal, but for his successors in that charge, to which he had ordained him, viz. in the sacred order and office of episcopacy.

5. Lastly; After all this stir, there are some of the fathers that will by no means admit St. Timothy to have been an evangelist.[f] So St. Chrysostom, so Theophylact, so the Greek scholiast. Now though we have no need to make any use of it, yet if it be true, it makes all this discourse needless, we were safe enough without it; if it be false, then itself we see is needless, for the allegation of St. Timothy's being an evangelist is absolutely impertinent, though it had been true.

But now I proceed.

SECTION XV.

St. Titus at Crete.

Titus was also made a bishop by the apostles. St. Paul also was his ordainer. First, "Reliqui te Cretæ." There St. Paul fixed his seat for him at Crete. Secondly: His work was τὰ λείποντα ἐπιδιορθῶσαι, "to set in order things that are wanting;" viz. to constitute rights and forms of public liturgy, to erect a consistory for cognizance of causes criminal, to dedicate houses for prayer, by public destination for Divine service; and, in a word, by his authority, to establish such discipline and rituals, as himself did judge to be most for edification and ornament of the church of God. For he that was appointed by St. Paul to rectify and set things in order, was, most certainly, by him supposed to be the judge of all the obliquities which he was to rectify. 2. The next work is episcopal too, and it is the "ordaining presbyters in every city." Not presbyters collectively in every city, but distributively, κατὰ πόλιν, "city by city;" that is, elders in several cities; one in one city, many in many. For by these "elders," are certainly meant "bishops." Of the identity of names I shall afterwards give an account; but here, it is plain, St. Paul expounds himself to mean bishops.

1. In terms and express words: "To ordain elders in every city; if any be the husband of one wife, &c. For a bishop must be blameless:" that is, "the elders that you are to ordain in several cities, must be blameless; for else they must not be bishops." 2. The word πρεσβυτέρους cannot hinder this exposition; for St. Peter calls himself συμπρεσβύτερον, and St. John, "presbyter electæ dominæ," and "presbyter dilectissimo Gaio." Such presbyters as these were apostolical; and that is as much as episcopal, to be sure. 3. St. Paul adds further, "A bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God."[a] "Who, then, is that faithful and wise steward, whom his Lord shall make ruler?" St. Paul's bishop is God's steward;" and "God's steward" is the "ruler of his household," says our blessed Saviour himself; and, therefore, not a mere presbyter; amongst whom, indeed, there is a parity, but no superintendence of God's making. 4. St. Paul does, in the sequel, still qualify his elders or bishops, with more proprieties of rulers: "A bishop must be no striker; not given to wine." They are exactly the requisites which our blessed Saviour exacts, in his stewards' or rulers' accounts. "If the steward of the house will drink and be drunk, and beat his fellow-servants, then the Lord of that servant shall come, and divide him his portion with unbelievers." The steward of the household, this ruler, must not be πάροινος, nor πλήκτης; no more must a bishop; he must not be "given to wine; no striker," "Neque enim pugilem describit sermo apostolicus, sed pontificem instituit quid facere non debeat," saith St. Jerome.[b] Still, then, these are the rulers of the church, which St. Titus was to ordain; and, therefore, it is required should rule well his own house; for how else shall he take charge of the church of God? Implying, that this, his charge, is to rule the house of God. 5. The reason why St. Paul appointed him to ordain these bishops in cities, is, in order to coercive jurisdiction; because "many unruly and vain talkers were crept in," (verse 10.) and they were to be silenced, οὓς δεῖ ἐπιστομίζειν, "their mouths must be stopped." Therefore they must be such elders as had superiority of jurisdiction over these impertinent preachers, which to a single presbyter, either by Divine or apostolical institution, no man will grant; and to a college of presbyters, St. Paul does not intend it, for himself had given it singly to St. Titus. For I consider,

Titus alone had coercive jurisdiction before he ordained these elders; be they bishops, be they presbyters. The presbyters which were at Crete before his coming, had not episcopal power, or coercive jurisdiction: for why, then, was Titus sent? As for the presbyters which Titus ordained, before his ordaining them, to be sure they had no power at all; they were not presbyters. If they had a coercive jurisdiction afterwards, to wit, by their ordination, then Titus had it before in his own person; (for they that were there before his coming, had not, as I showed;) and, therefore, he must also have it still, for he could not lose it by ordaining others; or if he had it not before, how could he give it unto them whom he ordained? For "plus juris in alium transferre nemo potest, quam ipse habet."

Howsoever it be then, to be sure, Titus had it in his own person; and then it follows undeniably, that either this coercive jurisdiction was not necessary for the church; (which would be either to suppose men impeccable, or the church to be exposed to all the inconveniences of schism and tumultuary factions, without possibility of relief;) or if it was necessary, then, because it was in Titus not as a personal prerogative, but a power to be succeeded to; he might ordain others, he had authority to do it, with the same power he had himself; and, therefore, since he alone had this coercion in his own person, so should his successors; and then, because a single presbyter could not have it over his brethren, by the confession of all sides, nor the college of presbyters, which were there before his coming, had it not; (for why, then, was Titus sent with a new commission;) nor those which he was to ordain, if they were but mere presbyters, could not have it, no more than the presbyters that were there before his coming;—it follows, that those elders, which St. Paul sent Titus to ordain, being such as were to be constituted in opposition and power over the false doctors and prating preachers, and with authority to silence them, (as is evident in the first chapter of that epistle,) these elders (I say) are verily and indeed, such as himself calls bishops, in the proper sense and acceptation of the word.

6. The Cretan presbyters, who were there before St. Titus's coming, had not power to ordain others; that is, had not that power that Titus had. For Titus was sent thither for that purpose, therefore, to supply the want of that power. And now, because to ordain others was necessary for the conservation and succession of the church; that is, because new generations are necessary for the continuing the world; and mere presbyters could not do it; and yet this must be done, not only by Titus himself, but after him; it follows undeniably, that St. Paul sent Titus to ordain men, with the same power that himself had; that is, with more than his first Cretan presbyters, that is, bishops; and he means them in the proper sense.

7. That by "elders in several cities," he means "bishops," is also plain, from the place where they were to be ordained; κατὰ πόλιν, not κατὰ κωμὴν, or κατὰ πολίχνιον· "In populous cities, not in village-towns;" for no bishops were ever suffered to be in village-towns; as is to be seen in the councils of Sardis,[c] of Chalcedon,[d] and St. Leo;[e] the cities, therefore, do at least highly intimate, that the persons to be ordained were not mere presbyters.

The issue of this discourse is: That since Titus was sent to Crete to ordain bishops, himself was a bishop, to be sure, at least. If he had ordained only presbyters, it would have proved that. But this infers him to be a metropolitan, forasmuch as he was bishop of Crete, and yet had many suffragans in subordination to him, of his own constitution, and yet of proper diocesses. However, if this discourse concludes nothing peculiar, it frees the place from popular prejudice and mistakes, upon the confusion of "episcopus" and "presbyter;" and at least infers his being a bishop, if not a great deal more.

Yea; but did not St. Titus ordain no mere presbyters? Yes, most certainly. But so he did deacons too; and yet neither one nor the other are otherwise mentioned in this epistle, but by consequence and comprehension, within the superior order. For he that ordains "a bishop," first makes him "deacon," and then he obtains καλὸν βαθμὸν, "a good degree;" and then "a presbyter," and then, "a bishop." So that these inferior orders are presupposed, in the authorizing the supreme; and by giving direction for the qualifications of bishops, he sufficiently instructs the inferior orders in their deportment, insomuch as they are probations for advancement to the higher.

2. Add to this, that he that ordains bishops in cities, sets there τάξιν γεννητικὴν, "ordinem generativum patrum," as Epiphanius calls episcopacy; and, therefore, most certainly with intention, not that it should be χεὶρ ἄκυρος, "manus mortua," but to produce others; and, therefore, presbyters and deacons.

3. St. Paul made no express provision for villages, and yet, most certainly, did not intend to leave them destitute; and, therefore, he took order that such ordinations should be made in cities, which should be provisionary for villages; and that is, of such men as had power to ordain, and power to send presbyters to what part of their charge they pleased. For since presbyters could not ordain other presbyters, as appears by St. Paul's sending Titus to do it there, where, most certainly, many presbyters before were actually resident; if presbyters had gone to villages, they must have left the cities destitute; or if they stayed in cities, the villages would have perished; and at last, when these men had died, both one and the other had been made a prey to the wolf; for there could be no shepherd after the decay of the first generation.

But let us see further into St. Titus's commission, and letters of orders, and institution: "A man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject."[f] Cognizance of heretical pravity, and animadversion against the heretic himself, is most plainly concredited to St. Titus: for, first, he is to "admonish him," then to "reject him," upon his pertinacity, from the catholic communion. "Cogere autem illos videtur, qui sæpe corripit," saith St. Ambrose, upon the establishing a coactive or coercive jurisdiction, over the clergy and whole diocess.

But I need not specify any more particulars; for St. Paul committed to St. Titus, πᾶσαν ἐπιταγὴν, "all authority and power."[g] The consequence is that, which St. Ambrose prefixes to the commentary on his epistle: Titum apostolus consecravit episcopum, et ideò commonet eum ut sit solicitus in ecclesiasticâ ordinatione, id est, ad quosdam, qui simulatione quâdam dignos se ostentabant ut sublimem ordinem tenerent, simulque et hæreticos ex circumcisione corripiendos."

And now, after so fair preparatory of Scripture, we may hear the testimonies of antiquity witnessing, that Titus was by St. Paul made bishop of Crete. "Sed et Lucas," saith Eusebius, "in Actibus Apostolorum, Timothei meminit et Titi; quorum alter in Epheso episcopus; alter ordinandis apud Cretam ecclesiis ab eo ordinatus præficitur."[h] That is it which St. Ambrose expresses something more plainly: "Titum apostolus consecravit episcopum;" "The apostle consecrated Titus, bishop;"[i] and Theodoret calling Titus, "Cretensium episcopum," "the bishop of the Cretans." And for this reason saith, St. Paul did not write to Sylvanus, or Silas, or Clemens, but to Timothy and Titus,[k] ὅτι τούτοις ἤδη ἐκκλησίας ἦν ἐγκεχειρικώς, "because to these he had already committed the government of churches." But a fuller testimony of St. Titus being a bishop, who please may see, in St. Jerome,[l] in Dorotheus,[m] in Isidore,[n] in Vincentius,[o] in Theodoret,[p] in St. Gregory,[q] in Primasius,[r] in Sedulius,[s] Theophylact,[t] and Nicephorus.[u] To which if we add the subscription of the epistle, asserted from all impertinent objections, by the clearer testimony of St. Athanasius,[v] St. Jerome,[w] the Syriac translation, Œcumenius,[x] and Theophylact,[y] no confident denial can ever break through, or escape conviction.

And now I know not what objection can fairly be made here; for I hope St. Titus was no "evangelist." He is not called so in Scripture, and all antiquity calls him "a bishop;" and the nature of his offices, the eminence of his dignity, the superiority of jurisdiction, the cognizance of causes criminal, and the epistle, proclaim him "bishop." But suppose awhile Titus had been an evangelist, I would fain know who succeeded him? or did all his office expire with his person? If so, then who shall reject heretics, when Titus is dead? Who shall silence factious preachers? If not, then still, who succeeded him? The presbyters? How can that be? For if they had more power after his death than before, and governed the churches, which before they did not; then, to be sure, their government in common is not an apostolical ordinance, much less is it a divine right, for it is postnate to them both. But if they had no more power after Titus, than they had under him, how then could they succeed him? There was, indeed, a dereliction of the authority, but no succession. The succession, therefore, both in the metropolis of Crete, and also in the other cities, was made by singular persons, not by a college; for so we find in the διαδοχαὶ, recorded by Eusebius, that in Gnossus, of Crete, Pinytus was a most eminent bishop, and that Philip was the metropolitan at Gortyna; "Sed et Pinytus nobilissimus apud Cretam in episcopis fuit," saith Eusebius.[z] But of this enough.

SECTION XVI.

St. Mark at Alexandria.

My next instance shall be of one that was an evangelist indeed, one that writ the gospel, and he was a bishop of Alexandria. In Scripture we find nothing of him, but that he was an evangelist and a deacon; for he was deacon to St. Paul and Barnabas, when they went to the gentiles, by ordination and special designment, made at Antioch; συμπαραλαβόντες Ἰωάννην τὸν ἐπικληθέντα Μάρκον. "They had John to be their minister; viz. John, whose surname was Mark."[a] But we are not to expect all the ordinations made by the apostles in their Acts, written by St. Luke, which end at St. Paul's first going to Rome; but many other things, their founding of divers churches, their ordination of bishops, their journeys, their persecutions, their miracles and martyrdoms, are recorded, and rely upon the faith of the primitive church. And yet the ordination of St. Mark was within the term of St. Luke's story; for his successor, "Anianus, was made bishop of Alexandria in the eighth year of Nero's reign, five or six years before the death of St. Paul." "Igitur Neronis primo imperii anno, post Marcum evangelistam, ecclesiæ apud Alexandriam Anianus sacerdotium suscepit;" so the Latin of Ruffinus reads it, instead of "octavo." "Sacerdotium," λειτουργίαν, that is, "the bishopric;" for else there were many λείτουργοι and priests in Alexandria besides him; and how then he should be St. Mark's successor, more than the other presbyters, is not so soon to be contrived. But so the collecta of the chapter runs: "Quod post Marcum primus episcopus Alexandrinæ ecclesiæ ordinatus sit Anianus;" "Anianus was consecrated the first bishop of Alexandria, after St. Mark." And Philo, the Jew, telling the story of the christians in Alexandria, called by the inhabitants, "Cultores," and "Cultrices," "the worshippers," "Addit autem adhuc his," saith Eusebius; "quomodo sacerdotes vel ministri exhibeant officia sua, vel quæ sit supra omnia episcopalis apicis sedes;" intimating that, beside the offices of priests and ministers, there was an episcopal dignity, which was "apex super omnia," "a height above all employments," established at Alexandria: and how soon that was, is soon computed; for Philo lived in our blessed Saviour's time, and was ambassador to the emperor Caius, and survived St. Mark a little.

But St. Jerome will strike up this business. "A Marco evangelistâ ad Heraclam usque et Dionysium episcopos, presbyteri Ægypti semper unum ex se electum in celsiori gradu collocatum episcopum nominabant." And again, "Marcus interpres apostoli Petri, et Alexandrinæ ecclesiæ primus episcopus."[b] The same is witnessed by St. Gregory,[c] Nicephorus,[d] and divers others.

Now, although the ordination of St. Mark is not specified in the Acts, as innumerable multitudes of things more, and scarce any thing at all of any of the twelve but St. Peter, nothing of St. James the son of Thaddæus, nor of Alpheus, but the martyrdom of one of them; nothing of St. Bartholomew, of St. Thomas, of Simon Zelotes, of St. Jude the apostle; scarce any of their names recorded; yet no wise man can distrust the faith of such records, which all christendom hitherto, so far as we know, hath acknowledged as authentic; and these ordinations cannot possibly go less than apostolical, being done in the apostles' times, to whom the care of all the churches was concredited, they seeing and beholding several successions in several churches before their death; as here at Alexandria, first St. Mark, then Anianus, made bishop five or six years before the death of St. Peter and St. Paul. But yet, who it was that ordained St. Mark bishop of Alexandria, (for bishop he was most certainly,) is not obscurely intimated by the most excellent man, St. Gelasius, in the Roman council, "Marcus à Petro apostolo in Ægyptum directus, verbum veritatis prædicavit, et gloriosè consummavit martyrium."[e] St. Peter sent him into Egypt to found a church, and, therefore, would furnish him with all things requisite for so great employment; and that could be no less than the ordinary power apostolical.

SECTION XVII.

St. Linus and St. Clement at Rome.

But in the church of Rome, the ordination of bishops by the apostles, and their successions during the times of the apostles, is very manifest, by a concurrent testimony of old writers. "Fundantes igitur, et instruentes beati apostoli ecclesiam Lino episcopatum administrandæ ecclesiæ tradiderunt. Hujus Lini Paulus in his, quæ sunt ad Timotheum, epistolis meminit. Succedit autem ei Anacletus, post eum tertio loco ab apostolis episcopatum sortitur Clemens, qui et vidit ipsos apostolos, et contulit cum eis, cum adhuc insonantem prædicationem apostolorum, et traditionem ante oculos haberet." So St. Irenæus.[f] "Memoratur autem ex comitibus Pauli Crescens quidam ad Gallias esse præfectus; Linus vero et Clemens in urbe Româ ecclesiæ præfuisse."[g] Many more testimonies there are of these men's being ordained bishops of Rome by the apostles; as of Tertullian,[h] Optatus,[i] St. Augustin,[k] and St. Jerome.[l] But I will not cloy my reader with variety of one dish, and be tedious in a thing so evident and known.

SECTION XVIII.

St. Polycarp at Smyrna, and divers others.

St. John ordained St. Polycarp bishop at Smyrna. "Sicut Smyrnæorum ecclesia habens Polycarpum ab Johanne collocatum refert; sicut Romanorum Clementem à Petro ordinatum edit, proinde utique et cæteræ exhibent quos ab apostolis in episcopatum constitutos apostolici seminis traduces habeant." So Tertullian.[a] "The church of Smyrna saith that Polycarp was placed there by St. John, as the church of Rome saith that Clement was ordained there by St. Peter; and other churches have those whom the apostles made to be their bishops." "Polycarpus autem non solum ab apostolis edoctus ——sed etiam ab apostolis in Asiâ, in eâ quæ est Smyrnis ecclesiâ, constitutus episcopus——et testimonium his perhibent quæ sunt in Asiâ, ecclesiæ omnes, et qui usque adhuc successerunt Polycarpo," &c. The same also is witnessed by St. Jerome, and Eusebius:[b] "Quoniam autem valde longum est in tali volumine omnium ecclesiarum successiones enumerare," to use St. Irenæus's expression. It were an infinite labour to reckon up all those whom the apostles made bishops with their own hands, as Dionysius[c] the Areopagite at Athens, Caius[d] at Thessalonica, Archippus[e] at Colosse, Onesimus[f] at Ephesus, Antipas[g] at Pergamus, Epaphroditus[h] at Philippi, Crescens[i] among the Gauls, Evodias[k] at Antioch, Sosipater[l] at Iconium, Erastus in Macedonia, Trophimus at Arles, Jason at Tarsus, Silas at Corinth, Onesiphorus at Colophon, Quartus at Berytus, Paul, the proconsul, at Narbona, besides many more whose names are not recorded in Scripture, as these fore-cited are, so many as Eusebius[m] counts impossible to enumerate; it shall therefore suffice to sum up this digest of their acts and ordinations in those general foldings used by the fathers, saying that the apostles did ordain bishops in all churches, that the succession of bishops, down from the apostles' first ordination of them, was the only argument to prove their churches catholic, and their adversaries, who could not do so, to be heretical. This also is very evident, and of great consideration in the first ages, while their tradition was clear and evident, and not so bepuddled as it since hath been with the mixture of heretics, striving to spoil that which did so much mischief to their causes.

"Edant origines ecclesiarum suarum, evolvant ordinem episcoporum suorum ita per successiones ab initio decurrentem, ut primus ille episcopus aliquem ex apostolis, aut apostolicis viris, habuerit auctorem et antecessorem, hoc modo ecclesiæ apostolicæ census suos deferunt," &c. And when St. Irenæus had reckoned twelve successions in the church of Rome from the apostles, "nunc duodecimo loco ab apostolis episcopatum habet Eleutherius. Hâc ordinatione," saith he, "et successione, et ea quæ est ab apostolis in ecclesiâ traditio et veritatis præconiatio pervenit usque ad nos; et est plenissima hæc ostensio unam et eandem vivatricem fidem esse, quæ in ecclesiâ ab apostolis usque nunc sit conservata, et tradita in veritate."[n] So that this succession of bishops from the apostles' ordination, must of itself be a very certain thing, when the church made it a main probation of their faith; for the books of Scripture were not all gathered together and generally received as yet. Now then, since this was a main pillar of their christianity, viz. a constant reception of it from hand to hand, as being delivered by the bishops in every chair, till we come to the very apostles that did ordain them; this, I say, being their proof, although it could not be more certain than the thing to be proved, which in that case was a Divine revelation, yet to them it was more evident, as being matter of fact, and known almost by evidence of sense, and as verily believed by all, as it was by any one, that himself was baptized, both relying upon the report of others. "Radix christianæ societatis per sedes apostolorum, et successiones episcoporum, certâ per orbem propagatione diffunditur," saith St. Augustin:[o] "The very root and foundation of christian communion is spread all over the world, by the successions of apostles and bishops.

And is it not now a madness to say there was no such thing, no succession of bishops in the churches apostolical, no ordination of bishops by the apostles; and so, as St. Paul's phrase is, "overthrow the faith of some," even of the primitive christians, that used this argument as a great weapon of offence against the invasion of heretics and factious people? It is enough for us that we can truly say, with St. Irenæus, "Habemus annumerare eos qui ab apostolis instituti sunt episcopi in ecclesiis usque ad nos:" "We can reckon those, who, from the apostles until now, were made bishops in the churches;"[p] and of this we are sure enough, if there be any faith in christians.

SECTION XIX.

So that Episcopacy is at least an Apostolical Ordinance, of the same Authority with many other Points generally believed.

THE sum is this. Although we had not proved the immediate Divine institution of episcopal power over presbyters and the whole flock, yet episcopacy is not less than an apostolical ordinance, and delivered to us by the same authority that the observation of the Lord's day is. For, for that in the New Testament we have no precept, and nothing but the example of the primitive disciples meeting in their Synaxes upon that day, and so also they did on the Saturday in the Jewish synagogues, but yet (however that at Geneva they were once in meditation to have changed it into a Thursday meeting, to have shown their christian liberty) we should think strangely of those men that called the Sunday-festival less than an apostolical ordinance; and necessary now to be kept holy with such observances as the church hath appointed.

Baptism of infants is most certainly a holy and charitable ordinance, and of ordinary necessity to all that ever cried, and yet the church hath founded this rite upon the tradition of the apostles; and wise men do easily observe, that the anabaptist can, by the same probability of Scripture, enforce a necessity of communicating infants upon us, as we do of baptizing infants upon them, if we speak of immediate Divine institution, or of practice apostolical recorded in Scripture; and therefore a great master of Geneva, in a book he wrote against the anabaptists, was forced to fly to apostolical traditive ordination, and therefore the institution of bishops must be served first, as having fairer plea, and clearer evidence in Scripture, than the baptizing of infants, and yet they that deny this are, by the just anathema of the catholic church, confidently condemned for heretics.

Of the same consideration are divers other things in christianity, as the presbyters consecrating the eucharist; for if the apostles in the first institution did represent the whole church, clergy and laity, when Christ said "Hoc facite," "Do this," then why may not every christian man there represented do that, which the apostles, in the name of all, were commanded to do? If the apostles did not represent the whole church, why then do all communicate? Or what place or intimation of Christ's saying, is there in all the four gospels, limiting "hoc facite," id est, "benedicite," to the clergy, and extending "hoc facite," id est, "accipite et manducate," to the laity? This also rests upon the practice apostolical and traditive interpretation of holy church, and yet cannot be denied that so it ought to be, by any man that would not have his christendom suspected.

To these I add the communion of women, the distinction of books apocryphal from canonical, that such books were written by such evangelists and apostles, the whole tradition of Scripture itself, the apostles' creed, the feast of Easter (which, amongst all them that cry up the Sunday-festival for a Divine institution, must needs prevail as "caput institutionis," it being that for which the Sunday is commemorated). These, and divers others of greater consequence, (which I dare not specify for fear of being misunderstood,) rely but upon equal faith with this of episcopacy, (though I should wave all the arguments for immediate Divine ordinance,) and therefore it is but reasonable it should be ranked amongst the "credenda" of christianity, which the church hath entertained upon the confidence of that which we call "the faith of a christian," whose Mater is truth itself.

SECTION XX.

And was an Office of Power and great Authority.

What their power and eminence was, and the appropriates of their office so ordained by the apostles, appears also by the testimonies before alleged, the expressions whereof run in these high terms: "Episcopatus administrandæ ecclesiæ in Lino:" "Linus's bishopric was the administration of the whole church." "Ecclesiæ præfuisse" was said of him and Clemens; they were both "prefects of the church," or "prelates;" that is the church-word. "Ordinandis apud Cretam ecclesiis præficitur," so Titus; "He is set over all the affairs of the new-founded churches in Crete." "In celsiori gradu collocatus," "placed in a higher order or degree;" so the bishop of Alexandria, chosen "ex presbyteris," "from amongst the presbyters." "Supra omnia episcopalis apicis;" so Philo of that bishopric; "The seat of episcopal height above all things in christianity." These are its honours. Its offices these: τὰ λείποντα ἐπιδιορθῶσαι, ἐπιστομίζειν ἀνυποτάκτους, καὶ ματαιολόγους, &c. "To set in order whatsoever he sees wanting, or amiss; to silence vain prating preachers, that will not submit to their superiors, to ordain elders, to rebuke delinquents, to reject heretics," viz. from the communion of the faithful, (for else why was the angel of the church of Pergamus reproved for tolerating the Nicolaitan heretics, but that it was in his power to eject them? And the same is the case of the angel of Thyatira in permitting the woman to teach and seduce the people,) but to the bishop was committed the cognizance of causes criminal, and particularly of presbyters, (so to Timothy in the instance formerly alleged,) nay πᾶσα ἐπιταγὴ, "all authority," so in the case of Titus, and "officium regendæ ecclesiæ," "the office of ruling the church," so to them all whom the apostles left in the several churches respectively, which they had new founded. So Eusebius.[b] For the bishop was ἐπὶ πᾶσι καθεστὼς, "set over all," clergy and laity, saith St. Clement.

This was given to bishops by the apostles themselves, and this was not given to presbyters, as I have already proved; and for the present it will sufficiently appear in this, that bishops had power over presbyters, which cannot be supposed they had over themselves, unless they could be their own superiors.

[b] Ubi supra, apud Euseb. lib. iii. c. 23.

SECTION XXI.

Not lessened by the Assistance and Counsel of Presbyters.

But a council, or college of presbyters might have jurisdiction over any one, and such colleges there were in the apostles' times, and they did "in communi ecclesiam regere," "govern the church in common with the bishop;" as saith St. Jerome, viz. where there was a bishop; and where there was none, they ruled without him. This indeed will call us to a new account; and it relies upon the testimony of St. Jerome, which I will set down here, that we may leave the sun without a cloud.[a] St. Jerome's words are these: "Idem est enim presbyter quod episcopus, et antequam diaboli instinctu studia in religione fierent, et diceretur in populis, 'Ego sum Pauli, Ego Apollo, Ego autem Cephæ,' communi presbyterorum concilio ecclesiæ gubernabantur. Postquam verò unusquisque eos quos baptizabat, suos putabat esse, non Christi, in toto orbe decretum est, ut unus de presbyteris electus superponeretur cæteris, ut schismatum semina tollerentur."

Then he brings some arguments to confirm his saying, and sums them up thus: "Hæc diximus, ut ostenderemus apud veteres eosdem fuisse presbyteros quos episcopos, et ut episcopi noverint se magis ecclesiæ consuetudine quàm Dominicæ dispositionis veritate presbyteris esse majores: et in communi debere ecclesiam regere," &c.

The thing St. Jerome aims to prove, is the identity of bishop, presbyter, and their government of the church in common. For their identity, it is clear that St. Jerome does not mean it in respect of order, as if a bishop and a presbyter had both one office "per omnia" one power; for else he contradicts himself most apertly; for, in his epistle ad Evagrium "Quid facit?" saith he, "episcopus acceptâ ordinatione quod presbyter non faciat?" "A presbyter may not ordain, a bishop does;" which is a clear difference of power, and by St. Jerome is not expressed in matter of fact, but of right, "quod presbyter non faciat," not "non facit;" that a priest may not, must not, do that a bishop does, viz. he gives holy orders. And for matter of fact, St. Jerome knew that in his time a presbyter did not govern in common; but, because he conceived it was fit he should be joined in the common regiment and care of the diocess, therefore, he asserted it as much as he could; and therefore, if St. Jerome had thought that this difference of the power of ordination had been only customary, and by actual indulgence, or encroachment, or positive constitution, and no matter of primitive and original right, St. Jerome was not so diffident but out it should come, what would have come. And suppose St. Jerome, in this distinct power of ordination, had intended it only to be a difference in fact, not in right, (for so some of late have muttered,) then St. Jerome had not said true according to his own principles, for "Quid facit episcopus exceptâ ordinatione quod presbyter non faciat?" had been quickly answered, if the question had only been "de facto;" for the bishop governed the church alone, and so in jurisdiction was greater than presbyters, and this was by custom, and in fact, at least, St. Jerome says it, and the bishop took so much power to himself that "de facto" presbyters were not suffered to do any thing "sine literis episcopalibus," "without leave of the bishop;" and this St. Jerome complained of;[b] so that "de facto" the power of ordination was not the only difference. That then, (if St. Jerome says true,) being the only difference between presbyter and bishop, must be meant "de jure," in matter of right, not "human positive," (for that is coincident with the other power of jurisdiction, which, "de facto," and at least by a human right, the bishop had over presbyters,) but "divine;" and then this identity of bishop and presbyter, by St. Jerome's own confession, cannot be meant in respect of order, but that episcopacy is, by Divine right, a superior order to the presbyterate.

Add to this, that the arguments which St. Jerome uses in this discourse, are to prove that bishops are sometimes called "presbyters." To this purpose he urges Acts xx., and Philippians i., and the epistles to Timothy and Titus, and some others, but all driving to the same issue. To what? No to prove that presbyters are sometimes called presbyters; for who doubts that? But that bishops are so, may be of some consideration, and needs a proof and this he undertook. Now that they are so called, must needs infer an identity and a disparity in several respects. An identity, at least of names for else it had been wholly impertinent. A disparity; or else his arguments were to prove "idem affirmari de eodem;" which were a business next to telling pins. Now, then, this disparity must be either in order or jurisdiction. By the former probation it is sure that he means the orders to be disparate; if jurisdiction too, I am content; but the former is most certain, if he stand to his own principles.

This identity, then, which St. Jerome expresses of episcopus and presbyter, must be either in name or in jurisdiction. I know not certainly which he means, for his arguments conclude only for the identity of names, but his conclusion is for identity of jurisdiction: "Et in communi debere ecclesiam regere," is the intent of his discourse, If he means the first, viz. that of names, it is well enough, there is no harm done, it is "in confesso apud omnes;" but concludes nothing, as I shall show hereafter; but because he intends, so far as may be guessed by his words, a parity and concurrence of jurisdiction, this must be considered distinctly.

1, Then: In the first founding of churches, the apostles did appoint presbyters and inferior ministers, with a power of baptizing, preaching, consecrating, and reconciling, "in privato foro;" but did not in every church, at the first founding it, constitute a bishop. This is evident in Crete, in Ephesus, in Corinth, at Rome, at Antioch.

2. Where no bishops were constituted, there the apostles kept the jurisdiction in their own hands: "There comes upon me," saith St. Paul, "daily the care (or supravision) of all the churches." Not all "absolutely," for not all of the circumcision, but all "of his charge," with which he was once charged, and of which he had not exonerated himself by constituting bishops there, for of these there is the same reason. And again: "If any man obey not our word, διὰ τῆς ἐπιστολῆς τοῦτον σημειοῦσθε, signify him to me by an epistle;" so he charges the Thessalonians,[c] and therefore of this church, St. Paul as yet clearly kept the power in his own hands. So that the church was ever, in all the parts of it, governed by episcopal or apostolical authority.

3. For aught appears in Scripture, the apostles never gave any external or coercive jurisdiction in public and criminal causes, nor yet power to ordain rites or ceremonies, or to inflict censures, to a college of mere presbyters. The contrary may be greedily swallowed, and I know not with how great confidence, and prescribing prejudice; but there is not in all Scripture any commission from Christ, any ordinance or warrant from the apostles, to any presbyter, or college of presbyters without a bishop, or express delegation of apostolical authority, "tanquam vicario suo," as to his "substitute," in absence of the bishop or apostle, to inflict any censures, or take cognizance of persons and causes criminal. Presbyters might be "surrogati in locum episcopi absentis," but never had any ordinary jurisdiction given them by virtue of their ordination, or any commission from Christ or his apostles.

[b] Ad Nepotian. et de 7. Ordin. Eccles.

[c] 2 Thess. iii. 14.

This we may best consider by induction of particulars.

1. There was a presbytery at Jerusalem, but they had a bishop always, and the college of the apostles sometimes: therefore, whatsoever act they did, it was in conjunction with, and subordination to, the bishop and apostles. Now it cannot be denied, both that the apostles were superior to all the presbyters in Jerusalem, and also had power alone to govern the church. I say they had power to govern alone, for they had the government of the church alone before they ordained the first presbyters, that is, before there were any of capacity to join with them, they must do it themselves, and then also they must retain the same power, for they could not lose it by giving orders. Now, if they had a power of sole jurisdiction, then the presbyters, being in some public acts in conjunction with the apostles, cannot challenge a right of governing as affixed to their order, they only assisting in subordination, and by dependency.

This only by the way: In Jerusalem the presbyters were something more than ordinary, and were not mere presbyters in the present and limited sense of the word. For Barnabas, and Judas, and Silas (ἀνδρὰς ἡγουμένους, St. Luke calls them[d]) were of that presbytery. Καὶ αὐτοὶ προφῆται ὄντες. They were rulers, and prophets, chief men amongst the brethren, and yet called elders or presbyters, though of apostolical power and authority, ὅτι καὶ πρεσβυτέρων εἶχον ἀξίαν οἱ ἀπόστολοι, saith Œcumenius.[e] For truth is, that divers of them were ordained apostles with an unlimited jurisdiction, not fixed upon any see, that they also might, together with the twelve, "exire in totum mundum." So that, in this presbytery, either they were more than mere presbyters, as Barnabas, and Judas, and Silas, men of apostolical power, and they might well be in conjunction with the twelve; and with the bishop they were of equal power, not by virtue of their presbyterate, but by their apostolate; or if they were but mere presbyters, yet because it is certain, and proved, and confessed, that the apostles had power to govern the church alone, this their taking mere "presbyteros in partem regiminis," was a voluntary act, and from this example was derived to other churches; and then it is most true, that "presbyteros in communi ecclesiam regere," was rather "consuetudine ecclesiæ, quàm Dominicæ dispositionis veritate," to use St. Jerome's own expression; for this is more evident than that bishops do "eminere cæteris," by custom rather than Divine institution. For if the apostles might rule the church alone, then that the presbyters were taken into the number was a voluntary act of the apostles; and although fitting to be retained where the same reasons do remain, and circumstances concur, yet not necessary, because not affixed to their order; not "Dominicæ dispositionis veritate," and not laudable when those reasons cease, and there is an emergency of contrary causes.

2. The next presbytery we read of is at Antioch; but there we find no acts either of concurrent or single jurisdiction, but of ordination indeed we do, and that performed by such men as St. Paul was, and Barnabas,[f] for they were two of the prophets reckoned in the church of Antioch, but I do not remember them to be called "presbyters in that place;" to be sure they were not mere presbyters as we now understand the word; as I proved formerly.

3. But in the church of Ephesus there was a college of presbyters, and they were, by the Spirit of God, called bishops, and were appointed by him to be pastors of the church of God. This must do it or nothing, "In quo Spiritus Sanctus posuit vos episcopos:" "In whom the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops."[g] There must lie the exigence of the argument, and if we can find who is meant by "vos," we shall, I hope, gain the truth. St. Paul sent for the presbyters or elders, to come from Ephesus to Miletus, and to them he spoke. It is true, but that is not all the "vos." For there were present at that sermon Sopater, and Aristarchus, and Secundus, and Gaius, and Timothy, and Tychicus, and Trophimus,[h] and although he sent to Ephesus, as to the metropolis, and there many elders were, either accidentally or by ordinary residence, yet those were not all elders of that church, but of all Asia; in the Scripture sense, the Lesser Asia. For so, in the preface of his sermon. St. Paul intimates: "Ye know that from the first day I came into Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons."[i] His whole conversation in Asia was not confined to Ephesus, and yet those elders who were present, were witnesses of it all, and, therefore, were of dispersed habitation; and so it is more clearly inferred from verse 25: "And now behold I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God," &c. It was a travel to preach to all that were present, and, therefore, most certainly they were inhabitants of places very considerably distant.

Now, upon this ground, I will raise these considerations.

1. If there be a confusion of names in Scripture, particularly of episcopus and presbyter, as it is contended for on one side, and granted on all sides, then where both the words are used, what shall determine the signification? For whether (to instance in this place) shall "presbyter" limit "episcopus," or "episcopus" extend "presbyter?" Why may not presbyter signify one that is verily a bishop, as episcopus signify a mere presbyter? For it is but an ignorant conceit, wherever presbyter is named, to fancy it in the proper and limited sense, and not to do so with episcopus; and when they are joined together, rather to believe it in the limited and present sense of presbyter, than in the proper and present sense of episcopus. So that as yet we are indifferent upon the terms. These men sent for from Ephesus, are called πρεσβύτεροι τῆς ἐκκλησίας, "elders" or "presbyters of the church;" but at Miletus, "Spiritus Sanctus posuit vos episcopos," there they are called "bishops" or overseers. So, that I may as well say here, "properly so called bishops," as another may say, "here were mere presbyters." And lest it be objected in prejudice of my affirmative, that they could not be bishops because they were of Ephesus, there never being but one bishop in one church; I answer, that in the apostles' times this was not true. For at Jerusalem there were many at the same time, that had episcopal and apostolical authority, and so at Antioch: as at Jerusalem were James, and Judas, and Silas, and the apostles; and Paul and Barnabas at Antioch, and at Rome, at the same time, Peter, and Paul, and Linus, and Clemens; but yet one of them was fixed, and properly the bishop of that place. But secondly; All these were not of Ephesus, but the elders of all Asia, but some from other countries, as appears verse 4. So that although they were all bishops, we might easily find distinct diocesses for them, without encumbering the church of Ephesus with a multiplied incumbency. Thus far then we are upon even terms; the community of compellations used here, can no more force us to believe them all to be mere presbyters than bishops, in the proper sense.

2. It is very certain, that they were not all mere presbyters at his farewell sermon; for St. Timothy was there, and I proved him to be a bishop by abundant testimony, and many of those which are reckoned, verse 4. were companions of the apostle in his journey; and employed, in mission apostolical, for the founding of churches; and particularly Sopater was there, and he was bishop of Iconium, and Tychicus, of Chalcedon in Bithynia, as Dorotheus and Eusebius witness;[k] and Trophimus, of Arles in France; for so it is witnessed by the suffragans of that province, in their epistle to St. Leo. But without all doubt, here were bishops present as well as presbyters, for, besides the premises, we have a witness beyond exception, the ancient St. Irenæus: "In Mileto enim convocatis episcopis et presbyteris qui erant ab Epheso, et à reliquis proximis civitatibus, quoniam ipse festinavit Hierosolymis Pentecosten agere," &c.; St. Paul, making haste to keep his Pentecost at Jerusalem, "at Miletus did call together the bishops and presbyters from Ephesus, and the neighbouring cities."[l] Now to all these in conjunction, St. Paul spoke, and to these indeed the Holy Ghost had concredited his church to be fed, and taught with pastoral supravision; but, in the mean while, here is no commission of power, or jurisdiction to presbyters distinctly, nor supposition of any such pre-existent power.

3. All that St. Paul said in this narration, was spoken in the presence of them all, but not to them all. For that of verse 18. "Ye know how I have been with you in Asia in all seasons:" that indeed was spoken to all the presbyters that came from Ephesus and the voisinage, viz. in a collective sense, not in a distributive, for each of them was not in al the circuit of his Asian travels; but this was no spoken to Sopater, the Berean, or to Aristarchus the Thessalonian, but to Tychicus and Trophimus who were Asians, it might be addressed. And fo that of verse 25. "Ye all among whom I have gon preaching, shall see my face no more; this wa directed only to the Asians, for he was never mor to come thither; but Timothy, to be sure, saw hir afterwards, for St. Paul sent for him, a little befor his death, to Rome, and it will not be supposed h neglected to attend him. So that if there were conjunction of bishops and presbyters at his meetin as most certainly there was, and of evangelists an apostolical men besides, how shall it be known, o indeed with any probability suspected, that claus of verse 28. "Spiritus Sanctus posuit vos episcopo pascere ecclesiam Dei," does belong to the Ephesin presbyters, and not particularly to Timothy, wh was now actually bishop of Ephesus, and to Gaius and to the other apostolical men, who had, at leas episcopal authority, that is, power of founding an ordering churches without a fixed and limited juri diction.

4. Either in this place is no jurisdiction at all in timated "de antiquo," or concredited "de novo," or if there be, it is in the word ἐπισκόπους an ποιμαίνειν, verse 28. "bishops" and "feeders;" and then it belongs to the presbyters in conjunctio with, and subordination to, the bishops; for to th mere presbyters it cannot be proved to appertain, b any intimation of that place.

5. How and if these presbyters, which came fro Ephesus, and the other parts of Asia, were mad bishops at Miletus? Then also this way all difficult will be removed. And that so it was, is more tha probable; for to be sure, Timothy was now enterin and fixing upon his see; and it was consonant t the practice of the apostles, and the exigence of th thing itself, when they were to leave a church, t fix a bishop in it; for why else was a bishop fixe in Jerusalem so long before any other churches, bu because the apostles were to be scattered from thence and there the first bloody field of martyrdom was t be fought. And the case was equal here, for St Paul was never to see the churches of Asia an more; and foresaw that ravening wolves would en ter into the folds, and he had actually placed bishop in Ephesus; and it is unimaginable, that h would not make equal provision for other churches there being the same necessity, from the same dan ger, in them all, and either St. Paul did it now o never; and that about this time, the other six Asia churches had angels or bishops set in their candle sticks, is plain, for there had been a succession in th church of Pergamus; Antipas was dead, and St. Timo thy had sat in Ephesus, and St. Polycarp at Smyr na, many years before St. John writ his revelation

6. Lastly: That no jurisdiction was in the Ephe sine presbyters, except a delegate and subordinate appears beyond all exception, by St. Paul's firs epistle to Timothy, establishing in the person o Timothy power of coercitive jurisdiction over pres byters, and ordination in him alone, without the conjunction of any in commission with him, for aught appears either there or elsewhere.

[k] Ubi supra.

4. The same also, in the case of the Cretan presbyters, is clear. For what power had they of jurisdiction? For that is it we now speak of. If they had none before St. Titus came, we are well enough at Crete. If they had, why did St. Paul take it from them, to invest Titus with it? Or if he did not, to what purpose did he send Titus with all those powers before mentioned? For either the presbyters of Crete had jurisdiction, in causes criminal, equal to Titus after his coming, or they had not. If they had not, then either they had no jurisdiction at all, or whatsoever it was in subordination to him, they were his inferiors, and he their ordinary judge and governor.

5. One thing more before this be left, must be considered concerning the church of Corinth, for there was power of excommunication in the presbytery when they had no bishop, for they had none of divers years after the founding of the church, and yet St. Paul reproves them for not ejecting the incestuous person out of the church.

This is it that I said before, that the apostles kept the jurisdiction in their hands where they had founded a church and placed no bishop, for in this case of the Corinthian incest, the apostle did make himself the sole judge: "For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already;" [m] and then, secondly, St. Paul gives the church of Corinth commission and substitution to proceed in this cause, "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together,[n] and my spirit," that is, "my power, my authority," for so he explains himself, "my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, to deliver him over to Satan." And thirdly, as all this power is delegate, so it is but declarative in the Corinthians; for St. Paul had given sentence before, and they of Corinth were to publish it. Fourthly; this was a commission given to the whole assembly, and no more concerns the presbyters than the people, and so some have contended; but so it is, but will serve neither of their turns, neither for an independent presbytery, nor a conjunctive popularity. As for St. Paul's reproving them for not inflicting censures on the peccant, I have often heard it confidently averred, but never could see ground for it. The suspicion of it is verse 2: "And ye are puffed up, and have not rather mourned; that he that hath done this deed, might be taken away from among you:" taken away: but by whom? that is the question. Not by them, to be sure. For "taken away from you," implies that it is by the power of another, not by their act, for no man can take away any thing from himself, he may "put it away," not "take it," the expression had been very imperfect if this had been his meaning. Well then; in all these instances, viz. of Jerusalem, Antioch, Ephesus, Crete, and Corinth, (and these are all I can find in Scripture of any consideration in the present question,) all the jurisdiction was originally in the apostles, while there was no bishop, or in the bishop, when there was any; and yet that the presbyters were joined in the ordering church affairs, I will not deny, to wit, by voluntary assuming them, "in partem sollicitudinis," and by delegation of power apostolical, or episcopal, and by way of assistance in acts deliberative and consiliary, though I find this no where specified but in the church of Jerusalem, where I proved that the elders were men of more power than mere presbyters, men of apostolical authority. But here lies the issue and strain of the question.

Presbyters had no jurisdiction in causes criminal, and pertaining to the public regiment of the church, by virtue of their order, or without particular substitution and delegation. For there is not in all Scripture any commission given by Christ to mere presbyters, no Divine institution of any power of regiment in the presbytery; no constitution apostolical, that mere presbyters should either alone, or in conjunction with the bishop, govern the church; no example in all Scripture of any censure inflicted by any mere presbyters, either upon clergy or laity; no specification of any power that they had so to do; but to churches where colleges of presbyters were resident, bishops were sent by apostolical ordination; not only with power of imposition of hands, but of excommunication, of taking cognizance even of causes and actions of presbyters themselves, as to Titus, and Timothy, the angel of the church of Ephesus; and there is also example of delegation of power of censures from the apostle to a church, where many presbyters were fixed, as in the case of the Corinthian delinquent before specified, which delegation was needless, if coercitive jurisdiction, by censures, had been by Divine right in a presbyter, or a whole college of them.

Now then return we to the consideration of St. Jerome's saying: "The church was governed (saith he) 'communi presbyterorum consilio,' by the common council of presbyters." But,

1. "Quo jure" was this? That the bishops are superior to those which were then called presbyters, by custom rather than Divine disposition, St. Jerome affirms; but that presbyters were joined with the apostles and bishops at first, by what right was that? Was not that also by custom and condescension, rather than by Divine disposition? St. Jerome does not say but it was. For he speaks only of matter of fact, not of right; it might have been otherwise, though, "de facto," it was so in some places.

2. "Communi presbyterorum consilio" is true in the church of Jerusalem, where the elders were apostolical men, and had episcopal authority, and something superadded, as Barnabas, and Judas, and Silas, for they had the authority and power of bishops, and an unlimited diocess besides, though afterwards Silas was fixed upon the see of Corinth. But yet even at Jerusalem they actually had a bishop, who was in that place superior to them in jurisdiction, and, therefore, does clearly evince, that the common council of presbyters is no argument against the superiority of a bishop over them.

[m] 1 Cor. v. 3. [n] Verse 4.

3. "Communi presbyterorum consilio" is also true, because the apostles called themselves presbyters, as St. Paul and St. John, in their epistles. Now at the first, many prophets, many elders, (for the words are sometimes used in common,) were, for a while, resident in particular churches, and did govern in common; as at Antioch were Barnabas, and Simeon, and Lucius, and Manaën, and Paul, "communi horum presbyterorum consilio" the church of Antioch for a time was governed; for all these were presbyters, in the sense that St. Peter and St. John were, and the elders of the church of Jerusalem.

4. Suppose this had been true in the sense that any body please to imagine, yet this not being by any Divine ordinance, that presbyters should by their counsel assist in external regiment of the church, neither by any intimation of Scripture, nor by affirmation of St. Jerome, it is sufficient to stifle this by that saying of St. Ambrose; "Postquàm omnibus locis ecclesiæ sunt constitutæ, et officia ordinata, aliter composita res est quam cœperat."[o] It might be so at first "de facto," and yet no need to be so neither then, nor after. For at first Ephesus had no bishop of its own, nor Crete, and there was no need, for St. Paul had the supravision of them, and St. John, and other of the apostles; but yet afterwards St. Paul did send bishops thither; for when themselves were to go away, the power must be concredited to another; and if they, in their absence, before the constituting of a bishop, had intrusted the care of the church with presbyters, yet it was but independence on the apostles, and by substitution, not by any ordinary power, and it ceased at the presence or command of the apostle, or the sending of a bishop to reside. Οἱ πρεσβύτεροι ποιμάνατε τὸ ἐν ὑμῖν ποίμνιον, ἕως ἀναδείξῃ ὁ Θεὸς τὸν μέλλοντα ἄρχειν ὑμῶν.[p] So St. Ignatius, being absent from his church, upon a business of being persecuted, he wrote to his presbyters, "Do you feed the flock amongst you, till God shall show you who shall be your ruler," viz. "my successor: no longer: your commission expires when a bishop comes."

5. To the conclusion of St. Jerome's discourse, viz. "That bishops are not greater than presbyters by the truth of Divine disposition;" I answer, that this is true in this sense, bishops are not, by Divine disposition, greater than all those which, in Scripture, are called presbyters, such as were the elders in the council at Jerusalem, such as were they of Antioch, such as St. Peter and St. John, συμπρεσβύτεροι all, and yet all of them were not bishops in the present sense, that is, of a fixed and particular diocess and jurisdiction.

Secondly: St. Jerome's meaning is also true in this sense, "Bishops, by the truth of the Lord's disposition, are not greater than presbyters," viz. "quoad exercitium actûs," that is, they are not tied to exercise jurisdiction solely in their own persons, but may "asciscere sibi presbyteros in commune consilium," they "may delegate jurisdiction to the presbyters;" and that they did not so, but kept the exercise of it only in their own hands in St. Jerome's time, this is it, which he saith is rather by custom than by Divine dispensation, for it was otherwise at first, viz. "de facto," and might be so still, there being no law of God against the delegation of power episcopal. As for the last words in the objection, "Et in communi debere ecclesiam regere," it is an assumentum of St. Jerome's own; for all his former discourse was of the identity of names, and common regiment "de facto," not "de jure," and from a fact to conclude with a "deberet," is a "non sequitur," unless this "debere" be understood according to the exigence of the former arguments, that is, they ought not by God's law, but in imitation of the practice apostolical; to wit, when things are as they were then, when the presbyters are such as then they were; they ought, for many considerations, and in great cases, not by the necessity of a precept.

And indeed, to do him right, he so explains himself: "Et in communi debere ecclesiam regere, imitantes Moysen, qui cùm haberet in potestate solus præesse populo Israel, septuaginta elegit, cum quibus populum judicaret:"[q] "The presbyters ought to judge in common with the bishop, for the bishops ought to imitate Moses, who might have ruled alone, yet was content to take others to him, and himself only to rule in chief." Thus St. Jerome would have the bishops do, but then he acknowledges the right of sole jurisdiction to be in them, and therefore, though his counsel perhaps might be good then, yet it is necessary at no time, and was not followed then, and to be sure, is needless now. For the arguments which St. Jerome uses to prove this intention, whatever it is, I have, and shall elsewhere produce, for they yield many other considerations than this collection of St. Jerome, and prove nothing less than the equality of the offices of episcopacy and presbyterate. The same thing is "per omnia" respondent to the parallel place of St. Chrysostom: it is needless to repeat either the objection or answer.

But however, this saying of St. Jerome, and the parallel of St. Chrysostom, is but like an argument against an evident truth, which comes forth upon a desperate service, and they are sure to be killed by the adverse party, or to run upon their own swords; for either they are to be understood in the senses above explicated, and then they are impertinent, or else they contradict evidence of Scripture and catholic antiquity, and so are false, and die within their own trenches.

I end this argument of tradition apostolical with that saying of St. Jerome in the same place; "Postquam unusquisque eos quos baptizabat suos putabat esse, non Christi, et diceretur in populis, Ego sum Pauli, Ego Apollo, Ego autem Cephæ, in toto orbe decretum est ut unus de presbyteris electus superponeretur cæteris, ut schismatum semina tollerentur."

[o] In Ephes. iv.

[q] In 1 Tim. iii. Ὅτι οὐ πολὺ τὸ μέσον· καὶ γὰρ αὐτοὶ διδασκαλίαν εἰσὶν ἀναδεδεγμένοι, καὶ προστασίαν· τὴν γὰρ χειροτονίαν μόνην αὐτῶν ἀναβεβήκασι, καὶ τοῦτο μόνον δοκοῦσι πλεονεκτεῖν τοὺς πρέσβυτέρους.—Homil. 11.

That is, "a public decree issued out in the apostles' times, that in all churches one should be chosen out of the clergy, and set over them, viz. to rule and govern the flock committed to his charge. This, I say, was in the apostles' times, even upon the occasion of the Corinthian schism; for then they said, I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and then it was, that he that baptized any catechumens, took them for his own, not as Christ's disciples." So that it was, "tempore apostolorum," that this decree was made; for "in the time of the apostles," St. James, and St. Mark, and St. Timothy, and St. Titus, were made bishops by St. Jerome's express attestation. It was also "toto orbe decretum;" so that if it had not been proved to have been an immediate Divine institution, yet it could not have gone much less, it being, as I have proved, and as St. Jerome acknowledges, catholic and apostolic.

SECTION XXII.

And all this hath been the Faith and Practice of Christendom.

"BE ye followers of me as I am of Christ," is an apostolical precept. We have seen how the apostles have followed Christ, how their tradition is consequent of Divine institution: next let us see how the church hath followed the apostles, as the apostles have followed Christ. Catholic practice is the next basis of the power and order of episcopacy. And this shall be "in subsidium," to them also that call for reduction of the state episcopal to a primitive consistence, and for the confirmation of all those pious sons of holy church, who have a venerable estimate of the public and authorized facts of catholic Christendom.

For consider we, is it imaginable, that all the world should, immediately after the death of the apostles, conspire together to seek themselves, and not "ea quæ sunt Jesu Christi;" to erect a government of their own devising, not ordained by Christ, not delivered by his apostles, and to relinquish a Divine foundation, and the apostolical superstructure, which, if it was at all, was a part of our Master's will, which whosoever knew, and observed not, was to be beaten with many stripes? Is it imaginable, that those gallant men, who could not be brought off from the prescriptions of gentilism, to the seeming impossibilities of christianity, without evidence of miracle, and clarity of demonstration upon agreed principles, should all, upon their first adhesion to christianity, make a universal dereliction of so considerable a part of their Master's will, and leave gentilism to destroy christianity; for he that erects another economy than what the Master of the family hath ordained, destroys all those relations of mutual dependence, which Christ hath made for the coadunation of all the parts of it, and so destroys it in the formality of a christian congregation or family.

Is it imaginable, that all those glorious martyrs, that were so curious observers of Divine sanctions, and canons apostolical, that so long as that ordinance of the apostles, concerning abstinence from blood, was of force, they would rather die than eat a strangled hen or a pudding, (for so Eusebius relates of the christians, in the particular instance of Biblis and Blandina,) that they would be so sedulous in contemning the government, that Christ left for his family, and erect another?

To what purpose were all their watchings, their banishments, their fears, their fastings, their penances, and formidable austerities, and finally, their so frequent martyrdoms, of what excellency or avail, if, after all, they should be hurried out of this world, and all their fortunes and possessions, by untimely, by disgraceful, by dolorous deaths, to be set before a tribunal, to give account of their universal neglect, and contemning of Christ's last testament, in so great an affair, as the whole government of his church?

If all christendom should be guilty of so open, so united a defiance against their Master, by what argument or confidence can any misbeliever be persuaded to christianity, which, in all its members for so many ages together, is so unlike its first institution, and in its most public affair, and, for matter of order, of the most general concernment, is so contrary to the first birth?

Where are the promises of Christ's perpetual assistance, of the impregnable permanence of the church against the gates of hell, of the Spirit of truth to lead it into all truth, if she be guilty of so grand an error, as to erect a throne where Christ had made all level, or appointed others to sit in it than whom he suffers. Either Christ hath left no government, or most certainly the church hath retained that government, whatsoever it is; for the contradictory to these would either make Christ improvident, or the catholic church extremely negligent (to say no worse) and incurious of her "depositum." But upon the confidence of all christendom, (if there were no more in it,) I suppose we may fairly venture: "Sit anima mea cum christianis."

SECTION XXIII.

Who first distinguished Names, used before in common.

THE first thing done in christendom, upon the death of the apostles, in this matter of episcopacy, is the distinguishing of names, which before were common. For in Holy Scripture all the names of clerical offices were given to the superior order, and particularly all offices, and parts, and persons, designed in any employment of the sacred priesthood, were signified by "presbyter" and "presbyterium." And therefore, lest the confusion of names might persuade an identity and indistinction of office, the wisdom of holy church found it necessary to distinguish and separate orders and offices, by distinct and proper appellations. "For the apostles did know, by our Lord Jesus Christ, that contentions would arise, ἐπὶ τοῦ ὀνόματος τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς, about the name of episcopacy," saith St. Clement;[a] and so it did in the church of Corinth, as soon as their apostle had expired his last breath. But so it was.

1. The apostles, which I have proved to be the supreme ordinary office in the church, and to be succeeded in, were called in Scripture πρεσβύτεροι, "elders" or "presbyters;" πρεσβυτέρους τοὺς ἐν ὑμῖν παρακαλῶ ὁ συμπρεσβύτερος, saith St. Peter the apostle; "The elders or presbyters that are among you, I also, who am an elder or presbyter, do entreat.[b] Such elders St. Peter spoke to, as he was himself, to wit, those to whom the regiment of the church was committed; the bishops of Asia, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, that is, to Timothy, to Tychicus, to Sosipater, to the angels of the Asian churches, and all others, whom himself, in the next words, points out, by the description of their office, ποιμάνατε τὸ ἐν ὑμῖν ποίμνιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἐπισκοποῦντες, &c. "Feed the flock of God as bishops," or "being bishops and overseers over it;" and that to rulers he then spake, is evident by his μὴ κατακυριεύοντες, for it was impertinent to have warned them of "tyranny," that had no rule at all. The mere presbyters, I deny not, but are included in this admonition; for as their office is involved in the bishop's office, the bishop being bishop and presbyter too, so is his duty also in the bishop's; so that, "pro ratâ," the presbyter knows what lies on him, by proportion and intuition to the bishop's admonition. But again: Ὁ πρεσβύτερος ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ, saith St. John the apostle; and ὁ πρεσβύτερος Γαίῳ τῷ ἀγαπητῷ. "The presbyter to Gaius; the presbyter to the elect lady."

2. If apostles be called presbyters, no harm though bishops be called so too; for apostles and bishops are all one in ordinary office, as I have proved formerly. Thus are those apostolical men, in the college at Jerusalem, called presbyters, whom yet the Holy Ghost calleth ἄνδρας ἡγουμένους "principal men, ruling men," and οἱ καλῶς προεστῶτες πρεσβύτεροι, "the presbyters that rule well." By presbyters are meant bishops, to whom only, according to the intention and exigence of Divine institution, the apostle had concredited the church of Ephesus, and the neighbouring cities, "ut solus quisque episcopus præsit omnibus," as appears in the former discourse. The same also is Acts xx. The Holy Ghost hath made you bishops; and yet the same men are called πρεσβύτεροι τῆς ἐκκλησίας. The one place expounds the other, for they are both "ad idem," and speak of elders of the same church.

3. Although bishops be called presbyters, yet, even in Scripture, names are so distinguished, that mere presbyters are never called bishops; unless it be in conjunction with bishops; and then in the general address, which, in all fair deportments, is made to the more eminent, sometimes presbyters are, or may be, comprehended. This observation, if it prove true, will clearly show, that the confusion of names of "episcopus," and "presbyter," such as it is in Scripture, is of no pretence, by any intimation of Scripture, for the indistinction of offices; for even the names in Scripture itself are so distinguished, that a mere presbyter alone is never called a bishop, but a bishop and apostle is often called a presbyter, as in the instances above. But we will consider those places of Scripture, which use to be pretended in those impertinent arguings from the identity of name, to confusion of things, and show that they neither interfere upon the main question, nor this observation: "Paul and Timotheus to all the saints which are in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons." I am more willing to choose this instance, because the place is of much consideration in the whole question, and I shall take this occasion to clear it from prejudice and disadvantage.

By bishops are here meant presbyters, because many bishops in a church could not be, and yet St. Paul speaks plurally of the bishops of the church of Philippi, and therefore must mean mere presbyters; so it is pretended.

1. Then: By "bishops" are, or may be, meant the whole superior order of the clergy, "bishops and priests;" and that he speaks plurally, he may besides the bishops in the church, comprehend under their name the presbyters too; for why may not the name be comprehended as well as the office and order the inferior under the superior, the lesser within the greater; for, since the order of presbyters is involved in the bishops' order, and is not only inclusively in it, but derivative from it, the same name may comprehend both persons, because it does comprehend the distinct offices and orders of them both. And in this sense it is, if it be at all that presbyters are sometimes in Scripture called bishops.

2. Why may not "bishops" be understood properly? For there is no necessity of admitting that there were any mere presbyters at all, at the first founding of this church. It can neither be proved from Scripture, nor antiquity, if it were denied. For indeed a bishop, or a company of episcopal men, as there were at Antioch, might do all that presbyters could, and much more. And considering that there are some necessities of a church, which a presbyter cannot supply, and a bishop can, it is more imaginable that there was no presbyter, than that there was no bishop. And certainly it is most unlikely that what is not expressed, to wit, presbyters, should be only meant, and that which is expressed should not be at all intended.

3. "With the bishops" may be understood in the proper sense, and yet no more bishops in one diocess than one, of a fixed residence; for in that sense is St. Chrysostom and the fathers to be understood in their commentaries on this place, affirming that "one church could have but one bishop;"[c] but then take this along, that it was not then unusual in such great churches, to have many men who were temporary residentiaries, but of an apostolical and episcopal authority, as in the churches of Jerusalem, Rome, Antioch there was, as I have proved in the premises. Nay, in Philippi itself, if I mistake not, an instance may be given full and home to this purpose: "Salutant te episcopi Onesimus, Titus, Demas, Polybius, et omnes qui sunt Philippis in Christo, unde et hæc vobis scripsi," saith Ignatius, in his epistle to Hero, his deacon. So that many bishops, we see, might be at Philippi, and many were actually there long after St. Paul's dictate of the epistle.

[a] Epist. ad Corin.
[b] 1 Pet. v. 1.
[c] Τί τοῦτο; μίας πόλεως ἐπίσκοποι ἦσαν οὐδαμῶς. CHRYS. in Phil. i.

4. Why may not "bishops" be meant in the proper sense? Because there could not be more bishops than one in a diocess. No? By what law? If by a constitution of the church after the apostles' times, that hinders not, but it might be otherwise in the apostles' times. If by a law in the apostles' times, then we have obtained the main question by the shift, and the apostles did ordain that there should be one, and but one, bishop in a church, although it is evident they appointed many presbyters. And then let this objection be admitted how it will, and do its worst, we are safe enough.

5. "With the bishops," may be taken distributively; for Philippi was a metropolis, and had divers bishoprics under it; and St. Paul, writing to the church of Philippi, wrote also to all the daughter-churches within its circuit, and therefore might well salute many bishops, though writing to one metropolis; and this is the more probable, if the reading of this place be accepted according to Œcumenius: for he reads it not σὺν ἐπισκόποις, but συνεπισκόποις, "Co-episcopis, et diaconis," "Paul and Timothy to the saints at Philippi, and to our fellow-bishops."

6. St. Ambrose refers this clause of "cum episcopis, et diaconis," to St. Paul and St. Timothy; intimating, that the benediction and salutation was sent to the saints at Philippi, from St. Paul and St. Timothy with the bishops and deacons, so that the reading must be thus: "Paul and Timothy with the bishops and deacons, to all the saints at Philippi," &c. "Cum episcopis et diaconis, hoc est, cum Paulo, et Timotheo, qui utique episcopi erant, simul et significavit diaconos qui ministrabant ei. Ad plebem enim scribit. Nam si episcopis scriberet, et diaconis, ad personas eorum scriberet, et loci ipsius episcopo scribendum erat, non duobus vel tribus, sicut et ad Titum et Timotheum."[d]

7. The like expression to this is in the epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians, which may give another light to this, speaking of the apostles, καθιστάντας ἀπαρχὰς αὐτῶν εἰς ἐπισκόπους, καὶ διακόνους τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν. "They delivered their first-fruits to the bishops and deacons."[e] "Bishops" here indeed may be taken distributively, and so will not infer that many bishops were collectively in any one church; but yet this gives intimation for another exposition of this clause to the Philippians. For here either presbyters are meant by διακόνους, "ministers;" or else presbyters are not taken care of in the ecclesiastical provision, which no man imagines, of what interest soever he be; it follows then that "bishops and deacons" are no more but "majores," and "minores sacerdotes" in both places; for as "presbyter" and "episcopus" were confounded, so also "presbyter" and "diaconus;" and I think it will easily be shown in Scripture, that the word "diaconus" is given oftener to apostles, and bishops, and presbyters, than to those ministers, which now, by way of appropriation, we call deacons. But of this anon. Now again to the main observation.

Thus also it was in the church of Ephesus; for St. Paul, writing to their bishop, and giving order for the constitution and deportment of the church-orders and officers, gives directions first for bishops, then for deacons.[f] Where are the presbyters in the interim? Either they must be comprehended in bishops or in deacons. They may as well be in one as the other; for "diaconus" is not in Scripture any more appropriated to the inferior clergy, than "episcopus" to the superior, nor so much neither. For "episcopus" was never used in the New Testament for any, but such as had the care, regiment, and supravision of a church, but "diaconus" was used generally for all ministries.

But yet supposing that presbyters were included under the word "episcopus," yet it is not because the offices and orders are one, but because that the order of a presbyter is comprehended within the dignity of a bishop. And then indeed the compellation is of the more principal, and the presbyter is also comprehended, for his conjunction, and involution in the superior, which was the principal observation here intended. "Nam in episcopo omnes ordines sunt, quia primus sacerdos est, hoc est, princeps est sacerdotum, et propheta et evangelista, et cætera adimplenda officia ecclesiæ in ministerio fidelium;" saith St. Ambrose.[g] So that, if, in the description of the qualifications of a bishop, he intends to qualify presbyters also, then it is principally intended for a bishop, and of the presbyters only by way of subordination and comprehension. This only by the way, because this place is also abused to other issues; to be sure it is but a vain dream, that because presbyter is not named, that therefore it is all one with a bishop, when as it may be comprehended under bishop as a part in the whole, or the inferior within the superior, (the office of a bishop having in it the office of a presbyter and something more,) or else it may be as well intended in the word "deacons," and rather than the word "bishop." 1. Because "bishop" is spoken of in the singular number, "deacons" in the plural, and so liker to comprehend the multitude of presbyters. 2. Presbyters, or else bishops, and therefore much more presbyters, are called by St. Paul, διάκονοι, "ministers;" "deacons" is the word; διάκονοι δι' ὧν ἐπιστεύετε, "deacons by whose ministration ye believed." And 3. By the same argument deacons may be as well one with the bishop too; for, in the epistle to Titus, St. Paul describes the office of a bishop, and says not a word more either of presbyter or deacon's office; and why, I pray, may not the office of presbyters in the epistle to Timothy be omitted, as well as presbyters and deacons too in that to Titus? or else why may not deacons be confounded, and be all one with bishop, as well as presbyter? It will, it must be so, if this argument were any thing else but an airy and impertinent nothing.

[g] In Ephes iv. Idem ait S. Dionysius Eccles. Hierarch. cap. v. Ἐν τῇ ἱεραρχικῇ τάξεως δύναμις ἐν πάσαις χωρεῖ ταῖς ἱεραῖς ὁλότησιν, i. e. τάξεσιν καὶ διὰ πασῶν τῶν ἱερῶν τάξεων ἐνεργεῖ τὰ τῆς οἰκείας ἱεραρχίας μυστήρια.

After all this, yet it cannot be shown in Scripture that any one single and mere presbyter is called a bishop; but it may be often found that a bishop, nay, an apostle, is called a presbyter, as in the instances above; and therefore since this communication of names is only in descension, by reason of the involution or comprehension of presbyter within "episcopus," but never in ascension; that is, an apostle, or a bishop, is often called presbyter, and deacon, and prophet, and pastor, and doctor, but never "retrò;" that a mere deacon, or a mere presbyter, should be called either bishop or apostle, it can never be brought either to depress the order of bishops below their throne, or erect mere presbyters above their stalls in the quire. For we may as well confound apostle and deacon, and with clearer probability, than episcopus and presbyter. For apostles and bishops are in Scripture often called deacons. I gave one instance of this before, but there are very many. Εἰς διακονίαν ταύτην, was said of St. Matthias, when he succeeded Judas in the apostolate. Καλὸς ἔση διάκονος, said St. Paul to Timothy, bishop of Ephesus.[h] St. Paul is called διάκονος τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης, "a deacon of the New Testament;" and διάκονοι δι' ὧν ἐπιστεύσατε, is said of the first founders of the Corinthian church; "deacons by whom ye believed."[i] Paul and Apollos were the men. It is the observation of St. Chrysostom, καὶ διάκονος ἐπίσκοπος ἐλέγετο· διὰ τοῦτο γράφων τῷ Τιμοθέῳ ἔλεγε, Τὴν διακονίαν σου πληροφόρησον, ἐπισκόπῳ ὄντι. "And a bishop was called a deacon; wherefore writing to Timothy, he saith to him, being a bishop, Fulfil thy deaconship."[k]

Add to this, that there is no word, or designation of any clerical office, but is given to bishops and apostles. The apostles are called "prophets," Acts xiii. The prophets at Antioch were Lucius and Manaen, and Paul and Barnabas; and then they are called "pastors" too; and indeed, "hoc ipso," that they are bishops, they are pastors: "Spiritus Sanctus posuit vos episcopos pascere ecclesiam Dei." Whereupon the Greek scholiast expounds the word "pastor" to signify bishops, τοὺς τὰς ἐκκλησίας ἐμπεπιστευμένους λέγει, οἷος ὁ Τιμόθεος, οἷος ὁ Τίτος ἦν. And ever since that St. Peter set us a copy in the compellation of the prototype, calling him the "Great Shepherd, and Bishop of our souls," it hath obtained in all antiquity, that "pastors and bishops" are coincident, and we shall very hardly meet with an instance to the contrary.

If bishops be pastors, then they are doctors also, for these are conjunct, when other offices which may in person be united, yet in themselves are made disparate; for "God hath given some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers:"[l] Ποιμένας καὶ διδασκάλους. If pastors, then also doctors and teachers. And this is observed by St. Austin.[m] "Pastors and doctors whom you would have me to distinguish, I think are one and the same." For Paul doth not say, "some pastors, some doctors," but to pastors he joineth doctors, that pastors might understand it belongeth to their office to teach. The same also is affirmed by Sedulius upon this place.

Thus it was in Scripture; but after the churches were settled, and bishops fixed upon their several sees, then the names also were made distinct, only those names which did design temporary offices did expire, τότε γὰρ τέως ἐκοινωνοῦν ὀνόματι, saith St. Chrysostom: "Thus far the names were common," viz. in the sense above explicated, λοιπὸν δὲ τὸ ἰδίαζον ἑκάστῳ ἀπονενέμηται ὄνομα, ἐπισκόπου ἐπισκόπῳ, πρεσβυτέρου πρεσβυτέρῳ. "But immediately the names were made proper and distinct, and to every order its own name is left, of a bishop to a bishop, of a presbyter to a presbyter." This could not be supposed at first; for when they were to borrow words from the titles of secular honour, or offices, and to transplant them to an artificial and imposed sense, use, which is the master of language, must rule us in this affair, and use is not contracted but in some process and descent of time. For at first, christendom itself wanted a name, and the disciples of the glorious Nazarene were christened first in Antioch, for they had their baptism some years before they had their name. It had been no wonder then, if "per omnia" it had so happened in the compellation of all the offices and orders of the church.

SECTION XXIV.

Appropriating the word "Episcopus" or Bishop to the Supreme Church-officer.

But immediately after the apostles, and still more in descending ages, "episcopus" signified only the superintendent of the church, the "bishop" in the present and vulgar conception. Some few examples I shall give instead of myriads. In the canons of the apostles, the word ἐπίσκοπος, or bishop, is used thirty-six times in appropriation to him that is the ordinary, ruler, and president of the church above the clergy and the laity, being twenty-four times expressly distinguished from presbyter, and in the other fourteen having particular care for government, jurisdiction, censures, and ordinations committed to him, as I shall show hereafter, and all this is within the verge of the first fifty, which are received as authentic, by the council of Nice;[a] of Antioch,[b] twenty-five canons whereof are taken out of the canons of the apostles; the council of Gangra calling them "canones ecclesiasticos," and "apostolicas traditiones;" by the epistle of the first council of Constantinople to Damascus, which Theodoret hath inserted into his story; by the council of Ephesus;[c] by Tertullian;[d] by Constantine the Great;[e] and are sometimes, by way of eminency, called "the canons," sometimes "the ecclesiastical canons;" sometimes "the ancient and received canons of our fathers;" sometimes "the apostolical canons," τοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν πρὸ ἡμῶν ἁγίων καὶ μακαρίων πατέρων δεχθέντες, καὶ κυρωθέντες, ἀλλὰ μὲν καὶ παραδοθέντες ἡμῖν ὀνόματι τῶν ἁγίων, καὶ ἐνδόξων ἀποστόλων, said the fathers of the council in Trullo; and Damascen puts them in order next to the canon of Holy Scripture:[f] so in effect does Isidore, in his preface to the work of the councils, for he sets these canons in front, because "Sancti patres eorum sententias auctoritate synodali roborarunt, et inter canonicas posuerunt constitutiones:" "The holy fathers have established these canons by the authority of councils, and have put them amongst the canonical constitutions." And great reason; for, in Pope Stephen's time, they were translated into Latin by one Dionysius at the entreaty of Laurentius, because then the old Latin copies were rude and barbarous.[g] Now, then, this second translation of them being made in Pope Stephen's time, who was contemporary with St. Irenæus and St. Cyprian, the old copy, older than this, and yet after the original to be sure, shows them to be of prime antiquity; and they are mentioned by St. Stephen in an epistle of his to Bishop Hilarius, where he is severe in censure of them who do prevaricate these canons.

But, for further satisfaction, I refer the reader to the epistle of Gregory Holloander to the moderators of the city of Norimberg. I deny not but they are called apocryphal by Gratian, and some others, viz. in the sense of the church, just as the Wisdom of Solomon, or Ecclesiasticus, but yet by most believed to be written by St. Clement, from the dictate of the apostles, and, without all question, are so far canonical, as to be of undoubted ecclesiastical authority, and of the first antiquity.

Ignatius's testimony is next in time and in authority.[h] Ἐπίσκοπος τοῦ πατρὸς ὅλων τύπος ὑπάρχει. "The bishop bears the image and representment of the Father of all." And a little after, τί γάρ ἐστιν ἐπίσκοπος, ἀλλ' ἢ πάσης ἀρχῆς καὶ ἐξουσίας ἐπέκεινα πάντων κρατῶν; τί δὲ πρεσβυτέριον, ἀλλ' ἢ σύστημα ἱερὸν, σύμβουλοι καὶ συνέδρευται τοῦ ἐπισκοπου; τί δὲ διάκονοι, &c. "What is the bishop but he that hath all authority and rule? What is the presbytery, but a sacred college, counsellors and helpers, or assessors to the bishop? What are deacons," &c. So that here is the real and exact distinction of dignity, the appropriation of name, and intimation of office. The bishop is above all; the presbyters, his helpers; the deacons, his ministers; μιμηταὶ τῶν ἀγγελικῶν δυνάμεων, "Imitators of the angels, who are ministering spirits." But this of so known, so evident a truth, that it were but impertinent to insist longer upon it. Himself, in three of his epistles, uses it nine times in distinct enumeration, viz. to the Trallians, to the Philadelphians, to the Philippians. And now I shall insert these considerations.

1. Although it was so that "episcopus" and "presbyter" were distinct in the beginning after the apostles' death, yet sometimes the names are used promiscuously; which is an evidence, that confusion of names is no intimation, much less an argument, for the parity of offices, since themselves, who sometimes, though indeed very seldom, confound the names, yet distinguish the offices frequently and dogmatically. Μηδὲν ἄνευ τῶν ἐπισκόπων πράττε· ἱερεῖς γάρ εἰσι, σὺ δὲ διάκονος τῶν ἱερέων.[i] Where by επισκόπων he means the presbyters of the church of Antioch; so indeed some say, and though there be no necessity of admitting this mean ing, because by ἐπισκόπων he may mean the suffragan bishops of Syria, yet the other may be fairly admitted; for himself their bishop was absent from his church, and had delegated to the presbytery episcopal jurisdiction to rule the church, till he being dead, another bishop should be chosen, so that they were "episcopi vicarii," and, by representment of the person of the bishop, and execution of the bishop's power by delegation, were called ἐπισκόποι, and this was done lest the church should not be only without a father, but without a guardian too; and yet what a bishop was, and of what authority, no man more confident and frequent than Ignatius. Another example of this is in Eusebius, speaking of the youth whom St. John had converted and commended to a bishop. Clemens, whose story was this, proceeding in the relation, says, ὁ δὲ πρεσβύτερος, &c. "But the presbyter;" unless by πρεσβύτερος here St. Clement means not the "order," but "age," of the man; as it is like enough he did, for a little after he calls him, ὁ πρεσβύτης, "The old man;" "Tum verò presbyter in domum suam suscipit adolescentem. Redde depositum, O episcope," saith St. John to him. "Tunc graviter suspirans senior," &c. So St. Clement. But this, as it is very unusual, so it is just as in Scripture, viz. in descent and comprehension; for this bishop also was a presbyter as well as bishop, or else in the delegation of episcopal power, for so it is in the allegation of Ignatius.

2. That this name "episcopus," or "bishop," was chosen to be appropriate to the supreme order of the clergy, was done with fair reason and design. For this is no fastuous or pompous title, the word is of no dignity, and implies none but what is consequent to the just and fair execution of its offices. But presbyter is a name of dignity and veneration, "Rise up to the grey head;" and it transplants the honour and reverence of age to the office of the presbyterate. And yet this the bishops left, and took that which signifies a mere supravision, and overlooking of his charge; so that, if we take estimate from the names, "presbyter" is a name of dignity, and "episcopus" of office and burden. "He that desires the office of a bishop, desires a good work," προστασίας γὰρ ἔργον ἐστὶ, saith St. Chrysostom. "Nec dicit si quis episcopatum desiderat, bonum desiderat gradum, sed bonum opus desiderat, quod in majore ordine constitutus possit, si velit, occasionem habere exercendarum virtutum;" so St. Jerome: "It is not an honourable title, but a good office, and a great opportunity of the exercise of excellent virtues." But for this we need no better testimony than of St. Isidore: "Episcopatus autem vocabulum inde dictum, quòd ille qui superefficitur, superintendat, curam scil. gerens subditorum."[k] But, "presbyter Græcè Latinè 'senior' interpretatur, non pro tate, vel ætate, vel decrepitâ senectute, sed propter honorem et dignitatem quam acceperunt." Οὐδέν ἐστι πρεσβύτερον, ἄντι τοῦ οὐδέν ἐστι τιμιώτερον, καὶ πρεσβεύειν τὸ τιμᾶν, παρὰ Πλάτωνι, saith Julius Pollux.

3. Supposing that episcopus and presbyter had been often confounded in Scripture and antiquity, and that both in ascension and descension, yet as priests may be called angels, and yet the bishop be the angel of the church; "the angel," for his excellency; "of the church," for his appropriate preeminence and singularity; so, though presbyters had been called bishops in Scripture, (of which there is not one example but in the senses above explicated, to wit, in conjunction and comprehension,) yet the bishop is ὁ ἐπίσκοπος, by way of eminence, "the bishop:" and, in descent of time, it came to pass, that the compellation, which was always his, by way of eminence, was made his by appropriation. And a fair precedent of it we have from the compellation given to our blessed Saviour, ὁ μέγας ποίμην καὶ ἐπίσκοπος ψυχῶν, "the great Shepherd and Bishop of our souls." The name "bishop" was made sacred by being the appellative of his person, and by fair intimation it does more immediately descend upon them, who had from Christ more immediate mission, and more ample power, and therefore "episcopus" and "pastor," by way of eminence, are the most fit appellatives for them who in the church have the greatest power, office, and dignity, as participating of the fulness of that power and authority, for which Christ was called "the Bishop of our souls." And besides this so fair a copy; besides the using of the word in the prophecy of the apostolate of Matthias, and in the prophet Isaiah, and often in Scripture, as I have shown before; any one whereof is abundantly enough, for the fixing an appellative upon a church-officer; this name may also be intimated as a distinctive compellation of a bishop over a priest; because ἐπισκοπεῖν is indeed often used for the office of bishops, as in the instances above, but σκοπεῖν is used for the office of the inferiors; for St. Paul writing to the Romans,[l] who then had no bishop fixed in the chair of Rome, does command them σκοπεῖν τοὺς τὰς διχοστασίας ποιοῦντας: σκοπεῖν, not ἐπισκοπεῖν, this for the bishop, that for the subordinate clergy. So, then, the word "episcopus" is fixed at first, and that by derivation, and example of Scripture, and fair congruity of reason.

SECTION XXV.

Calling the Bishop, and him only, the Pastor of the Church.

BUT the church used other appellatives for bishops, which it is very requisite to specify, that we may understand divers authorities of the fathers, using those words in appropriation to bishops, which of late have been given to presbyters, ever since they have begun to set presbyters in the room of bishops.

And first, bishops were called "pastors" in antiquity, in imitation of their being called so in Scripture. Eusebius, writing the story of St. Ignatius, "Denique cùm Smyrnam venisset, ubi Polycarpus erat, scribit inde unam epistolam ad Ephesios, eorumque pastorem," that is, Onesimus; for so follows, "in quâ meminit Onesimi."[a] Now that Onesimus was their bishop, himself witnesses in the epistle here mentioned, τὴν πολυπλήθειαν ὑμῶν ἐν ὀνόματι Θεοῦ ἀπείληφα ἐν Ὀνησίμῳ τῷ ἐπ' ἀγάπῃ ἀδιηγητῷ, ὑμῶν δὲ ἐπισκόπῳ, &c.[b] Onesimus was their bishop, and therefore their pastor; and in his epistle "ad Antiochenos," himself makes mention of Evodius, τοῦ ἀξιομακαρίστου ποιμένος ὑμῶν, "your most blessed and worthy pastor."

When Paulus Samosatenus first broached his heresy against the Divinity of our blessed Saviour, presently a council was called, where St. Denis, bishop of Alexandria, could not be present: "Cæteri verò ecclesiarum pastores, diversis è locis et urbibus, convenerunt Antiochiam. In quibus insignes et cæteris præcellentes erant Firmilianus à Cæsareâ Cappadociæ, Gregorius, et Athenodorus fratres, et Helenus Sardensis ecclesiæ episcopus: sed et Maximus Bostrensis episcopus dignus eorum consortio cohærebat."[c] These bishops, Firmilianus, and Helenus, and Maximus, were the pastors; and not only so, but presbyters were not called pastors, for he proceeds, "sed et presbyteri quam-plurimi, et diaconi ad supradictam urbem convenerunt." So that these were not under the general appellative of pastors. And the council of Sardis,[d] making provision for the manner of election of a bishop to a widow-church, when the people is urgent for the speedy institution of a bishop, if any of the comprovincials be wanting, he must be certified by the primate, ὅτι ἀξιοῖ τὰ πλήθη ποιμένα αὐτοῖς δοθῆναι, "that the multitude require a pastor to be given unto them." The same expression is also in the epistle of Julius, bishop of Rome, to the presbyters, deacons, and people of Alexandria, in behalf of their bishop, Athanasius; "Suscipite itaque, fratres carissimi, cum omni Divinâ gratiâ pastorem vestrum ac præsulem tanquam vere ἀθανάσιον."[e] And a little after, "et gaudete fruentes orationibus, qui pastorem vestrum esuritis et sititis," &c. The same is often used in St. Hilary and St. Gregory Nazianzen, where bishops are called "pastores magni," "great shepherds," or "pastors." When Eusebius, the bishop of Samosata, was banished, "universi lachrymis prosecuti sunt ereptionem pastoris sui," saith Theodoret: "They wept for the loss of their pastor." And Eulogius, a presbyter of Edessa, when he was arguing with the prefect in behalf of christianity, "Et pastorem (inquit) habemus, et nutus illius sequimur;" "We have a pastor," (a bishop certainly, for himself was a priest,) "and his commands we follow."[f] But I need not specify any more particular instances; I touched upon it before.[g] He that shall consider, that to bishops the regiment of the whole church was concredited at the first, and the presbyters were but his assistants in cities and villages, and were admitted "in partem sollicitudinis," first casually and cursorily, and then, by station and fixed residence, when parishes were divided and endowed, will easily see, that this word "pastor" must needs be appropriated to bishops, to whom, according to the conjunctive expression of St. Peter, and the practice of infant christendom, ἐπισκοπεῖν and ποιμαίνειν was intrusted, first solely, then in communication with others, but always principally.

But now of late, especially in those places where the bishops are exauctorated, and no where else that I know, but amongst those men that have complying designs, the word "pastor" is given to parish priests, against the manner and usage of ancient christendom; and though priests may be called pastors in a limited, subordinate sense, and by way of participation, (just as they may be called angels, when the bishop is the angel, and so pastors when the bishop is the pastor, and so they are called "pastores ovium," in St. Cyprian,[h]) but never are they called "pastores" simply, or "pastores ecclesiæ," for above six hundred years in the church, and I think eight hundred more. And, therefore, it was good counsel which St. Paul gave, to avoid "vocum novitates," because there is never any affectation of new words, contrary to the ancient voice of christendom, but there is some design in the thing too, to make an innovation; and of this we have had long warning, in the new use of the word "pastor."

SECTION XXVI.

And Doctor.

IF bishops were the pastors, then "doctors" also; it was the observation which St. Augustin made out of Ephes. iv. as I quoted him even now, "For God hath given some apostles, some prophets—some pastors and doctors." So the church hath learned to speak. In the Greeks' council of Carthage it was decreed, that places which never had a bishop of their own, should not now have καθηγητὴν ἴδιον, "a doctor of their own;" that is, a bishop; but still be subject to the bishop of the diocess to whom formerly they gave obedience; and the title of the chapter is, that the parts of the diocess without the bishop's consent, ἐπίσκοπον ἕτερον μὴ δέχεσθαι, "must not have another bishop." He who in the title is called "bishop," in the chapter is called the "doctor." And thus also, Epiphanius, speaking of bishops, calleth them πατέρας, καὶ διδασκάλους, "fathers and doctors,"[a] "Gratia enim ecclesiæ laus doctoris est," saith St. Ambrose, speaking of the eminence of the bishop over the presbyters and subordinate clergy. The same also is to be seen in St. Austin,[b] Sedulius, and divers others. I deny not but it is in this appellative as in divers of the rest, that the presbyters may, in subordination, be also called doctors; for every presbyter must be διδακτικὸς, "apt to teach;"[c] but yet this is expressed as a requisite in the particular office of a bishop, and no where expressly of a presbyter, that I can find in Scripture; but yet because, in all churches, it was by license of the bishop, that presbyters did preach, if at all, and in some churches the bishop only did it, particularly of Alexandria,—(Μόνος ὁ τῆς πόλεως ἐπίσκοπος διδάσκει, saith Sozomen,[d]) therefore it was, that the presbyter, in the language of the church, was not, but the bishop was often, called doctor of the church.

SECTION XXVII.

And Pontifex.

THE next word which the primitive church did use, as proper to express the offices and eminence of bishops, is "pontifex," and "pontificatus" for "episcopacy." "Sed à Domino edocti consequentiam rerum, episcopis pontificatûs munera assignavimus," said the apostles, as St. Clement reports.[e] "Pontificale πέταλον" St. John the apostle wore in his forehead, as an ensign of his apostleship, a gold plate or medal, when he was "in pontificalibus," "in his pontifical or apostolical habit," saith Eusebius.[f] "De dispensationibus ecclesiarum antiqua sanctio tenuit et definitio sanctorum patrum in Nicæâ convenientium—et si pontifices voluerint, ut cum eis vicini propter utilitatem celebrent ordinationes:" said the fathers of the council of Constantinople.[g] "Quâ tempestate in urbe Româ Clemens quoque, tertius post Paulum et Petrum, pontificatum tenebat," saith Eusebius,[h] according to the translation of Ruffinus. "Apud Antiochiam vero Theophilus per idem tempus, sextus ab apostolis, ecclesiæ pontificatum tenebat;" saith the same Eusebius.[i] And there is a famous story of Alexander, bishop of Cappadocia, that when Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem, was invalid and unfit for government, by reason of his extreme age, he was designed by a particular revelation and a voice from heaven; "Suscipite episcopum, qui vobis à Deo destinatus est:" "Receive your bishop, whom God hath appointed for you;" but it was when Narcissus "jam senio fessus pontificatûs ministerio sufficere non possit," saith the story.[k] Eulogius, the confessor, discoursing with the prefect, that wished him to comply with the emperor, asked him: "Numquid ille unà cum imperio etiam pontificatum est consequutus?" "He hath an empire, but hath he also a bishopric?" "Pontificatus" is the word. But St. Dionysius is very exact in the distinction of clerical offices,[l] and particularly gives this account of the present: "Est igitur pontificatus ordo, qui præditus vi perficiente munera hierarchiæ quæ perficiunt," &c. And a little after, "Sacerdotum autem ordo subjectus pontificum ordini," &c. To which agrees St. Isidore,[m] in his Etymologies: "Ideo autem et presbyteri sacerdotes vocantur, quia sacrum dant sicut et episcopi, qui licet sacerdotes sint, tamen pontificatûs apicem non habent, quia nec chrismate frontem signant, nec Paracletum Spiritum dant, quod solis deberi episcopis lectio 'Actuum Apostolicorum' demonstrat;" and in the same chapter, "Pontifex princeps sacerdotum est."

One word more there is often used in antiquity for bishops, and that is "sacerdos."[n] "Sacerdotum autem bipartitus est ordo," say St. Clement and Anacletus; for they are "majores" and "minores." The "majores, bishops," the "minores, presbyters;" for so it is in the apostolical constitutions attributed to St. Clement:"[o] "Episcopis quidem assignavimus et attribuimus quæ ad principatum sacerdotii pertinent, presbyteris verò quæ ad sacerdotium." And in St. Cyprian,[p] "Presbyteri cum episcopis sacerdotali honore conjuncti." But although in such distinction and subordination, and in concretion, a presbyter is sometimes called "sacerdos," yet in antiquity "sacerdotium ecclesiæ" does evermore signify "episcopacy," and "sacerdos ecclesiæ" the "bishop." "Theotecnus sacerdotium ecclesiæ tenens in episcopatu," saith Eusebius:[q] and "summus sacerdos," the "bishop" always; "dandi baptismum jus habet summus sacerdos, qui est episcopus," saith Tertullian;[r] and, indeed, "sacerdos" alone is very seldom used in any respect but for the "bishop," unless when there is some distinctive term, and of higher report, given to the bishop at the same time.

"Ecclesia est plebs sacerdoti adunata, et grex pastori suo adhærens," saith St. Cyprian.[s] And that we may know by "sacerdos" he means the "bishop," his next words are, "Unde scire debes episcopum in ecclesiâ esse, et ecclesiam in episcopo." And in the same epistle, "qui ad Cyprianum episcopum in carcere literas direxerunt, sacerdotem Dei agnoscentes, et contestantes." Eusebius,[t] reckoning some of the chief bishops assembled in the council of Antioch, "In quibus erant Helenus Sardensis ecclesiæ episcopus, et Nicomas ab Iconio, et Hierosolymorum præcipuus sacerdos Hymenæus, et vicinæ huic urbis Cesareæ Theotecnus;" and in the same place, the bishops of Pontus are called "Ponti provinciæ sacerdotes." "Abilius apud Alexandriam tredecim annis sacerdotio ministrato, diem obiit;" for so long he was bishop; "cui succedit Cerdon tertius in sacerdotium."—"Et Papias similiter apud Hierapolim sacerdotium gerens;" for he was bishop of Hierapolis, saith Eusebius:[u] and the bishop of the province of Arles,[x] speaking of their first bishop, Trophimus, ordained bishop by St. Peter, says: "Quod prima inter Gallias Arelatensis civitas missum à beatissimo Petro apostolo sanctum Trophimum habere meruit sacerdotem." The bishop also was ever designed, when "antistes ecclesiæ" was the word. "Melito quoque Sardensis ecclesiæ antistes," saith Eusebius out of Irenæus:[y] προεστὼς is the name in Greek, and used for the bishop by Justin Martyr, and is of the same authority and use with "prælatus" and "præpositus ecclesiæ." "Antistes autem sacerdos dictus, ab eo quod antistat. Primus est enim in ordine ecclesiæ: et supra se nullum habet," saith St. Isidore.

But in those things, which are of no question, I need not insist. One title more I must specify, to prevent misprision upon a mistake of theirs of a place in St. Ambrose.[z] The "bishop" is sometimes called "primus presbyter."—"Nam et Timotheum episcopum à se creatum presbyterum vocat: quia primi presbyteri episcopi appellabantur, ut recedente eo sequens ei succederet."[a] Elections were made of bishops out of the college of presbyters: "Presbyteri unum ex se electum episcopum nominabant," saith St. Jerome; but at first this election was made, not according to merit, but according to seniority; and, therefore, bishops were called "primi presbyteri;" that is St. Ambrose's sense. But St. Austin gives another, "primi presbyteri," that is, "chief above the presbyters."—"Quid est episcopus nisi primus presbyter, h. e. summus sacerdos," saith he.[b] And St. Ambrose himself gives a better exposition of his words, than is intimated in that clause before: "Episcopi, et presbyteri una ordinatio est: uterque enim sacerdos est, sed episcopus primus est; ut omnis episcopus presbyter sit, non omnis presbyter episcopus. Hic enim episcopus est, qui inter presbyteros primus est."[c] The bishop is "primus presbyter," that is, "primus sacerdos, h. e. princeps est sacerdotum," so he expounds it; not "princeps" or "primus inter presbyteros," himself remaining a mere presbyter, but "princeps presbyterorum;" for "primus presbyter" could not be "episcopus" in another sense, he is the chief, not the senior of the presbyters. Nay, "princeps presbyterorum" is used in a sense lower than "episcopus;" for Theodoret, speaking of St. John Chrysostom, saith that, "having been the first presbyter at Antioch, yet he refused to be made bishop for a long time;" "Johannes enim, qui diutissimè princeps fuit presbyterorum Antiochiæ, ac sæpe electus præsul, perpetuus vitator dignitatis illius de hoc admirabili solo pullulavit."[d]

The church also, in her first language, when she spake of "præpositus ecclesiæ," meant the "bishop of the diocess." Of this there are innumerable examples, but most plentifully in St. Cyprian, in his epistles;[e] and in Tertullian's book "ad Martyres;" and infinite places more. Of which this advantage is to be made, that the primitive church did generally understand those places of Scripture which speak of "prelates," or "præpositi," to be meant of "bishops;" "obedite præpositis," saith St. Paul:[f] "Obey your prelates, or them that are set over you." "Præpositi autem pastores sunt," saith St. Austin: "Prelates are they that are pastors." But St. Cyprian sums up many of them together, and insinuates the several relations, expressed in the several compellations of bishops. For writing against Florentius Pupianus, "Ac nisi," saith he,[g] "apud te purgati fuerimus, ecce jam sex annis nec fraternitas habuerit episcopum, nec plebs præpositum, nec grex pastorem, nec ecclesia gubernatorem, nec Christus antistitem, nec Deus sacerdotes;" and all this he means of himself, who had then been "six years bishop of Carthage, a prelate of the people, a governor to the church, a pastor to the flock, a priest of the most high God, a minister of Christ."

The sum is this: When we find in antiquity any thing asserted of any order of the hierarchy, under the names of "episcopus," or "princeps sacerdotum," or "presbyterorum primus," or "pastor," or "doctor," or "pontifex," or "major," or "primus sacerdos," or "sacerdotium ecclesiæ habens," or "antistes ecclesiæ," or "ecclesiæ sacerdos;" (unless there be a specification and limiting of it to a parochial and inferior minister,) it must be understood of "bishops" in its present acceptation. For these words are all, by way of eminency, and most of them by absolute appropriation and singularity, the appellations and distinctive names of "bishops."

SECTION XXVIII.

And these were a distinct Order from the rest.

But ὀνόματα τῶν πραγμάτων μιμήματα, saith the philosopher: and this their distinction of names did, amongst the fathers of the primitive church, denote a distinction of calling, and office, supereminent to the rest.

For, first, bishops were, by all antiquity, reckoned as a distinct office of clergy. "Si quis presbyter, aut diaconus, aut quilibet de numero clericorum, ——pergat ad alienam parochiam præter episcopi sui conscientiam," &c. So it is in the fifteenth canon of the apostles, and so it is there plainly distinguished as an office different from presbyter and deacon, above thirty times in those canons, and distinct powers given to the bishop, which are not given to the other, and to the bishop above the other. The council of Ancyra[h] inflicting censures upon presbyters first, then deacons which had fallen in time of persecution, gives leave to the bishop to mitigate the pains as he sees cause: "Sed si ex episcopis aliqui in iis vel afflictionem aliquam—viderint, in eorum potestate id esse." The canon would not suppose any bishops to fall, for indeed they seldom did; but for the rest, provision was made for both their penances, and indulgence at the discretion of the bishop. And yet sometimes they did fall; Optatus bewails it, but withal gives evidence of their distinction of order: "Quid commemorem laicos, qui tunc in ecclesiâ nullâ fuerant dignitate suffulti? Quid ministros plurimos, quid diaconos in tertio, quid presbyteros in secundo sacerdotio, constitutos? Ipsi apices, et principes omnium aliqui episcopi aliqua instrumenta Divinæ legis impiè tradiderunt." "The laity, the ministers, the deacons, the presbyters, nay, the bishops themselves, the princes and chief of all, proved traditors."[i] The diversity of order is here fairly intimated, but dogmatically affirmed by him in his second book adv. Parmen.: "Quatuor genera capitum sunt in ecclesiâ, episcoporum, presbyterorum, diaconorum, et fidelium:" "There are four sorts of heads in the church, bishops, presbyters, deacons, and the faithful laity." And it was remarkable, when the people of Hippo had, as it were, by violence carried St. Austin to be made priest by their bishop Valerius, some seeing the good man weep in consideration of the great hazard and difficulty accruing to him in his ordination to such an office, thought he had wept because he was not bishop; they pretending comfort, told him, "Quia locus presbyterii, licèt ipse majore dignus esset, appropinquaret tamen episcopatui:" "The office of a presbyter, though indeed he deserved a greater, yet was the next step in order to a bishopric." So Possidonius tells the story.[k] It was the next step, the next descent in subordination, the next under it. So the council of Chalcedon; Ἐπίσκοπον εἰς πρεσβυτέρου βαθμὸν φέρειν ἱεροσυλία ἐστίν: "It is sacrilege to bring down a bishop to the degree and order of a presbyter," ἀπὸ τῆς πράξεως ἐπισκοπῆς ἀποκινεῖν· so the council permits in case of great delinquency, to suspend him from the execution of his episcopal order, but still the character remains, and the degree of itself is higher.[l]

"Nos autem idcirco hæc scribimus, fratres carissimi, quia novimus quàm sacrosanctum debeat esse episcopale sacerdotium, quod et clero, et plebi debet esse exemplo," said the fathers of the council of Antioch, in Eusebius;[m] "The office of a bishop is sacred, and exemplary both to the clergy and the people." "Interdixit, per omnia magna synodus, non episcopo, non presbytero, non diacono licere,"[n] &c. And it was a remarkable story, that Arius troubled the church for missing of a prelation to the order and dignity of a bishop. "Post Achillam enim Alexander—ordinatur episcopus: hoc autem tempore Arius in ordine presbyterorum fuit;" Alexander was ordained a bishop, and Arius still left in the order of mere presbyters." Of the same exigence are all those clauses of commemoration of a bishop and presbyters of the same church. "Julius autem Romanus episcopus propter senectutem defuit, erantque pro eo præsentes Vitus, et Vicentius presbyteri ejusdem ecclesiæ:" "They were his vicars, and deputies for their bishop in the Nicene council," saith Sozomen. But most pertinent is that of the Indian persecution, related by the same man.[o] Many of them were put to death. "Erant autem horum alii quidem episcopi, alii presbyteri, alii diversorum ordinum clerici." And this difference of order is clear in the epistle of the bishops of Illyricum to the bishops of the Levant: "De episcopis autem constituendis, vel comministris jam constitutis, si permanserint usque ad finem sani, bene—similiter presbyteros atque diaconos in sacerdotali ordine definivimus," &c. And of Sabbatius it is said, "Nolens in suo ordine manere presbyteratus, desiderabat episcopatum;" "He would not stay in the order of a presbyter, but desired a bishopric."—Ordo episcoporum quadripartitus est, in patriarchis, archiepiscopis, metropolitanis, et episcopis," saith St. Isidore; Omnes autem superius designati ordines uno eodemque vocabulo episcopi nominantur."[p] But it were infinite to reckon authorities, and clauses of exclusion, for the three orders of bishops, priests, and deacons; we cannot almost dip in any tome of the councils, but we shall find it recorded: and all the martyr bishops of Rome did ever acknowledge and publish it, that episcopacy is a peculiar office and order in the church of God; as is to be seen in their decretal epistles, in the first tome of the councils. I only sum this up with the attestation of the church of England, in the preface to the book of ordination: "It is evident to all men diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the apostles' times there have been these orders of ministers in Christ's church, bishops, priests, and deacons."[q] The same thing exactly, that was said in the second council of Carthage;[r] τρεῖς βαθμοὺς τούτους, φημὶ δὲ, ἐπισκόπους, πρεσβυτέρους, καὶ διακόνους. But we shall see it better, and by more real probation, for that bishops were a distinct order, appears by this:

SECTION XXIX.

To which the Presbyterate was but a Degree.

1. The presbyterate was but a step to episcopacy, as deaconship to the presbyterate; and therefore the council of Sardis decreed,[s] that no man should be ordained bishop, but he that was first a reader, and a deacon, and a presbyter, ἵνα καθ' ἕκαστον βαθμὸν—εἰς τὴν ἀψῖδα τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς, κατὰ προκοπὴν διελθεῖν δυνηθείη: "That by every degree he may pass to the sublimity of episcopacy." Ἐξεῖ δὲ ἑκάστου τάγματος ὁ βαθμὸς οὐκ ἐλαχίστου δηλονότι χρόνου μῆκος, &c. "But the degree of every order must have the permanence and trial of no small time." Here there is clearly a distinction of orders and ordinations, and assumptions to them respectively, all of the same distance and consideration; and Theodoret,[t] out of the synodical epistle of the same council, says, that they complained that some from Arianism were reconciled, and promoted from deacons to be presbyters, from presbyters to be bishops, calling it μείζονα βαθμὸν, "a greater degree," or "order:" and St. Gregory Nazianzen, in his Encomium of St. Athanasius, speaking of his canonical ordination and election to a bishopric, says, that he was chosen being ἀξιάγαστος, "most worthy," and πᾶσαν τὴν τῶν βαθμῶν ἀκολουθίαν διεξελθὼν, "coming through all the inferior orders." The same commendation St. Cyprian gives of Cornelius:[u] "Non iste ad episcopatum subito pervenit, sed per omnia ecclesiastica officia promotus, et in divinis administrationibus Dominum sæpè promeritus ad sacerdotii sublime fastigium cunctis religionis gradibus ascendit; et factus est episcopus à plurimis collegis nostris, qui tunc in urbe Româ aderant, qui ad nos literas de ejus ordinatione miserunt." Here is evident, not only a promotion, but a new ordination of St. Cornelius to be bishop of Rome; so that "now the chair is full," saith St. Cyprian; "et quisquis jam episcopus fieri voluerit, foris fiat necesse est, nec habeat ecclesiasticam ordinationem," &c.: "No man else can receive ordination to the bishopric."

SECTION XXX.

There being a peculiar Manner of Ordination to a Bishopric.

2. The ordination of a bishop to his chair was done "de novo," after his being a presbyter; and not only so, but in another manner than he had, when he was made priest. This is evident in the first ecclesiastical canon that was made after Scripture.[a] Ἐπίσκοπος χειροτονείσθω ἀπὸ ἐπισκόπων δύο ἢ τριῶν· πρεσβύτερος ὑπὸ ἑνὸς ἐπισκόπου χειροτο- νεισθω, καὶ διάκονος, καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ κληρικοι: "A priest and deacon must be ordained of one bishop, but a bishop must be ordained by two or three at least." And that we may see it yet more to be apostolical, St. Anacletus, in his second epistle, reports, "Hierosolymitarum primus episcopus B. Jacobus à Petro, Jacobo, et Johanne apostolis est ordinatus." Three apostles went to the ordaining of St. James to be a bishop, and the self-same thing is in words affirmed by Anicetus:[b] "Ut in ore duorum, vel trium stet omnis veritas;" and St. Cyprian observes, that when Cornelius was made bishop of Rome, there happened to be many of his fellow-bishops there, "et factus est episcopus à plurimis collegis nostris, qui tunc in urbe Româ aderant." These "collegiæ" could not be mere priests; for then the ordination of Novatus had been more canonical than that of Cornelius, and all christendom had been deceived; for not Novatus, who was ordained by three bishops,—but Cornelius, had been the schismatic, as being ordained by priests, against the canon. But here I observe it for the word "plurimis," there were "many" of them at that ordination.

In pursuance of this apostolical ordinance, the Nicene fathers decreed,[c] that a bishop should be ordained ὑπὸ πάντων τῶν ἐν τῇ παροικίᾳ, "by all the bishops in the province," unless it be in case of necessity; and then it must be done by three being gathered together, and the rest consenting; so the ordination to be performed. The same is ratified in the council of Antioch,[d] Ἐπίσκοπον μὴ χειροτονεῖσθαι δίχα συνόδου, καὶ παρουσίας τοῦ ἐν τῇ μητροπόλει τῆς ἐπαρχιας· "A bishop is not to be ordained without a synod of bishops, and the presence of the metropolitan of the province." But if this cannot be done conveniently, yet however it is required,[e] μετὰ τῆς τῶν πλειόνων παρουσίας, ἢ ψήφου γίνεσθαι τὴν κατάστασιν: "the ordinations must be performed by many." The same was decreed in the council of Laodicea, can. 12., in the thirteenth canon of the African code, in the twenty-second canon of the first council of Arles, and the fifth canon of the second council of Arles, and was ever the practice of the church; and so we may see it descend through the bowels of the fourth council of Carthage to the inferior ages. "Episcopus quum ordinatur, duo episcopi ponant, et teneant evangeliorum codicem super caput, et cervicem ejus, et uno super eum fundente benedictionem, reliqui omnes episcopi qui adsunt, manibus suis caput ejus tangant."

The thing was catholic and canonical. It was "prima, et immutabilis constitutio;" so the first canon of the council of Epaunum calls it:[f] and, therefore, after the death of Meletius, bishop of Antioch, a schism was made about his successor, and Evagrius's ordination condemned;[g] because "præter ecclesiasticam regulam fuerit ordinatus:" "it was against the rule of Holy Church." Why so? "Solus enim Paulinus cum instituerat, plurimas regulas prævaricatus ecclesiasticas. Non enim præcipiunt ut per se quilibet ordinare possit, sed convocare universos provinciæ sacerdotes, et præter per tres pontifices ordinationem penitus fieri interdicunt." Which because it was not observed in the ordination of Evagrius, who was not ordained by three bishops, the ordination was cassated in the council of Rhegium. And we read, that when Novatus would fain be made a bishop, in the schism against Cornelius, he did it "tribus adhibitis episcopis," saith Eusebius: "he obtained three bishops," for performance of the action.[h]

Now, besides these apostolical and catholic canons and precedents, this thing, according to the constant and united interpretation of the Greek fathers, was actually done in the ordination of St. Timothy to the bishopric of Ephesus: "Neglect not the grace that is in thee by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery." The Latin fathers expound it abstractly, viz. to signify the office of priesthood, that is, "neglect not the grace of priesthood, that is in thee by the imposition of hands;" and this Erasmus helps, by making "presbyterii" to pertain to "gratiam," by a new interpunction of the words; but however, "presbyterii," with the Latin fathers, signifies "presbyteratus," not "presbyterorum;" and this "presbyteratus" is in their sense used for "episcopatus" too. But the Greek fathers understand it collectively, and πρεσβυτερίου is put for πρεσβυτέρων not simply such, but bishops too, all agree in that, that episcopacy is either meant in office, or in person. Πρεσβυτέρους τοὺς ἐπισκόπους φησίν; so Œcumenius: and St. Chrysostom, οὐ περὶ πρεσβυτέρων φησὶν ἐνταῦθα, ἀλλὰ περὶ ἐπισκόπων: so Theophylact; so Theodoret. The probation of this lies upon right reason and catholic tradition; for,

SECTION XXXI.

To which Presbyters never did assist by imposing Hands.

3. The bishop's ordination was peculiar, in this respect, above the presbyter's; for a presbyter did never impose hands on a bishop. On a presbyter they did, ever since the fourth council of Carthage; but never on a bishop. And that was the reason of the former exposition. By the "presbytery" St. Paul means "bishops," οὐ γὰρ οἱ πρεσβύτεροι ἐχειροτόνησαν τὸν ἐπισκοπον: "presbyters did not impose hands on a bishop," and therefore, "presbyterium" is not a college of mere presbyters, for such could never ordain St. Timothy to be a bishop. The same reason is given by the Latin fathers, why they expound "presbyterium" to signify "episcopacy." For, saith St. Ambrose, "St. Paul had ordained Timothy to be a bishop; unde, et quemadmodum episcopum ordinet, ostendit. Neque enim fas erat, aut licebat, ut inferior ordinaret majorem;" so he; and subjoins this reason, "Nemo enim tribuit quod non accepit." The same is affirmed by St. Chrysostom, and generally by the authors of the former expositions, that is, the fathers both of the east and west. For it was so general and catholic a truth, that priests could not, might not, lay hands on a bishop, that there was never any example of it in christendom till almost six hundred years after Christ, and that but once, and that irregular, and that without imitation of his successors, or example in his antecessors. It was the case of Pope Pelagius the First:[a] "Et dum non essent episcopi, qui eum ordinarent, inventi sunt duo episcopi, Johannes de Perusio, et Bonus de Ferentino, et Andreas presbyter de Ostiâ, et ordinaverunt eum pontificem. Tunc enim non erant in clero, qui eum possent promovere;" saith Damasus:[b] "It was in case of necessity, because there were not three bishops, therefore he procured two, and a priest of Ostia to supply the place of the third," that three, according to the direction apostolical, and canons of Nice, Antioch, and Carthage, make episcopal ordination. The church of Rome is concerned in the business to make fair this ordination, and to reconcile it to the council of Rhegium, and the others before mentioned, who, if asked, would declare it to be invalid. But certainly, as the canons did command three to impose hands on a bishop, so also they commanded that those three should be three bishops; and Pelagius might as well not have had three, as not three bishops; and better, because, so they were bishops, the first canon of the apostles approves the ordination if done "by two," ἐπισκόπων δύο, ἢ τριῶν. And the Nicene canon is as much exact, in requiring the capacity of the person, as the number of the ordainers. But let them answer it. For my part, I believe that the imposition of hands by Andreas, was no more in that case than if a layman had done it; it was χεὶρ ἄκυρος, and though the ordination was absolutely uncanonical, yet it being in the exigence of necessity, and being done by two bishops, according to the apostolical canon, it was valid "in naturâ rei," though not "in formâ canonis," and the addition of the priest was but to cheat the canon, and cozen himself into an impertinent belief of a canonical ordination. Ἐπίσκοποι ἐπίσκοπους καθιστᾶν ὀφείλουσιν, saith the council of Sardis:[c] "Bishops must ordain bishops;" it was never heard that priests did, or, "de jure," might.

These premises do most certainly infer a real difference between episcopacy and the presbyterate. But whether or no they infer a difference of order, or only of degree; or whether degree and order be all one or no, is of great consideration in the present, and in relation to many other questions.

1. Then it is evident that in antiquity, "ordo" and "gradus" were used promiscuously. Βαθμὸς was the Greek word, and for it the Latins used "ordo," as is evident in the instances above mentioned; to which add, that Anacletus says,[d] that Christ did "instituere duos ordines, episcoporum et sacerdotum." And St. Leo affirms:[e] "Primum ordinem esse episcopalem, secundum presbyteralem, tertium Leviticum;" and these among the Greeks are called τρεῖς βαθμοὶ, "three degrees." So the order of deaconship in St. Paul is called καλος βαθμὸς, "a good degree;" and βαθμοῦ ἐκπίπτειν, &c. is a censure used alike in the censures of bishops, priests, and deacons. They are all of the same name, and the same consideration, for order, distance, and degree, amongst the fathers; gradus and ordo are equally affirmed of them all; and the word gradus is used sometimes for that, which is called ordo most frequently. So Felix,[f] writing to St. Austin, "Non tantum ego possum contra tuam virtutem, quia mira virtus est gradus episcopalis;" and St. Cyprian of Cornelius:[g] "Ad sacerdotii sublime fastigium cunctis religionis gradibus ascendit." Degree and order are used in common; for he that speaks most properly, will call that an order in persons, which corresponds to a degree in qualities; and neither of the words are wronged by a mutual substitution.

2. The promotion of a bishop "ad munus episcopale," was at first called "ordinatio episcopi." "Stir up the grace that is in thee," "juxta ordinationem tuam in episcopatum," saith Sedulius; and St. Jerome,[h] "Prophetiæ gratiam habebat cum ordinatione episcopatus."—"Neque enim fas erat aut licebat, ut inferior ordinaret majorem," saith St. Ambrose, proving that presbyters might not impose hands on a bishop. "Romanorum ecclesia Clementem à Petro ordinatum edit," saith Tertullian; and St Jerome affirms,[i] that "St. James was ordained bishop of Jerusalem immediately after the passion of our Lord." "Ordinatus" was the word at first, and afterwards "consecratus" came in conjunction with it, when Moses the monk was to be ordained, to wit, a bishop, (for that is the title of the story in Theodoret,) and spied that Lucius was there ready to impose hands on him: "Absit," says he, "ut manus tua me consecret."[k]

3. In all orders, there is the impress of a distinct character; that is, the person is qualified with a new capacity to do certain offices, which, before his ordination, he had no power to do. A deacon hath an order or power,

> ——Quo pocula vitæ
> Misceat, et latices cum sanguine porrigat agni;

as Arator himself, a deacon, expresses it. A presbyter hath a higher order or degree in the office or ministry of the church, whereby he is enabled, προσφέρειν, ὁμιλεῖν, καὶ λειτουργεῖν τὰ τῶν ἱερατικῶν λειτουργιῶν, as the council of Ancyra does intimate.[l] But a bishop hath a higher yet; for besides all the offices communicated to priests and deacons, he can give orders, which very one thing makes episcopacy to be a distinct order. For "ordo" is designed by the schools to be "traditio potestatis spiritualis, et collatio gratiæ, ad obeunda ministeria ecclesiastica:" "a giving a spiritual power, and a conferring grace for the performance of ecclesiastical ministrations." Since then episcopacy hath a new ordination, and a distinct power, as I shall show in the descent, it must needs be a distinct order, both according to the name given it by antiquity, and according to the nature of the thing in the definitions of the school.

There is nothing said against this but a fancy of some of the church of Rome, obtruded, indeed, upon no grounds; for they would define order to be "a special power in relation to the holy sacrament," which they call "corpus Christi naturale;" and episcopacy indeed to be a distinct power, in relation "ad corpus Christi mysticum," or the regiment of the church, and ordaining labourers for the harvest, and, therefore, not to be a distinct order.

But this to them that consider things sadly, is true or false, according as any man list. For if these men are resolved they will call nothing an order but what is a power in order to the consecration of the eucharist,—who can help it? Then indeed, in that sense, episcopacy is not a distinct order; that is, a bishop hath no new power in the consecration of the venerable eucharist, more than a presbyter hath. But then why these men should only call this power "an order," no man can give a reason. For, 1. In antiquity, the distinct power of a bishop was ever called an order, and I think, before Hugo de S. Victore, and the Master of the Sentences, no man ever denied it to be an order. 2. According to this rate, I would fain know the office of a subdeacon, and of an ostiary, and of an acolouthite, and of a reader, come to be distinct orders; for surely the bishop hath as much power in order to consecration "de novo," as they have "de integro." And if I mistake not, that the bishop hath a new power to ordain presbyters who shall have a power of consecrating the eucharist, is more a new power in order to consecration, than all those inferior officers put together have in all; and yet they call them orders; and, therefore, why not episcopacy also, I cannot imagine, unless because they will not.

But however, in the mean time, the denying the office and degree of episcopacy to be a new and distinct order, is an innovation of the production of some in the church of Rome, without all reason, and against all antiquity. This only by the way.

The enemies of episcopacy call in aid, from all places, for support of their ruinous cause, and, therefore, take their main hopes from the church of Rome, by advantage of the former discourse. For since, say they, that consecration of the sacrament is the greatest work, of the most secret mystery, greatest power, and highest dignity, that is competent to man, and this a presbyter hath as well as a bishop,—is it likely that a bishop should, by Divine institution, be so much superior to a presbyter, who, by the confession of all sides, communicates with a bishop in that which is his highest power? And shall issues of a lesser dignity distinguish the orders, and make a bishop higher to a presbyter, and not rather the greater raise up a presbyter to the counterpoise of a bishop?—Upon this surmise, the men of the church of Rome would infer an identity of order, though a disparity of degree, but the men of the other world would infer a parity both of order and degree too.[m] The first are already answered in the premises; the second must now be served.

1. Then, whether power be greater, of ordaining priests, or consecrating the sacrament, is an impertinent question: possibly, it may be of some danger; because in comparing God's ordinances, there must certainly be a depression of one, and whether that lights upon the right side or no, yet peradventure, it will not stand with the consequence of our gratitude to God, to do that, which, in God's estimate, may tantamount to a direct undervaluing; but however it is unprofitable, of no use in case of conscience, either in order to faith or manners; and besides, cannot fix itself upon any basis, there being no way of proving either to be more excellent than the other.

2. The sacraments and mysteries of christianity, if compared among themselves, are greater and lesser in several respects. For since they are all in order to several ends, that is, productive of several effects, and they all are excellent,—every rite and sacrament, in respect of its own effect, is more excellent than the other not ordained to that effect. For example: matrimony is ordained for a means to preserve chastity, and to represent the mystical union of Christ and his church; and therefore, in these respects, is greater than baptism, which does neither. But baptism is for remission of sins,[n] and, in that, is more excellent than matrimony: the same may be said for ordination, and consecration; the one being in order to Christ's natural body, as the schools speak; the other in order to his mystical body, and so have their several excellencies respectively; but for an absolute pre-eminence of one above the other, I said there was no basis to fix that upon, and I believe all men will find it so, that please to try. But in a relative or respective excellency, they go both before and after one another. Thus wool and a jewel are better than each other; for wool is better for warmth, and a jewel for ornament. A frog hath more sense in it than the sun, and yet the sun shines brighter.

3. Suppose consecration of the eucharist were greater than ordaining priests, yet that cannot hinder but that the power of ordaining may make a higher and distinct order; because the power of ordaining hath in it the power of consecrating and something more; it is all that which makes the priest, and it is something more besides which makes the bishop. Indeed if the bishop had it not, and the priest had it, then supposing consecration to be greater than ordination, the priest would not only equal but excel the bishop; but because the bishop hath that, and ordination besides,—therefore he is higher both in order and dignity.

[n] The Nicene Creed.

4. Suppose that consecration were the greatest clerical power in the world, and that the bishop and the priest were equal in the greatest power, yet a lesser power than it, superadded to the bishops, may make a distinct order and superiority. Thus it was said of the Son of man, "Constituit eum paulò minorem angelis:" "He was made a little lower than the angels." It was but a little lower, and yet so much as to distinguish their natures, for he took not upon him the "nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham." So it is in proportion between bishop and priest; for though a priest communicating in the greatest power of the church, viz. consecration of the venerable eucharist, yet differing in a less, is "paulò minor angelis;" "a little lower than the bishop, the angel of the church;" yet this "little lower" makes a distinct order, and enough for a subordination. An angel and a man communicate in those great excellencies of spiritual essence; they both discourse; they have both election and freedom of choice; they have will, and understanding, and memory, impresses of the Divine image,—and locomotion, and immortality. And these excellencies are (being precisely considered) of more real and eternal worth, than the angelical manner of moving so in an instant, and those other forms and modalities of their knowledge and volition; and yet for these superadded parts of excellency, the difference is no less than specifical. If we compare a bishop and a priest thus, what we call difference in nature there, will be a difference in order here, and of the same consideration.

5. Lastly, it is considerable, that these men that make this objection, do not make it because they think it true, but because it will serve a present turn. For all the world sees, that to them that deny the real presence, this can be no objection; and most certainly the anti-episcopal men do so, in all senses; and then, what excellency is there in the power of consecration, more than in ordination? Nay, is there any such thing as consecration at all? This also would be considered from their principles. But I proceed.

One thing only more is objected against the main question. If episcopacy be a distinct order, why may not a man be a bishop that never was a priest, as (abstracting from the laws of the church) a man may be a presbyter that never was a deacon; for if it be the impress of a distinct character, it may be imprinted "per saltum," and independently, as it is in the order of a presbyter?

To this answer, It is true, if the powers and characters themselves were independent; as it is in all those offices of human constitution, which are called the inferior orders: for the office of an acolouthite, of an exorcist, of an ostiary, are no way dependent on the office of a deacon; and, therefore, a man may be deacon that never was in any of those; and perhaps a presbyter too, that never was a deacon, as it was in the first example of the presbyterate in the seventy-two disciples. But a bishop, though he have a distinct character, yet it is not disparate from that of a presbyter, but supposes it "ex vi ordinis." For since the power of ordination (if any thing be) is the distinct capacity of a bishop, this power supposes a power of consecrating the eucharist to be in the bishop; for how else can he ordain a presbyter with a power, that himself hath not? Can he give what himself hath not received?

I end this point with the saying of Epiphanius: "Vox est Aerii hæretici, Unus est ordo episcoporum et presbyterorum, una dignitas:"[n] "To say that bishops are not a distinct order from presbyters, was a heresy first broached by Aerius," and hath lately been (at least in the manner of speaking) countenanced by many of the church of Rome.

SECTION XXXII.

For Bishops had a Power distinct and superior to that of Presbyters. As of Ordination.

FOR to clear the distinction of order, it is evident in antiquity, that bishops had a power of imposing hands, for collating of orders, which presbyters have not. What was done in this affair in the times of the apostles, I have already explicated: but now the inquiry is, what the church did in pursuance of the practice and tradition apostolical. The first and second canons of apostles command, that two or three bishops should ordain a bishop, and one bishop should ordain a priest and a deacon. A presbyter is not authorized to ordain; a bishop is. St. Dionysius affirms, "Sacerdotem non posse initiari, nisi per invocationes episcopales," and acknowledges no ordainer but a bishop.[a] No more did the church ever; insomuch that when Novatus, the father of the old Puritans, did "ambire episcopatum," he was fain to go to the utmost parts of Italy, and seduce or entreat some bishops to impose hands on him, as Cornelius witnesses in his epistle to Fabianus, in Eusebius.[b] To this we may add, as so many witnesses, all those ordinations made by the bishops of Rome, mentioned in the pontifical book of Damasus Platina, and others. "Habitis de more sacris ordinibus Decembris mense, presbyteros decem, diaconos duos, &c. creat S. Clemens: Anacletus presbyteros quinque, diaconos tres, episcopos diversis in locis sex numero creavit;" and so in descent, for all the bishops of that succession, for many ages together.

But let us see how this power of ordination went in the bishop's hand alone, by law and constitution; for particular examples are infinite.

In the council of Ancyra it is determined, χωρεπισκόπους μὴ ἐξεῖναι πρεσβυτέρους ἢ διακόνους χειροτονεῖν· ἀλλὰ μηδὲ πρεσβυτέρους πόλεως, χωρὶς τοῦ ἐπιτραπῆναι ὑπὸ τοῦ ἐπισκόπου μετὰ γραμμάτων ἐν ἑτέρᾳ παροικίᾳ. "That rural bishops shall not ordain presbyters or deacons in another's diocess, without letters of license from the bishop. Neither shall the priests of the city attempt it."[c] First, not rural bishops, that is, bishops that are taken "in adjutorium episcopi principalis," "vicars to the bishop of the diocess," they must not ordain priests and deacons. For it is ἑτέρα παροικία, "it is another's diocess," and to be ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος is prohibited by the canon of Scripture. But then they may with license? Yes; for they had episcopal ordination at first, but not episcopal jurisdiction, and so were not to invade the territories of their neighbour. The tenth canon of the council of Antioch clears this part. The words are these, as they are rendered by Dionysius Exiguus: "Qui in villis, et vicis constituti sunt chorepiscopi, tametsi manûs impositionem ab episcopis susceperunt, [et ut episcopi sunt consecrati] tamen oportet eos modum proprium retinere," &c. εἰ καὶ χειροθεσίαν εἶεν ἐπισκόπων εἰληφότες, the next clause, "et ut episcopi consecrati sunt," although it be in very ancient Latin copies, yet is not found in the Greek, but is an "assumentum" for exposition of the Greek, but is most certainly implied in it; for else, what description could this be of "chorepiscopi," above "presbyteri rurales," to say that they were χειροθεσίαν ἐπισκόπων εἰληφότες, for so had country priests, they had received imposition of the bishop's hands. Either then the chorepiscopi had received ordination from three bishops, and ἐπισκόπων is to be taken collectively, not distributively, to wit, that each country-bishop had received ordination from bishops; many bishops in conjunction, and so they were very bishops; or else they had no more than village-priests, and then this caution had been impertinent.

But the city-priests were also included in this prohibition. True it is, but it is in a parenthesis, with an ἀλλὰ μηδὲ, in the midst of the canon; and there was some particular reason for the involving them; not that they ever did actually ordain any; but that since it was prohibited to the chorepiscopi to ordain, (to them I say, who thought, for want of jurisdiction, they might not ordain without license, it being "in alienâ parochiâ," yet they had capacity by their order to do it,) if these should do it, the city-presbyters,—who were often despatched into the villages upon the same employment, by a temporary mission, that the chorepiscopi were, by an ordinary and fixed residence,—might, perhaps, think that their commission might extend farther than it did; or that they might go beyond it, as well as the chorepiscopi; and therefore their way was obstructed by this clause of ἀλλὰ μηδὲ πρεσβυτέρους πόλεως. Add to this; the presbyters of the city were of great honour and peculiar privilege, as appears in the thirteenth canon of the council of Neo-Cæsarea, and, therefore, might easily exceed, if the canon had not been their bridle.

The sum of the canon is this. With the bishop's license the chorepiscopi might ordain; for themselves had episcopal ordination: but without license they might not; for they had but delegate and subordinate jurisdiction: and, therefore, in the fourteenth canon of Neo-Cæsarea, are said to be εἰς τύπον τῶν ἑβδομήκοντα, "like the seventy disciples," that is, inferior to bishops, as the seventy were to the twelve apostles; viz. "in hoc particulari," not in order, but like them in subordination and inferiority of jurisdiction: but the city-presbyters might not ordain, neither with nor without license; for they are in the canon only by way of parenthesis, and the sequence of procuring a faculty from the bishops to collate orders, is to be referred to "chorepiscopi," not to "presbyteri civitatis," unless we should strain this canon into a sense contrary to the practice of the catholic church. "Res enim ordinis non possunt delegari," is a most certain rule in divinity, and admitted by men of all sides and most different interests. However, we see here that they were prohibited; and we never find, before this time, that any of them actually did give orders, neither by ordinary power, nor extraordinary dispensation; and the constant tradition of the church, and practice apostolical, is, that they never could give orders; therefore this exposition of the canon is liable to no exception, but is clear for the illegality of a presbyter giving holy orders either to a presbyter or a deacon,—and is concluding for the necessity of concurrence, both of episcopal order and jurisdiction for ordinations; for "reddendo singula singulis," and expounding this canon according to the sense of the church and exigence of catholic custom, the chorepiscopi are excluded from giving orders, for want of jurisdiction,—and the priests of the city, for want of order; the first may be supplied by a delegate power "in literis episcopalibus;" the second cannot, but by a new ordination, that is, by making the priest a bishop. For if a priest of the city have not so much power as a chorepiscopus, as I have proved he hath not, by showing that the chorepiscopus then had episcopal ordination, and yet the chorepiscopus might not collate orders without a faculty from the bishop,—the city-priests might not do it, unless more be added to them; for their want was more. They not only want jurisdiction, but something besides, and that must needs be "order."

But although these chorepiscopi, at the first, had episcopal ordination, yet it was quickly taken from them, for their encroachment upon the bishop's diocess; and as they were but "vicarii," or "visitatores episcoporum in villis," so their ordination was but to a mere presbyterate. And this we find, as soon as ever we hear that they had had episcopal ordination. For those who, in the beginning of the tenth canon of Antioch, we find had been consecrated as bishops, in the end of the same canon we find it decreed "de novo:" χωρεπίσκοπον δὲ γενέσθαι ὑπὸ τοῦ τῆς πόλεως, ἧ ὑπόκειται, ἐπισκόπου. "The chorepiscopus, or country-bishop, must be ordained by the bishop of the city, in whose jurisdiction he is;" which was clearly ordination to the order of a presbyter, and no more. And ever after this, all the ordinations they made, were only to the inferior ministries, with the bishop's license too; but they never ordained any to be deacons or priests; for these were orders of the Holy Ghost's appointing, and, therefore, were "gratia Spiritûs Sancti," and issues of order; but the inferior ministries, as of a reader, an ostiary, &c., were human constitutions, and required not the capacity of episcopal order to collate them: for they were not "graces of the Holy Ghost," as all orders properly so called are, but might, by human dispensation, be bestowed, as well as by human ordinance they had their first constitution.

The chorepiscopi lasted in this consistence, till they were quite taken away by the council of Hispalis: save only that such men also were called chorepiscopi, who had been bishops of cities, but had fallen from their honour, by communicating in gentile sacrifices, and by being traditors; but in case they repented and were reconciled, they had not indeed restitution to their see; but because they had the indelible character of a bishop, they were allowed the name, and honour, and sometime the execution of offices chorepiscopal. Now of this sort of chorepiscopi no objection can be pretended, if they had made ordinations; and of the other, nothing pertinent, for they also had the ordination and order of bishops. The former was the case of Meletius, in the Nicene council, as is to be seen in the epistle of the fathers to the church of Alexandria.[d] But however, all this while, the power of ordination is so fast held in the bishop's hand, that it was communicated to none, though of the greatest privilege.

I find the like care taken in the council of Sardis:[e] for when Musæus and Eutychianus had ordained some clerks, themselves not being bishops,—Gaudentius, (one of the moderate men, it is likely,) for quietness' sake, and to comply with the times, would fain have had those clerks received into clerical communion; but the council would by no means admit that any should be received into the clergy, ἀλλ' ἐκείνους τοὺς ἱερωθέντας παρὰ τίνων τῇ ἀληθείᾳ μὲν ὄντων ἐπισκόπων, (as Balsamon expresses upon that canon:) "but such as were ordained by them, who were bishops verily and indeed." But with those who were ordained by Musæus and Eutychianus, ὡς λαϊκοῖς συγκοινωνήσομεν, "we will communicate as with laymen:" ὅτι οὐδὲ ὄνομα ἐπισκόπου δύνανται ἐκδικεῖν, οἱ αὐτοὺς τάχα χειροτονήσαντες: "For they were no bishops, that imposed hands on them:" and, therefore, the clerks were not ordained truly, but were πλασάμενοι χειροτονίαν, "dissemblers of ordination." "Quæ autem de Musæo et Eutychiano dicta sunt, trahe etiam ad alios, qui non ordinati fuerunt," &c. saith Balsamon; intimating, that it is a ruled case and of public interest.

The same was the issue of those two famous cases, the one of Ischiras ordained of Colluthus, φαντασθέντος ἐπισκοπὴν, "one that dreamed only he was a bishop." Ischiras, being ordained by him, could be no priest, nor any else of his ordaining; καὶ πᾶσα χεὶρ αὐτοῦ γέγονεν ἄκυρος· and Ischiras himself was reduced into lay-communion, being deposed by the synod of Alexandria, ἐκπεσὼν καὶ τῆς ψευδοῦς ὑπονοίας τοῦ πρεσβυτερίου: "falling from the imagination of his presbyterate," say the priests and deacons of Mareotis:[f] and of the rest that were ordained with Ischiras, λαϊκοὶ γεγόνασι, καὶ οὕτω συνάγονται, saith St. Athanasius: and this is so known a business, ὡς οὐδενὶ καθέστηκεν ἀμφίβολον: "no man made scruple of the nullity." The parallel case is of the presbyters ordained by Maximus, who was another bishop in the air too; all his ordinations were pronounced null, by the fathers of the council in Constantinople.[g] A third is of the blind bishop of Agabra imposing hands, while his presbyters read the words of ordination; the ordination was pronounced invalid by the first council of Sevil.[h] These cases are so known, I need not insist on them. This only:

In divers cases of transgression of the canons, clergymen were reduced to lay-communion, either being suspended or deposed; that is, from their place of honour and execution of their function, with or without hope of restitution respectively; but then still they had their order, and the sacraments conferred by them were valid, though they indeed were prohibited to minister; but in the cases of the present instance, the ordinations were pronounced as null, to have bestowed nothing, and to be merely imaginary.

But so also it was in case that bishops ordained without a title, or in the diocess of another bishop; as in the council of Chalcedon,[i] and of Antioch,[k] πάντα τὰ ἄκυρα. And may be it was so in case of ordination by a presbyter, it was by positive constitution, pronounced void, and no more; and, therefore, may be rescinded by the countermand of an equal power; a council at most may do it; and, therefore, without a council, a probable necessity will let us loose. But to this the answer is evident.

1. The expressions in the several cases are several, and of diverse issue; for in case of those nullities, which are merely canonical, they are expressed as then first made; but in the case of ordination by a non-bishop, they are only declared void "ipso facto." And therefore, in that decree of Chalcedon against sine-titular ordinations, the canon saith: τοὺς δὲ ἀπολύτως χειροτονουμένους ὥρισεν ἡ ἁγία σύνοδος ἄκυρον ἔχειν τὴν τοιαύτην χειροθεσίαν, "irritam existimari manus impositionem," "to be esteemed as null," that is, not to have canonical approbation; but is not declared null, "in natura rei," as it is in the foregoing instances.

2. In the cases of Antioch and Chalcedon, the degree is "pro futuro, which makes it evident that those nullities are such as are made by canon; but in the cases of Colluthus and Maximus, there was declaration of a past nullity, and that before any canon was made; and though synodal declarations pronounced such ordinations invalid, yet none decreed so for the future; which is a clear evidence that this nullity, viz. in case of ordination by a non-presbyter, is not made by canon, but by canon declared to be invalid in the nature of the thing.

3. If to this be added, that in antiquity it was dogmatically resolved, that by nature and institution of the order of bishops, ordination was appropriate to them, then it will also from hence be evident, that the nullity of ordination without a bishop, is not dependent upon positive constitution, but on the exigence of the institution. Now that the power of ordination was only in the bishop, even they who, to advance the presbyters, were willing enough to speak less for episcopacy, give testimony; making this the proper distinctive cognizance of a bishop from a presbyter, that the bishop hath power of ordination, the presbyter hath not. So St. Jerome: "Quid facit episcopus, excepta ordinatione, quod presbyter non faciat?" "All things," saith he,[l] (to wit, all things of precise order,) "are common to bishops with priests, except ordination;" for that is proper to the bishop. And St. Chrysostom: "Solâ quippe ordinatione superiores illis sunt episcopi, atque hoc tantum plusquam presbyteri habere videntur."[m] Ordination is the proper and peculiar function of a bishop; and, therefore, not given him by positive constitution of the canon.

4. No man was called a heretic for breach of canon, but for denying the power of ordination to be proper to a bishop: Aerius was, by Epiphanius, Philastrius, and St. Austin, condemned and branded for heresy, and by the catholic church, saith Epiphanius. This power, therefore, came from a higher spring than positive and canonical sanction. But now proceed.

The council held in Trullo,[n] complaining of the incursion of the barbarous people upon the church's inheritance, saith that it forced some bishops from their residence, and made that they could not κατὰ τὸ κρατῆσαν ἔθος τὰς χειροτονίας καὶ πάντα ἃ τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ ἀνήκει πράττειν τε καὶ μεταχειρίζεσθαι, "according to the guise of the church, give orders and do such things as did belong to the bishop:" and in the sequel of the canon they are permitted in such cases, "ut et diversorum clericorum ordinationes canonicè faciant," "to make canonical ordinations of clergymen." Giving of orders is proper, it belongs to a bishop. So the council. And, therefore, Theodoret, expounding that place of St. Paul, "by laying on the hands of the presbytery," interprets it of bishops; for this reason, because presbyters did not impose hands. There is an imperfect canon in the Arausican council,[o] that hath an expression very pertinent to this purpose: "Ea quæ non nisi per episcopos geruntur," "those things that are not done but by bishops," they were decreed still to be done by bishops, though he that was to do them regularly, did fall into any infirmity whatsoever, yet "non sub præsentia sua presbyteros agere permittat, sed evocet episcopum." Here are clearly by this canon, some things supposed to be proper to the bishops, to the action of which presbyters must, in no case, be admitted. The particulars, what they are, are not specified in the canon, but are named before, viz. orders and confirmation; for almost the whole council was concerning them, and nothing else is properly the "agendum episcopi," and the canon else is not to be understood. To the same issue is that circumlocutory description or name of a bishop, used by St. Chrysostom, ὁ μέλλων ἐμᾶς χειροτονήσειν, "the man that is to ordain clerks."

And all this is but the doctrine of the catholic church, which St. Epiphanius[p] opposed to the doctrine of Aerius, denying episcopacy to be a distinct order. Ἡ μὲν γὰρ (speaking of episcopacy) ἐστὶ πατέρων γεννητικὴ τάξις, πατέρας γὰρ γεννᾷ τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ· ἡ δὲ πατέρας μὴ δυναμένη γεννᾶν, speaking of presbytery: "The order of bishops begets fathers to the church of God, but the order of presbyters begets sons in baptism, but no fathers or doctors by ordination." It is a very remarkable passage related by Eusebius, in the ordination of Novatus to be presbyter, the bishop did it διακωλυόμενος ἀπὸ πάντος τοῦ κλήρου, "all the whole clergy was against it," yet the bishop did ordain him, and then certainly scarce any conjunction of the other clergy can be imagined; I am sure none is either expressed or intimated.[q] For it was a ruled case, and attested by the uniform practice of the church, which was set down in the third council of Carthage: "Episcopus unus esse potest, per quem dignatione Divina presbyteri multi constitui possunt."[r] This case I instance the more particularly, because it is an exact determination of a bishop's sole power of ordination. Aurelius made a motion, that if a church wanted a presbyter to become her bishop, they might demand one from any bishop. It was granted; but Posthumianus, the bishop, put this case: "Deinde qui unum habuerit, numquid debet illi ipse unus presbyter auferri?" "How, if the bishop have but one priest, must his bishop part with him to supply the necessity of the neighbour widow-church?" Yea, that he must. But how then shall he keep ordinations, when he hath never a presbyter to assist him? That indeed would have been the objection now, but it was none then; for Aurelius told them plainly, there was no inconvenience in it; for though a bishop have never a presbyter, no great matter, he can himself ordain many, and then I am sure there is a sole ordination; but if a bishop be wanting to a church, he is not so easily found.

Thus it went ordinarily in the style of the church, ordinations were made by the bishop, and the ordainer spoken of as a single person. So it is in the Nicene council,[s] the council of Antioch,[t] the council of Chalcedon,[u] and St. Jerome, who, writing to Pammachius against the errors of John of Jerusalem, "If thou speak," saith he, "of Paulinianus, he comes now and then to visit us, not as any of your clergy, but 'ejus à quo ordinatus est,' that bishop's who ordained him."

So that the issue of this argument is this. The canons of the apostles and the rules of the ancient councils appropriate the ordination of bishops to bishops, of presbyters to one bishop, (for I never find a presbyter ordained by two bishops together, but only Origen, by the bishops of Jerusalem and Cæsarea,) presbyters are never mentioned in conjunction with bishops at their ordinations, and if alone they did it, their ordination was pronounced invalid and void "ad initio."

To these particulars add this, that bishops alone were punished if ordinations were uncanonical; which were most unreasonable, if presbyters did join in them, and were causes in conjunction. But unless they did it alone, we never read that they were punishable; indeed bishops were "pro toto, et integro," as is reported by Sozomen in the case of Elpidius, Eustathius, Basilius of Ancyra, and Eleusius. Thus also it was decreed in the second and sixth chapters of the council of Chalcedon, and in the imperial constitutions.[x] Since, therefore, we never find presbyters joined with bishops in commission, or practice, or penalty, all this while; I may infer, from the premises, the same thing which the council of Hispalis expresses in direct and full sentence: "Episcopus sacerdotibus ac ministris solus honorem dare potest, solus auferre non potest:" "The bishop alone may give the priestly honour, he alone is not suffered to take it away."[y] This council was held in the year 657, and I set it down here for this purpose, to show that the decree of the fourth council of Carthage,[z] which was the first that licensed priests to assist bishops in ordinations, yet was not obligatory in the West; but for almost three hundred years after, ordinations were made by bishops alone. But till this council, no pretence of any such conjunction, and after this council, sole ordination did not expire in the West for above two hundred years together; but for aught I know, ever since then it hath obtained, that although presbyters oin not in the consecration of a bishop, yet of a presbyter they do; but this is only by a positive subintroduced constitution, first made in a provincial of Africa, and in other places received by insinuation and conformity of practice.

I know not what can be said against it. I only find a piece of an objection out of St. Cyprian, who was a man so complying with the subjects of his diocess, that, if any man, he was like to furnish us with an antinomy: "Hunc igitur, fratres dilectissimi, à me, et à collegis qui præsentes aderant, ordinatum sciatis."[a] Here either by his "colleagues" he means bishops or presbyters. If bishops, then many bishops will be found in the ordination of one to an inferior order; which, because it was, as I observed before, against the practice of christendom, will not easily be admitted to be the sense of St. Cyprian: but if he means presbyters by "collegæ," then sole ordination is invalidated by this example, for presbyters joined with him in the ordination of Aurelius.

I answer, that it matters not whether by his colleagues he means one or the other; for Aurelius the confessor, who was the man ordained, was ordained but to be a reader; and that was no order of Divine institution, no gift of the Holy Ghost, and, therefore, might be dispensed by one or more, by bishops or presbyters, and no way enters into the consideration of this question, concerning the power of collating those orders which are gifts of the Holy Ghost, and of Divine ordinance; and therefore, this, although I have seen it once pretended, yet hath no validity to impugn the constant practice of primitive antiquity.

But then are all ordinations invalid, which are done by mere presbyters, without a bishop? What think we of the reformed churches?

1. For my part, I know not what to think. The question hath been so often asked, with so much violence and prejudice, and we are so bound, by public interest, to approve all that they do, that we have disabled ourselves to justify our own. For we were glad, at first, of abettors against the errors of the Roman church; we found these men zealous in it; we thanked God for it, as we had cause; and we were willing to make them recompence, by endeavouring to justify their ordinations; not thinking what would follow upon ourselves. But now it is come to that issue, that our own episcopacy is thought not necessary, because we did not condemn the ordinations of their presbytery.

2. Why is not the question rather, what we think of the primitive church, than what we think of the reformed churches? Did the primitive councils and fathers do well in condemning the ordinations made by mere presbyters? If they did well, what was a virtue in them, is no sin in us. If they did ill, from what principle shall we judge of the right of ordinations? since there is no example in Scripture of any ordination made but by apostles and bishops; and the presbytery that imposed hands on Timothy, is, by all antiquity, expounded either of the office or of a college of presbyters; and St. Paul expounds it to be an ordination made by his own hands, as appears by comparing the two epistles to St. Timothy together; and may be so meant by the principles of all sides; for if the names be confounded, then presbyter may signify a bishop; and that they of this presbytery were not bishops, they can never prove from Scripture, where all men grant that the names are confounded.

So that whence will men take their estimate for the rites of ordinations? From Scripture? That gives it always to apostles and bishops, as I have proved; and that a priest did ever impose hands for ordination, can never be shown from thence. From whence then? From antiquity? That was so far from licensing ordinations made by presbyters alone, that presbyters, in the primitive church, did never join with bishops in collating holy orders of presbyter and deacon, till the fourth council of Carthage; much less do it alone, rightly, and with effect. So that as, in Scripture, there is nothing for presbyters' ordaining, so in antiquity there is much against it; and either in this particular we must have strange thoughts of Scripture and antiquity, or not so fair interpretation of the ordinations of reformed presbyteries. But for my part, I had rather speak a truth in sincerity, than err with a glorious correspondence.

But will not necessity excuse them, who could not have orders from orthodox bishops? Shall we either sin against our consciences, by subscribing to heretical and false resolutions "in materiâ fidei," or else lose the being of a church, for want of episcopal ordinations? Indeed if the case were just thus, it was very hard with good people of the transmarine churches; but I have here two things to consider.

[x] Novell. Constit. 6. et. 123. c. 16. [y] Cap. 6. [z] Can. 2. et 3. [a] Epist. 33.

1. I am very willing to believe, that they would not have done any thing, either of error or suspicion, but in cases of necessity. But then I consider that M. Du Plessis, a man of honour and great learning, does attest,[b] that at the first reformation, there were many archbishops and cardinals in Germany, England, France, and Italy, that joined in the reformation, whom they might, but did not, employ in their ordinations; and what necessity then can be pretended in this case, I would fain learn, that I might make their defence. But, which is of more and deeper consideration, for this might have been done by inconsideration and irresolution, as often happens in the beginning of great changes; but it is their constant and resolved practice, at least in France, that if any returns to them, they will reordain him by their presbytery, though he had, before, episcopal ordination, as both their friends and their enemies bear witness.[c]

2. I consider that necessity may excuse a personal delinquency; but I never heard that necessity did build a church. Indeed no man is forced, for his own particular, to commit a sin; for if it be absolutely a case of necessity, the action ceaseth to be a sin; but indeed if God means to build a church in any place, he will do it by means proportionable to that end; that is, by putting them into a possibility of doing and acquiring those things, which himself hath required, of necessity, to the constitution of a church. So that, supposing that ordination by a bishop is necessary for the vocation of priests and deacons, as I have proved it is, and, therefore, for the founding or perpetuating of a church, either God hath given to all churches opportunity and possibility of such ordinations, and then, necessity of the contrary is but pretence and mockery; or if he hath not given such possibility, then there is no church there to be either built or continued, but the candlestick is presently removed.

There are divers stories in Ruffinus to this purpose.[d] When Ædesius and Frumentius were surprised by the barbarous Indians, they preached christianity, and baptized many; but themselves, being but laymen, could make no ordinations, and so not fix a church. What then was to be done in the case? "Frumentius Alexandriam pergit: et rem omnem, ut gesta est, narrat episcopo, ac monet, ut provideat virum aliquem dignum, quem congregatis jam plurimis christianis in barbarico solo episcopum mittat." "Frumentius comes to Alexandria to get a bishop." Athanasius, being then patriarch, ordained Frumentius their bishop; "et tradito ei sacerdotio, redire cum cum Domini gratiâ unde venerat jubet: ex quo," saith Ruffinus, "in Indiæ partibus, et populi christianorum et ecclesiæ factæ sunt, et sacerdotium cœpit."[e]

The same happened in the case of the Iberians converted by a captive woman: "Posteà verò quàm ecclesia magnificè constructa est, et populi fidem Dei majore ardore sitiebant, captivæ monitis ad imperatorem Constantinum totius gentis legatio mittitur: res gesta exponitur: sacerdotes mittere oratur, qui cœptum erga se Dei munus implerent." The work of christianity could not be completed, nor a church founded, without the ministry of bishops. Thus the case is evident, that the want of a bishop will not excuse us from our endeavours of acquiring one; and where God means to found a church, there he will supply them with those means and ministers, which himself hath made of ordinary and absolute necessity. And, therefore, if it happens that those bishops, which are of ordinary ministration amongst us, prove heretical, still God's church is catholic; and though with trouble, yet orthodox bishops may be acquired. For just so it happened when Mauvia, queen of the Saracens, was so earnest to have Moses, the hermit, made the bishop of her nation, and offered peace to the catholics upon that condition; Lucius, an Arian, troubled the affair by his interposing and offering to ordain Moses: the hermit discovered his vileness, "et ita majore decore deformatus compulsus est acquiescere."[f] Moses refused to be ordained by him that was an Arian. So did the reformed churches refuse ordinations by the bishops of the Roman communion. But what then might they have done? Even the same that Moses did in that necessity: "Compulsus est ab episcopis, quos in exilium truserat, (Lucius,) sacerdotium sumere." Those good people might have had order from the bishops of England or the Lutheran churches, if at least they thought our churches catholic and christian.

If an ordinary necessity will not excuse this, will not an extraordinary calling justify it? yea, most certainly, could we but see an ordinary proof for an extraordinary calling, viz. an evident prophecy, demonstration of miracles, certainty of reason, clarity of sense, or any thing that might make faith of an extraordinary mission.

But shall we then condemn those few of the reformed churches, whose ordinations always have been without bishops? No, indeed; that must not be: they stand or fall to their own master. And though I cannot justify their ordinations, yet what degree their necessity is of, what their desire of episcopal ordinations may do for their personal excuse, and how far a good life and a catholic belief may lead a man in the way to heaven, although the forms of external communion be not observed, I cannot determine. For aught I know, their condition is the same with that of the church of Pergamus: "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is; and thou holdest fast my faith, and hast not denied my name:" "Nihilominus habeo adversus te pauca;" "some few things I have against thee;" and yet of them, the want of canonical ordinations is a defect, which,

I trust, themselves desire to be remedied; but if it cannot be done, their sin indeed is the less, but their misery the greater. I am sure I have said sooth, but whether or no it will be thought so, I cannot tell; and yet why it may not, I cannot guess, unless they only be impeccable; which, I suppose, will not so easily be thought of them, who themselves think, that all the church possibly may fail. But this I would not have declared so freely, had not the necessity of our own churches required it, and the first pretence of the legality and validity of their ordinations been buoyed up to the height of an absolute necessity; for else why shall it be called tyranny in us, to call on them to conform to us, and to the practice of the catholic church, and yet in them be called a good and a holy zeal to exact our conformity to them; but I hope it will so happen to us, that it will be verified here, what was once said of the catholics, under the fury of Justina: "Sed tanta fuit perseverantia fidelium populorum, ut animas prius amittere, quàm episcopum mallent;" if it were put to our choice, rather to die, (to wit, the death of martyrs, not rebels,) than lose the sacred order and offices of episcopacy, without which no priest, no ordination, no consecration of the sacrament, no absolution, no rite, or sacrament, legitimately can be performed, in order to eternity.

The sum is this. If the canons and sanctions apostolical; if the decrees of eight famous councils in christendom, of Ancyra, of Antioch, of Sardis, of Alexandria, two of Constantinople, the Arausican council, and that of Hispalis; if the constant successive acts of the famous martyr-bishops of Rome making ordinations; if the testimony of the whole pontifical book; if the dogmatical resolution of so many fathers, St. Denis, St. Cornelius, St. Athanasius, St. Jerome, St. Chrysostom, St. Epiphanius, St. Austin, and divers others, all appropriating ordinations to the bishop's hand; if the constant voice of christendom, declaring ordinations made by presbyters to be null and void in the nature of the thing; and never any act of ordination by a non-bishop approved by any council, decretal, or single suffrage of any famous man in christendom; if that ordinations of bishops were always made, and they ever done by bishops, and no pretence of priests joining with them in their consecrations, and after all this it was declared heresy to communicate the power of giving orders to presbyters, either alone or in conjunction with bishops, as it was in the case of Aerius; if all this, that is, if whatsoever can be imagined, be sufficient to make faith in this particular,—then it is evident that the power and order of bishops is greater than the power and order of presbyters, to wit, in this great particular of ordination, and that by this loud voice and united vote of christendom.

SECTION XXXIII.

And Confirmation.

But this was but the first part of the power, which catholic antiquity affixed to the order of episcopacy. The next is of confirmation of baptized people. And here the rule was this, which was thus expressed by Damascen: "Apostolorum et successorum eorum est, per manûs impositionem donum Spiritûs Sancti tradere;" "It belongs to the apostles and their successors, to give the Holy Ghost by imposition of hands."[a] But see this in particular instance.

The council of Eliberis, giving permission to faithful people of the laity to baptize catechumens in the cases of necessity, and exigence of journey: "Ita tamen ut si supervixerit baptizatus, ad episcopum eum perducat, ut per manûs impositionem proficere possit:" "Let him be carried to the bishop, to be improved by imposition of the bishop's hands." This was law.

It was also a custom, saith St. Cyprian, "Quod nunc quoque apud nos geritur, ut qui in ecclesiâ baptizantur, per præpositos ecclesiæ offerantur, et per nostram orationem, et manûs impositionem, Spiritum Sanctum consequantur, et signaculo Dominico consummentur;"[b] and this custom was catholic too, and the law was of universal concernment. "Omnes fideles, per manuum impositionem episcoporum, Spiritum Sanctum post baptismum accipere debent, ut pleni christiani accipere debent." So St. Urban, in his decretal epistle;[c] and, "Omnibus festinandum est sine morâ renasci, et demùm consignari ab episcopo, et septiformem Spiritûs Sancti gratiam recipere;" so saith the old author of the fourth epistle under the name of St. Clement: "All faithful baptized people must go to the bishop to be consigned, and so by imposition of the bishop's hands, to obtain the sevenfold gifts of the Holy Ghost."

Meltiades, in his epistle to the bishops of Spain, affirms confirmation in this to have a special excellency besides baptism: "Quòd solùm à summis sacerdotibus confertur;" "because bishops only can give confirmation;" and the same is said and proved by St. Eusebius, in his third epistle, enjoining great veneration to this holy mystery: "Quòd ab aliis perfici non potest nisi à summis sacerdotibus:" "It cannot, it may not, be performed by any but by the bishops."

Thus St. Chrysostom, speaking of St. Philip converting the Samaritans,[d] διὸ καὶ βαπτίζων, Πνεῦμα τοις βαπτιζομένοις οὐκ ἐδίδου. Οὐδε γὰρ εἶχεν ἐξουσίαν. Τοῦτο γὰρ τὸ δῶρον μόνων τῶν δώδεκα ἦν. "Philip, baptizing the men of Samaria, gave not the Holy Ghost to them whom he had baptized. For he had not power. For this gift was only of the twelve apostles." And a little after, τοῦτο ἦν τῶν ἀποστόλων ἐξαίρετον. "This was peculiar to the apostles." Ὅθεν καὶ τοὺς κορυφαίους, οὐκ ἄλ-λους τινάς ἐστιν ἰδεῖν τοῦτο ποιοῦντας· "whence it comes to pass, that the principal and chief of the church do it, and none else." And George Pachymeres,[e] the paraphrast of St. Dionysius, Χρεία τοῦ ἀρχιερέως ἔσται εἰς τὸ χρῖσαι τῷ μύρῳ τὸν βαπτισθέντα· αὕτη γὰρ ἦν ἡ ἀρχαῖα συνήθεια· "It is required that a bishop should consign faithful people baptized: for this was the ancient practice."

I shall not need to instance in too many particulars; for that the ministry of confirmation was, by catholic custom, appropriate to bishops in all ages of the primitive church, is to be seen by the concurrent testimony of councils and fathers, particularly of St. Clemens Alexandrinus, in Eusebius,[f] Tertullian,[g] St. Innocentius the First,[h] Damasus,[i] St. Leo,[k] in John the Third,[l] in St. Gregory,[m] Amphilochius, in the life of St. Basil, telling the story of Bishop Maximinus confirming Basilius and Eubulus, the council of Orleans,[n] and of Melda,[o] and, lastly, of Sevill,[p] which affirms, "Non licere presbyteris, per impositionem manûs fidelibus baptizandis Paracletum Spiritum tradere:" "It is not lawful for presbyters to give confirmation, for it is properly an act of episcopal power:"—"Chrismate Spiritus Sanctus super infunditur. Utraque verò ista manu et ore antistitis impetramus." These are enough for authority and dogmatical resolution, from antiquity. For truth is, the first that ever did communicate the power of confirming to presbyters, was Photius, the first author of that unhappy and long-lasting schism between the Latin and Greek churches, and it was upon this occasion too. For when the Bulgarians were first converted, the Greeks sent presbyters to baptize and to confirm them. But the Latins sent again to have them re-confirmed; both because (as they pretended) the Greeks had no jurisdiction in Bulgaria, nor the presbyters a capacity of order to give confirmation.[q]

The matters of fact and acts episcopal, of confirmation, are innumerable; but most famous are those confirmations made by St. Rembert, bishop of Brema, and of St. Malchus, attested by St. Bernard, because they were ratified by a miracle, saith the ancient story.[r] I end this with the saying of St. Jerome; "Exigis ubi scriptum sit? In Actibus Apostolorum. Sed etiamsi scripturæ auctoritas non subesset, totius orbis in hanc partem consensus instar præcepti obtineret:" "If you ask where it is written," (viz. that bishops alone should confirm,) "it is written in the Acts of the Apostles;" (meaning, by precedent, though not express precept;) "but if there were no authority of Scripture for it, yet the consent of all the world upon this particular is instead of a command." It was fortunate that St. Jerome hath expressed himself so confidently in this affair, for by this we are armed against an objection from his own words; for in the same dialogue, speaking of some acts of episcopal privilege and peculiar ministration, particularly of confirmation, he says, it was "ad honorem potius sacerdotii quàm ad legis necessitatem:" "for the honour of the priesthood, rather than for the necessity of a law."

To this the answer is evident from his own words: "That bishops should give the Holy Ghost in confirmation, is written in the Acts of the Apostles;" and now that this is reserved, rather "for the honour of episcopacy, than a simple necessity in the nature of the thing," makes no matter. For the question here, that is only of concernment, is not to what end this power is reserved to the bishop, but by whom it was reserved? Now St. Jerome says it was done "apud acta," "in the Scripture;" therefore, by God's Holy Spirit; and the end he also specifies, viz. "for the honour of that sacred order," "non propter legis necessitatem," "not that there is any necessity of law," that confirmation should be administered by the bishop. Not that a priest may do it, but that, as St. Jerome himself there argues, the Holy Ghost being already given in baptism, if it happens that bishops may not be had, (for he puts the case concerning persons in bondage, and places remote and destitute of bishops,) then, in that case, there is not the absolute necessity of a law, that confirmation should be had at all: a man does not perish if he have it not; for that this thing was reserved to a bishop's peculiar ministration, was indeed an honour to the function, but it was not for the necessity of a law tying people, in all cases, actually to acquire it. So that this "non necessarium" is not to be referred to the bishop's ministration, as if it were not necessary for him to do it when it is to be done, nor that a priest may do it if a bishop may not be had; but this non-necessity is to be referred to confirmation itself; so that if a bishop cannot be had, confirmation, though with much loss, yet with no danger, may be omitted. This is the sum of St. Jerome's discourse, this reconciles him to himself, this makes him speak conformably to his first assertions, and, consequently, to his arguments; and to be sure, no exposition can make these words to intend, that this reservation of the power of confirmation to bishops is not done by the Spirit of God, and then let the sense of the words be what they will, they can do no hurt to the cause; and as easily may we escape from those words of his, to Rusticus, bishop of Narbona: "Sed quia scriptum est, presbyteri duplici honore honorentur; prædicare eos decet, utile est benedicere, congruum confirmare," &c. It is quoted by Gratian, dist. 95. can. "Ecce Ego." But the gloss upon the place expounds him thus, i. e. "in fide," "the presbyters may preach, they may confirm their auditors, not by consignation of chrism, but by confirmation of faith;" and for this quotes a parallel place for the use of the word "confirmare," by authority of St. Gregory, who sent Zachary, his legate, into Germany, from the see of Rome, "Ut orthodoxos episcopos, pres-byteros, vel quoscunque reperire potuisset in verbo exhortationis perfectos, ampliùs confirmaret."[s] Certainly St. Gregory did not intend that his legate, Zachary, should confirm bishops and priests in any other sense but this of St. Jerome in the present, to wit, in faith and doctrine, not in rite and mystery; and neither could St. Jerome himself intend, that presbyters should do it all but in this sense of St. Gregory; for else he becomes an antistrephon, and his own opposite.

Yea, but there is a worse matter than this. St. Ambrose tells of the Egyptian priests, "that they, in the absence of the bishop, do confirm." "Denique apud Ægyptum presbyteri consignant, si præsens non sit episcopus."[t] But,

1. The passage is suspicious, for it interrupts a discourse of St. Ambrose concerning the primitive order of election to the bishopric, and is no way pertinent to the discourse, but is encircled with a story of a far different consequence, which is not easily thought to have been done by any considering and intelligent author.

2. But suppose the clause be not surreptitious, but natural to the discourse, and born with it, yet it is matter of fact, not of right, for St. Ambrose neither approves nor disproves it, and so it must go for a singular act against the catholic practice and laws of christendom.

3. If the whole clause be not surreptitious, yet the word "consignant" is; for St. Austin, who hath the same discourse of the same thing, viz. of the dignity of presbyters, tells this story of the act and honour of presbyters in Alexandria and all Egypt, almost in the other words of his master, St. Ambrose; but he tells it thus: "Nam et in Alexandriâ et per totam Ægyptum si desit episcopus, consecrat presbyter."[u] So that it should not be "consignat," but "consecrat;" for no story tells of any confirmations done in Egypt by presbyters, but of consecrating the eucharist in cases of episcopal absence or commission. I shall give account, in the question of jurisdiction, that that was indeed permitted in Egypt and some other places, but confirmation never, that we can find elsewhere; and this is too improbable to bear weight against evidence and practice apostolical, and four councils, and sixteen ancient catholic fathers, testifying that it was a practice and a law of christendom, that bishops only should confirm, and not priests; so that if there be no other scruple, this question is quickly at an end.

But St. Gregory is also pretended in objection; for he gave dispensation to the priests of Sardinia, "ut baptizatos unguant," "to aneal baptized people."[x] Now anointing the forehead of the baptized person was one of the solemnities of confirmation, so that this indulgence does arise to a power of confirming; for "unctio" and "chrismatio," in the first Arausican council, and since that time "sacramentum chrismatis," hath been the usual word for confirmation. But this will not much trouble the business.

Because it is evident that he means it not of confirmation, but of the chrism in those times by the rites of the church used in baptism. For, in his ninth epistle, he forbids priests to anoint baptized people; now here is precept against precept; therefore, it must be understood of several anointings, and so St. Gregory expounds himself in this ninth epistle: "Presbyteri baptizatos infantes signare bis in fronte chrismate non præsumant:" "Presbyters may not anoint baptized people twice," once they might; now that this permission of anointing was that which was a ceremony of baptism, not an act of confirmation,—we shall see by comparing it with other canons. In the collection of the oriental canons, by Martinus Bracarensis, it is decreed thus: "Presbyter præsente episcopo, non signet infantes nisi forte ab episcopo fuerit illi præceptum:"[y] "A priest must not sign infants without leave of the bishop, if he be present."—"Must not sign them;" that is, with chrism in their foreheads, and that in baptism; for the circumstant canons do expressly explicate and determine it; for they are concerning the rites of baptism, and this in the midst of them. And by the way, this may answer St. Ambrose's "presbyteri consignant, absente episcopo," in case it be so to be read; for here we see a consignation permitted to the presbyters in the Eastern churches to be used in baptism, in the absence of the bishop, and this an act of indulgence and favour, and, therefore, extraordinary, and of use to St. Ambrose's purpose of advancing the presbyters, but yet of no objection in case of confirmation. And indeed "consignari" is used in antiquity for any signing with the cross, and annealing. Thus it is used in the first Arausican council for extreme unction,[z] which is there, in case of extreme necessity, permitted to presbyters: "Hæreticos in mortis discrimine positos, si catholici esse desiderent, si desit episcopus, à presbyteris cum chrismate et benedictione consignari placet." "Consigned" is the word, and it was clearly in extreme unction; for that rite was not then ceased, and it was in annealing a dying body, and a part of reconciliation, and so limited by the sequent canon, and not to be fancied of any other consignation.—But I return. The first council of Toledo prohibits any from making chrism but bishops only,[a] and takes order, "ut de singulis ecclesiis ad episcopum, ante diem paschæ diaconi destinentur, ut confectum chrisma ab episcopo destinatum ad diem paschæ possit occurrere:" "that the chrism be fetched by the deacons from the bishop, to be used in all churches." But for what use? Why, it was "destinatum ad diem paschæ," says the canon, "against the holy time of Easter;" and then, at Easter, was the solemnity of public baptisms, so that it was to be used in baptism. And this sense being premised, the canon permits to presbyters to sign with chrism, the same thing that St. Gregory did to the priests of Sardinia. "Statutum verò est, diaconum non chrismare, sed presbyterum, absente episcopo; præsente verò, si ab ipso fuerit præceptum." Now although this be evident enough, yet it is something clearer in the first Arausican council:[c] "Nullus ministrorum, qui baptizandi recipit officium, sine chrismate usquam debet progredi, quia inter nos placuit semel in baptismate chrismari." The case is evident, that chrismation or consigning with ointment was used in baptism; and it is as evident that this chrismation was it which St. Gregory permitted to the presbyters; not the other, for he expressly forbade the other; and the exigence of the canons, and practice of the church, expound it so; and it is the same which St. Innocent the First decreed in more express and distinctive terms:[d] "Presbyteris chrismate baptizatos ungere licet, sed quod ab episcopo fuerit consecratum;" there is a clear permission of consigning with chrism in baptism; but he subjoins a prohibition to priests, for doing it in confirmation: "Non tamen frontem eodem oleo signare, quod solis debetur episcopis, cùm tradunt Spiritum Sanctum Paracletum."

By the way; some, that they might the more clearly determine St. Gregory's dispensation to be only in baptismal chrism, read it, "Ut baptizandos ungant," not "baptizatos;" so Gratian, so St. Thomas; but it is needless to be troubled with that; for Innocentius, in the decretal now quoted, useth the word "baptizatos," and yet clearly distinguishes this power from the giving the chrism in confirmation.

I know no other objection, and these, we see, hinder not, but that having such evidence of fact in Scripture, of confirmations done only by apostles, and this evidence urged by the fathers for the practice of the church, and the power of confirmation, by many councils and fathers, appropriated to bishops, and denied to presbyters, and in this they are not only doctors, teaching their own opinion, but witnesses of a catholic practice, and do actually attest it as done by a catholic consent; and no one example, in all antiquity, ever produced of any priest, that did, no law that a priest might, impose hands for confirmation;—we may conclude it to be a power apostolical in the original, episcopal in the succession, and that, in this power, the order of a bishop is higher than that of a presbyter, and so declared by this instance of catholic practice.

SECTION XXXIV.

And Jurisdiction. Which they expressed in Attributes of Authority and great Power.

THUS far I hope we are right. But I call to mind, that in the nosotrophium of the old philosopher, that undertook to cure all calentures by bathing his patients in water; some were up to the chin, some to the middle, some to the knees; so it is amongst the enemies of the sacred order of episcopacy; some endure not the name, and they, indeed, deserve to be over head and ears; some will have them all one in office with presbyters, as at first they were in name; and they had need bathe up to the chin; but some stand shallower, and grant a little distinction, a precedency perhaps for order's sake, but no pre-eminence in reglement, no superiority of jurisdiction: others by all means would be thought to be quite through in behalf of bishops' order and power, such as it is, but call for a reduction to the primitive state, and would have all bishops like the primitive; but because by this means they think to impair their power, they may well endure to be up to the ancles; their error indeed is less, and their pretence fairer, but the use they make of it of very ill consequence. But curing the mistake will quickly cure this distemper. That then shall be the present issue, that in the primitive church bishops had more power, and greater exercise of absolute jurisdiction, than now men will endure to be granted, or than themselves are very forward to challenge.

1. Then: the primitive church expressing the calling and offices of a bishop, did it in terms of presidency and authority. "Episcopus typum Dei Patris omnium gerit," saith St. Ignatius:[a] "the bishop carries the representment of God the Father," that is, in power and authority to be sure, (for how else?) so as to be the supreme "in suo ordine," in offices ecclesiastical. And again, "Quid enim aliud est episcopus quàm is, qui omni principatu et potestate superior est?" Here his superiority and advantage is expressed to be in his "power:" a bishop is greater and higher than all other in power, viz. "in materiâ," or "gradu religionis." And in his epistle to the Magnesians: "Hortor ut hoc sit omnibus studium in Dei concordiâ, omnia agere, episcopo præsidente loco Dei:" "Do all things in unity, the bishop being president in the place of God." "President" in all things. And with a fuller tide yet, in his epistle to the church of Smyrna: "Honora episcopum, ut principem sacerdotum imaginem Dei referentem, Dei quidem propter principatum, Christi verò propter sacerdotum." It is full of fine expression both for eminency of order and jurisdiction. The bishop is "the prince of the priests, bearing the image of God for his principality," that is his jurisdiction and power: but "of Christ himself for his priesthood;" that is his order. St. Ignatius hath spoken fairly; and if we consider that he was so primitive a man that himself saw Christ in the flesh, and lived a man of exemplary sanctity, and died a martyr, and hath been honoured as a holy catholic by all posterity,—certainly these testimonies must needs be of great pressure, being "sententiæ repetiti dogmatis," not casually slipped from him, and by incogitancy, but resolutely and frequently.

But this is attested by the general expressions of after-ages. "Fungaris circa eum potestate honoris tui," saith St. Cyprian to Bishop Rogatianus:[b] "Execute the power of thy dignity" upon the refractory deacon; and "vigor episcopalis," and "auctoritas cathedræ" are the words expressive of that power, whatsoever it be, which St. Cyprian calls upon him to assert in the same epistle. This is high enough. So is that which he presently subjoins, calling the bishop's power "ecclesiæ gubernandæ sublimem ac divinam potestatem," "a high and a divine power and authority in regiment of the church." "Locus magisterii traditus ab apostolis," so St. Irenæus calls episcopacy;[c] "a place of mastership or authority delivered by the apostles to the bishops their successors." Eusebius speaking of Dionysius, who succeeded Heraclas, he received, (saith he,) τῆς προστασίας τῶν κατ' Ἀλεξάνδρειαν ἐκκλησιῶν τὴν ἐπισκοπὴν,[d] "the bishopric of the presidency over the churches of Alexandria:" εἰς τὴν ἀψίδα τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς, saith the council of Sardis; "to the top or height of episcopacy." "Apices et principes omnium," so Optatus calls bishops; "the chief and head of all;"—and St. Denis, of Alexandria,[e] "scribit ad Fabianum, urbis Romæ episcopum, et ad alios quam plurimos ecclesiarum principes de fide catholicâ suâ," saith Eusebius. And Origen calls the bishop, "eum qui totius ecclesiæ arcem obtinet;" "he that hath obtained the tower or height of the church."[f]

[c] Can. 1. [d] Epist. 1. ad Decent. c. 3.

[a] Epist. ad Trall. [b] Lib. iii. Epist. 9.

The fathers of the council of Constantinople in Trullo, ordained that the bishops,—dispossessed of their churches by encroachments of barbarous people upon the churches' pale, so as the bishop had in effect no diocess,—yet they should enjoy τῇ τῆς προεδρίας εὐθεντίᾳ κατὰ τὸν ἴδιον ὅρον, "the authority of their presidency according to their proper state;" their appropriate presidency. And the same council calls the bishop τὸν τῆς πόλεως πρόεδρον, "the prelate or prefect of the church;" I know not how to expound it better. But it is something more full in the Greeks' council of Carthage,[g] commanding that the convert Donatists should be received according to the will and pleasure of the bishop, τοῦ ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ τόπῳ κυβερνῶντος ἐκκλησίαν, "that governs the church in that place." And in the council of Antioch, ἐπίσκοπον ἔχειν τῶν τῆς ἐκκλησίας πραγμάτων ἐξουσίαν,[h] "the bishop hath power over the affairs of the church." "Hoc quidem tempore Romanæ ecclesiæ Sylvester retinacula gubernabat:" "St. Sylvester (the bishop) held the reins or the stern of the Roman church;" saith Theodoret.[i]

But the instances of this kind are infinite; two may be as good as twenty, and these they are. The first is of St. Ambrose:[k] "Honor et sublimitas episcopalis nullis poterit comparationibus adæquari:" "The honour and sublimity of episcopal order is beyond all comparison great." And their commission he specifies to be in "pasce oves meas;" "unde regendæ sacerdotibus contraduntur, meritò rectoribus suis subdi dicuntur," &c.: "The sheep are delivered to bishops as to rulers, and are made their subjects:" and in the next chapter:[l] "Hæc verò cuncta, fratres, ideò nos præmisisse cognoscere debetis, ut ostenderemus nihil esse in hoc sæculo excellentius sacerdotibus, nihil sublimius episcopis reperiri: ut cùm dignitatem episcopatûs episcoporum oraculis demonstramus, et dignè nos camus quid sumus, actione potius quàm nomine demonstremus:" "These things I have said, that you may know nothing is higher, nothing more excellent than the dignity and eminence of a bishop," &c. The other is of St. Jerome: "Cura totius ecclesiæ ad episcopum pertinet:" "The care of the whole church appertains to the bishop." But more confidently spoken is that in his dialogue "adversus Luciferianos:" "Ecclesiæ salus in summi sacerdotis dignitate pendet; cui si non exors quædam et ab omnibus eminens detur potestas, tot in ecclesiis efficientur schismata quot sacerdotes:" "The safety of the church consists in the dignity of a bishop, to whom unless an eminent and unparalleled power be given by all, there will be as many schisms as priests."[m]

Here is dignity, and authority, and power enough expressed; and if words be expressive of things, (and there is no other use of them,) then the bishop is superior in a peerless and incomparable authority; and all the whole diocess are his subjects, viz. "in regimine spirituali."

SECTION XXXV.

Requiring Universal Obedience to be given to Bishops by Clergy and Laity.

BUT from words let us pass to things. For the faith and practice of christendom require obedience, universal obedience, to be given to bishops. I will begin again with Ignatius, that these men, who call for reduction of episcopacy to primitive consistence, may see what they gain by it; for the more primitive the testimonies are, the greater exaction of obedience to bishops; for it happened in this, as in all other things: at first, christians were more devout, more pursuing of their duties, more zealous in attestation of every particle of their faith; and that episcopacy is now come to so low an ebb, it is nothing; but that, it being a great part of christianity to honour and obey them, it hath the fate of all other parts of our religion, and particularly of charity, come to so low a declension, as it can scarce stand alone; and faith, which shall scarce be found upon earth at the coming of the Son of man.

But to our business.

St. Ignatius, in his epistle to the church of Trallis, "Necesse itaque est," saith he, "quicquid facitis, ut sine episcopo nihil tentetis." So the Latin of Vedelius, which I the rather choose, because I am willing to give all the advantage I can. "It is necessary," saith the good martyr, "that whatsoever ye do, you should attempt nothing without your bishop." And to the Magnesians, "Decet itaque vos obedire episcopo, et in nullo illi refragari:" "It is fitting that ye should obey your bishop, and in nothing to be refractory to him." Here is both a "decet" and a "necesse est," already. "It is very fitting, it is necessary." But if it be possible, we have a fuller expression yet, in the same epistle: "Quemadmodum enim Dominus sine Patre nihil facit, 'Nec enim possum facere à meipso quicquam:' sic et vos sine episcopo, nec diaconus, nec laiconus, nec laicus; nec quicquam videatur vobis consentaneum quod sit præter illius judicium; quod enim tale est, et Deo inimicum." Here is obedience universal, both in respect of things and persons; and all this no less than absolutely necessary. "For as Christ obeyed his Father in all things, saying, 'Of myself I can do nothing;' so nor you without your bishop, whoever you be, whether priest, or deacon, or layman: let nothing please you, which the bishop dislikes; for all such things are wicked, and in enmity with God." But it seems St. Ignatius was mightily in love with this precept, for he gives it to almost all the churches he writes to. We have already reckoned the Trallians and the Magnesians. But the same he gives to the priests of Tarsus, οἱ πρεσβύτεροι ὑποτασσέτωσαν ἐπισκόπῳ. "Ye presbyters, be subject to your bishop." The same to the Philadelphians: "Sine episcopo nihil facite:" "Do nothing without your bishop." But this is better explicated in his epistle to the church of Smyrna: "Sine episcopo nemo quicquam faciat eorum, quæ ad ecclesiam spectant:" "No man may do any thing without the bishop," viz. "of those things which belong to the church." So that this saying expounds all the rest; for this universal obedience is to be understood according to the sense of the church, viz. to be in all things of ecclesiastical cognizance, all church-affairs. And, therefore, he gives a charge to St. Polycarp, their bishop, that he also look to it, that nothing be done without his leave. "Nihil sine tuo arbitrio agatur, nec item tu quicquam præter Dei facies voluntatem:" "As thou must do nothing against God's will, so let nothing (in the church) be done without thine." By the way, observe, he says not, that as the presbytery must do nothing without the bishop, so the bishop nothing without them;—but, so the bishop nothing without God. But so it is. "Nothing must be done without the bishop;" and therefore, although he encourages them that can, to remain in virginity; yet this, if it be either done with pride or without the bishop, it is spoiled. For, "Si gloriatus fuerit, periit, et si id ipsum statuatur sine episcopo, corruptum est." His last dictate in this epistle to St. Polycarp, is with an "Episcopo attendite, sicut et Deus vobis:" "The way to have God to take care of us, is to observe our bishop." "Hinc et vos decet accedere sententiæ episcopi, qui secundum Deum vos pascit; quemadmodum et facitis, edocti à Spiritu:" "You must, therefore, conform to the sentence of the bishop; as indeed ye do already, being taught so to do by God's Holy Spirit."[a]

There needs no more to be said in this cause, if the authority of so great a man will bear so great a burden. What the man was, I said before; what these epistles are, and of what authority, let it rest upon Vedelius,[b] a man who is nowise to be suspected as a party for episcopacy; or rather upon the credit of Eusebius,[c] St. Jerome,[d] and Ruffinus,[e] who reckon the first seven, out of which I have taken these excerpta, for natural and genuine. And now I will make this use of it; Those men that call for reduction of episcopacy to the primitive state, should do well to stand close to their principles, and count that the best episcopacy which is first; and then consider but what St. Ignatius hath told us for direction in this affair, and see what is gotten in the bargain. For my part, since they that call for such a reduction, hope to gain by it, and then would most certainly have abidden by it, I think it not reasonable to abate any thing of Ignatius's height, but expect such subordination and conformity to the bishop, as he then knew to be a law of christianity. But let this be remembered all along, in the specification of the parts of their jurisdiction. But, as yet, I am in the general demonstration of obedience.

The council of Laodicea,[f] having specified some particular instances of subordination and dependence to the bishop, sums them up thus: ὡσαύτως δὲ καὶ τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους, μηδὲν πράττειν ἄνευ γνώμης τοῦ ἐπισκόπου· "So likewise the presbyters, let them do nothing without the precept and counsel of the bishop;"[g] so is the translation of Isidore, "ad verbum."[h] This council is ancient enough, for it was before the first Nicene. So also was that of Arles, commanding the same thing exactly: "Ut presbyteri, sine conscientiâ episcoporum, nihil faciant. Sed nec presbyteris civitatis sine episcopi præcepto amplius aliquid imperare, vel sine auctoritate literarum ejus in unâquâque parochiâ aliquid agere," says the thirteenth canon of the Anzyran council, according to the Latin of Isidore.[i] The same thing is in the first council of Toledo, the very same words for which I cited the first council of Arles; viz. "That presbyters do nothing without the knowledge or permission of the bishop. "Esto subjectus pontifici tuo, et quasi animæ parentem suscipe." It is the council of St. Jerome: "Be subject to thy bishop, and receive him as the father of thy soul."[k]

I shall not need to derive hither any more particular instances of the duty and obedience owing from the laity to the bishop; for this account will certainly be admitted by all considering men. God hath intrusted the souls of the laity to the care of the ecclesiastical orders; they, therefore, are to submit to the government of the clergy, in matters spiritual, with which they are intrusted. For either there is no government at all, or the laity must govern the church, or else the clergy must. To say there is no government, is to leave the church in worse condition than a tyranny. To say that the laity should govern the church, when all ecclesiastical ministries are committed to the clergy, is to say, Scripture means not what it says; for it is to say, that the clergy must be "præpositi," and προεστῶτες, and "prælati;" and yet the prelation, and presidency, and rule, is in them who are not ever, by God's Spirit, called presidents or prelates, and that it is not in them who are so called. In the mean time, if the laity, in matters spiritual, are inferior to the clergy, and must, in things pertaining to the soul, be ruled by them, with whom their souls are intrusted; then also, much rather they must obey those of the clergy, to whom all the other clergy themselves are bound to be obedient. Now since, by the frequent precept of so many councils and fathers, the deacons and presbyters must submit, in all things, to the bishop, much more must the laity; and since the bishop must rule in chief, and the presbyters, at the most, can but rule in conjunction and assistance, but ever in subordination to the bishop, the laity must obey "de integro." For that is to keep them in that state, in which God hath placed them.

But for the main: St. Clement, in his epistle to St. James, translated by Ruffinus, saith it was the doctrine of Peter, according to the institution of Christ, "That presbyters should be obedient to their bishop in all things;" and in his third epistle, "That presbyters and deacons, and others of the clergy, must take heed, that they do nothing without the license of the bishop." And to make this business up complete, all these authorities of great antiquity were not the prime constitutions in those several churches respectively, but mere derivations from tradition apostolical; for not only the thing, but the words so often mentioned, are in the fortieth canon of the apostles. Οἱ πρεσβύτεροι καὶ διάκονοι ἄνευ γνώμης τοῦ ἐπισκόπου μηδὲν ἐπιτελείτωσαν, (the same is repeated in the twenty-fourth canon of the council of Antioch,) αὐτὸς γάρ ἐστιν ὁ πεπιστευμένος τὸν λαὸν τοῦ Κυρίου, καὶ τὸν ὑπὲρ τῶν ψυχῶν αὐτῶν λόγον ἀπαιτηθησόμενος· "Presbyters and deacons must do nothing without leave of the bishop; for to him the Lord's people is committed, and he must give an account for their souls." And if a presbyter shall contemn his own bishop, making conventions apart, and erecting another altar, he is to be deposed, ὡς φίλαρχος, saith the thirty-second canon, "as a lover of principality;" intimating, that he arrogates episcopal dignity, and so is ambitious of a principality, The issue then is this. The presbyters, and clergy, and laity must obey; therefore, the bishop must govern and give them laws. It was particularly instanced in the case of St. Chrysostom, καὶ τὴν Ποντικὴν τούτοις κατεκόσμει τοῖς νόμοις, saith Theodoret: "He adorned and instructed Pontus with these laws;" so he, reckoning up the extent of his jurisdiction.[1]

But now descend we to a specification of the power and jurisdiction of bishops.

SECTION XXXVI.

Appointing them to be Judges of the Clergy, and Spiritual Causes of the Laity.

The bishops were ecclesiastical judges over th presbyters, the inferior clergy, and the laity. Wha they were in Scripture who were constituted i presidency over causes spiritual, I have alread twice explicated; and from hence it descended, b a close succession, that they who watched for souls they had the rule over them, and because no regi ment can be without coercion, therefore there wa inherent in them a power of cognition of causes and coercion of persons. The canons of the apos tles, appointing censures to be inflicted on delin quent persons, make the bishop's hand to do it Εἴ τις πρεσβύτερος, ἢ διάκονος, ἀπὸ ἐπισκόπου γένηται ἀφωρισμένος, τοῦτον μὴ ἐξεῖναι παρ' ἑτέρου δέχεσθαι, ἀλλ' ἢ παρὰ ἀφορίσαντος αὐτὸν, εἰ μὴ ἂν κατὰ συγκυρίαν τελευτήσει ὁ ἀφορίσας αὐτὸν ἐπίσκοπος. "If any presbyter or deacon be excommunicated by the bishop, he must not be received by any else, but by him that did so censure him, unless the bishop that censured him be dead."[a] The same is repeated in the Nicene council; only it is permitted that any one may appeal to a synod of bishops: "Si fortè aliquâ indignatione, aut contentione, aut quâlibet commotione episcopi sui, excommunicati sint," if he thinks himself wronged by prejudice or passion; and when the synod is met, "hujusmodi examinent quæstiones."[b] But by the way, it must be "synodus episcoporum;" so the canon: "Ut ita demum hi, qui, ob culpas suas, episcoporum suorum offensas meritò contraxerunt, dignè etiam à cæteris excommunicati habeantur, quousque in communi, vel ipsi episcopo suo visum fuerit humaniorem circà eos ferre sententiam:" "The synod of bishops must ratify the excommunication of all those, who, for their delinquencies, have justly incurred the displeasure of their bishop, and this censure to stick upon them, till either the synod or their own bishop shall give a more gentle sentence." This canon, we see, relates to the canon of the apostles, and affixes the judicature of priests and deacons to the bishops; commanding their censures to be held as firm and valid; only as the apostles' canon names presbyters and deacons particularly; so the Nicene canon speaks indefinitely, and so comprehends all of the diocess and jurisdiction.

The fourth council of Carthage gives, in express terms, the cognizance of clergy-causes to the bishop, calling aid from a synod in case a clergyman prove refractory and disobedient. "Discordantes clericos episcopus vel ratione vel potestate ad concordiam trahat, inobedientes synodus per audientiam damnet:" "If the bishop's reason will not end the controversies of clergymen, his power must;"[c] but if any man list to be contentious, intimating (as I suppose, out of the Nicene council) with frivolous appeals, and impertinent protraction, "the synod (of bishops) must condemn him," viz. for his disobeying his bishop's sentence. The council of Antioch is yet more particular in its sanction for this affair, intimating a clear distinction of proceeding in the cause of a bishop, and the other of the priests and deacons. Εἰ τὶς ἐπίσκοπος ὑπὸ συνόδου καθαιρεθεὶς, ἢ πρεσβύτερος, ἢ διάκονος ὑπὸ τοῦ ἰδίου ἐπισκόπου, &c. "If a bishop shall be deposed by a synod," (viz. of bishops, according to the exigence of the Nicene canon,[d]) "or a priest, or deacon by his own bishop, if he meddles with any sacred offices, he shall be hopeless of absolution." But here we see that the ordinary judge of a bishop is a synod of bishops; but of priests and deacons the bishop alone: and the sentence of the bishop is made firm "omni modo" in the next canon: "Si quis presbyter vel diaconus, proprio contempto episcopo, privatim congregationem effecerit, et altare erexerit, et episcopo accersenti non obedierit, nec velit ei parere, nec morem gerere primò et secundò vocanti, hic damnetur omni modo. Quòd si ecclesiam conturbare, et solicitare persistat tanquam seditiosus, per potestates exteras opprimatur:" "What presbyter soever refuses to obey his bishop, and will not appear at his first or second summons, let him be deposed, and if he shall persist to disturb the church, let him be given over to the secular powers." Add to this the first canon of the same council, Εἰ τὶς ὑπὸ τοῦ ἰδίου ἐπισκόπου ἀκοινώνητος γέγονεν, &c. "If any one be excommunicate by his own bishop," &c., as it is in the foregoing canons of Nice and the apostles. The result of these sanctions is this. The bishop is the judge; the bishop is to inflict censures; the presbyters and deacons are either to obey, or to be deposed: no greater evidence in the world of a superior jurisdiction, and this established by all the power they had; and this did extend, not only to the clergy, but to the laity; for that is the close of the canon, Ὁ αὐτὸς δὲ ὅρος ἐπὶ λαϊκῶν, καὶ πρεσβυτέρων, καὶ διακόνων, καὶ πάντων τῶν ἐν τῷ κανόνι· "This constitution is concerning the laity, and the presbyters, and the deacons, and all that are within the rule, viz. that if their bishop have sequestered them from the holy communion, they must not be suffered to communicate elsewhere."

But the "audientia episcopalis," "the bishops' audience-court," is of larger power in the council of Chalcedon: Εἰ τὶς κληρικὸς πρὸς κληρικὸν πράγμα ἔχοι, μὴ καταλιμπανέτω τὸν οἰκεῖον ἐπίσκοπον, καὶ ἐπὶ κοσμικὰ δικαστήρια κατατρεχέτω. "If any clergyman have any cause against a clergyman, let him by no means leave his own bishop, and run to secular courts:" ἀλλὰ πρότερον τὴν ὑπόθεσιν γυμναζέτω παρὰ τῷ ἰδίῳ ἐπισκόπῳ, ἢ γοῦν γνώμῃ αὐτοῦ τοῦ ἐπίσκοπου παρ' οἷς ἂν τὰ αμφότερα μέρη βούλεται, τὰ τῆς δίκης συγκροτείσθω. "But first let the cause be examined before their own bishop, or, by the bishop's leave, before such persons as the contesting parties shall desire." Εἰ δέ τὶς παρὰ ταῦτα ποιήσει, κανονικοῖς ὑποκείσθω ἐπιτιμίοις. "Whosoever does otherwise, let him suffer under the censures of the church."[e] Here is not only a subordination of the clergy in matters criminal, but also the civil causes of the clergy must be submitted to the bishop, under pain of the canon. I end this with the attestation of the council of Sardis, exactly of the same spirit, the same injunction, and almost the same words, with the former canons. Hosius, the president, said: "If any deacon, or priest, or of the inferior clergy, being excommunicated, shall go to another bishop," γινώσκοντα ἀποκεκινῆσθαι αὐτὸν τῆς κοινωνίας παρὰ τοῦ ἰδίου ἐπισκόπου, "knowing him to be excommunicated by his own bishop, that other bishop must by no means receive him into his communion."[f]

Thus far we have matter of public right and authority, declaring the bishop to be the ordinary judge of the causes and persons of clergymen, and have power of inflicting censures, both upon the clergy and the laity. And if there be any weight in the concurrent testimony of the apostolical canons, of the general councils of Nice, and of Chalcedon, of the councils of Antioch, of Sardis, of Carthage; then it is evident, that the bishop is the ordinary judge in all matters of spiritual cognizance, and hath power of censures, and, therefore, a superiority of jurisdiction.

This thing only by the way: in all these canons there is no mention made of any presbyters assistant with the bishop in his courts. For though I doubt not but the presbyters were in some churches, and in some times συνέδρευται and σύμβουλοι τῶν ἐπισκόπων, as St. Ignatius calls them, "counsellors and assessors with the bishop;" yet the power and the right of inflicting censures is only expressed to be in the bishop, and no concurrent jurisdiction mentioned in the presbytery: but of this hereafter more particularly.

Now, we may see these canons attested by practice and dogmatical resolution. St. Cyprian is the man whom I would choose, in all the world, to depose in this cause; because he, if any man, hath given all dues to the college of presbyters; and yet if he reserves the superiority of jurisdiction to the bishop, and that absolutely, and independently of conjunction with the presbytery, we are all well enough, and without suspicion. "Diù patientiam meam tenui, fratres carissimi," saith he, writing to the presbyters and deacons of his church.[g] He was angry with them for admitting the "lapsi" without his consent; and though he was as willing as any man to comply, both with the clergy and people of his diocess, yet he also must assert his own privileges and peculiar. "Quod enim non periculum metuere debemus de offensâ Domini, quando aliqui de presbyteris, nec evangelii nec loci sui memores, sed neque futurum Domini judicium, neque nunc præpositum sibi episcopum cogitantes, quod nunquam omnino sub antecessoribus factum est, cum contumeliâ et contemptu præpositi totum sibi vindicent." The matter was, that certain presbyters had reconciled them that fell in persecution, without the performance of penance, according to the severity of the canon; and this was done without the bishop's leave, by the presbyters, "forgetting their own place, and the gospel, and their bishop set over them, a thing that was never heard of till that time," "totum sibi vindicabant," "they that might do nothing without the bishop's leave, yet did this whole affair of their own heads." Well! Upon this St. Cyprian himself, by his own authority alone, suspends them till his return, and so shows that his authority was independent, theirs was not, and then promises "they shall have a fair hearing before him, in the presence of the confessors and all the people." "Utar eâ admonitione quâ me uti Dominus jubet, ut interim prohibeantur offerre, acturi et apud nos, et apud confessores ipsos, et apud plebem universam, causam suam." Here it is plain that St. Cyprian suspended these presbyters by his own authority, in absence from his church, and reserved the further hearing of the cause, till it should please God to restore him to his see.

But this fault of the presbyters, St. Cyprian, in the two next epistles, does still more exaggerate; saying, they ought to have asked the bishop's leave, "Sicut in præteritum semper sub antecessoribus factum est," for so was the catholic custom ever, that nothing should be done without the bishop's leave; but now, by doing otherwise, they did prevaricate the Divine commandment, and dishonour the bishop.[h] Yea, but the confessors interceded for the "lapsi," and they seldom were discountenanced in their requests. What should the presbyters do in this case? St. Cyprian tells them, writing to the confessors: "Petitiones itaque et desideria vestra episcopo servent:" "Let them keep your petitions for the bishop to consider of."[i] But they did not; therefore he suspended them, because they did not "reservare episcopo honorem sacerdotii sui et cathedræ:" "preserve the honour of the bishop's chair, and the episcopal authority," in presuming to reconcile the penitents without the bishop's leave.

The same St. Cyprian, in his epistle to Rogatianus, resolves this affair; for when a contemptuous bold deacon had abused his bishop, he complained to St. Cyprian, who was an archbishop, and indeed St. Cyprian tells him, he did honour him in the business that he would complain to him, "Cùm pro episcopatûs vigore, et cathedræ auctoritate haberes potestatem, quâ posses de illo statim vindicari:" "When as he had power episcopal and sufficient authority himself, to have punished the deacon for his petulancy."[k] The whole epistle is very pertinent to this question, and is clear evidence for the great authority of episcopal jurisdiction, the sum whereof is, in this encouragement, given to Rogatianus by St. Cyprian: "Fungaris circa eum potestate honoris tui, ut eum vel deponas vel abstineas;" "Exercise the power of your honour upon him, and either suspend him or depose him." And, therefore, he commends Cornelius, the bishop of Rome, for driving Felicissimus, the schismatic, from the church, "vigore pleno, quo episcopum agere oportet," "with full authority, as becomes a bishop."[l]

Socrates, telling of the promotion and qualities of St. John Chrysostom, says, "That in reforming the lives of the clergy, he was too fastuous and severe." "Mox igitur in ipso initio quum clericis asper videretur ecclesiæ, erat plurimis exosus, et veluti furiosum universi declinabant: "He was so rigid in animadversions against the clergy, that he was hated by them;"[m] which clearly shows that the bishop had jurisdiction and authority over them; for tyranny is the excess of power, and authority is the subject matter of rigour and austerity. But this power was intimated in that bold speech of his deacon, Serapio: "Nunquam poteris, ô episcope, hos corrigere, nisi uno baculo percusseris universos:" "Thou canst not amend the clergy, unless thou strikest them all with thy pastoral rod." St. John Chrysostom did not indeed do so; but "non multum post temporis plurimos clericorum pro diversis exemit causis," "he deprived and suspended most of the clergymen for divers causes;" and for this his severity he wanted no slanders against him; for the delinquent ministers set the people on work against him. But here we see that the power of censures was clearly and only in the bishop, for he was incited to have punished all his clergy, "universos;" and he did actually suspend most of them, "plurimos;" and I think it will not be believed the presbytery of his church should join with their bishop to suspend themselves. Add to this, that Theodoret also affirms that Chrysostom entreated the priests to live canonically, according to the sanctions of the church: "Quas quicunque prævaricari præsumerent, eos ad templum prohibebat accedere; "All them that transgressed the canons, he forbade them entrance into the church."[n]

Thus St. Jerome to Riparius: "Miror sanctum episcopum, in cujus parochiâ esse presbyter dicitur, acquiescere furori ejus, et non virgâ apostolicâ, virgâque ferreâ confringere vas inutile, et tradere in interitum carnis, ut spiritus salvus fiat:" "I wonder," saith he, "that the holy bishop is not moved at the fury of Vigilantius, and does not break him with his apostolical rod, that, by this temporary punishment, his soul might be saved in the day of the Lord."[o] Hitherto the bishop's pastoral staff is of fair power and coercion.

The council of Aquileia, convoked against the Arians, is full and mighty in asserting the bishop's power over the laity, and did actually exercise censures upon the clergy, where St. Ambrose was the man, that gave sentence against Palladius, the Arian. Palladius would have declined the judgment of the bishops, for he saw he should certainly be condemned, and would fain have been judged by some honourable personages of the laity. But St. Ambrose said "Sacerdotes de laicis judicare debent, non laici de sacerdotibus:" "Bishops must judge of the laity, not the laity of the bishops." That is for the "jus;" and for the "factum," it was the shutting up of the council; St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, gave sentence, "Pronuncio illum indignum sacerdotio, et cavendum, et in loco ejus catholicus ordinetur." The same also was the case of Marcellus.

bishop of Ancyra in Galatia, whom, for heresy, the bishops at Constantinople deposed, Eusebius giving sentence, and chose Basilius in his room.[p]

But their grandfather was served no better. Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, served him neither better nor worse. So Theodoret. "Alexander autem, apostolicorum dogmatum prædicator, prius quidem revocare eum admonitionibus et consiliis nitebatur. Cum vero eum superbire vidisset, et apertè impietatis facinora prædicare, ex ordine sacerdotali removit:" "The bishop first admonished the heretic; but when to his false doctrine he added pertinacy, he deprived him of the execution of his priestly function."[q]

This crime, indeed, deserved it highly. It was for a less matter that Triferius, the bishop, excommunicated Exuperantius, a presbyter, viz. for a personal misdemeanour; and yet this censure was ratified by the council of Taurinum, and his restitution was left "arbitrio episcopi," "to the good will and pleasure of the bishop," who had censured him. "Statuit quoque de Exuperantio presbytero sancta synodus, qui ad injuriam sancti episcopi sui Triferii gravia et multa congesserat, et frequentibus eum contumeliis provocaverat; propter quam causam ab eo fuerat Dominicâ communione privatus, ut in ejus sit arbitrio restitutio ipsius, in cujus potestate ejus fuit abjectio."[r] His restitution was, therefore, left in his power, because originally his censure was. The like was in the case of Palladius, a laic in the same council: "Qui à Triferio sacerdote fuerat mulctatus:" "Who was punished by Triferius the bishop;" "Hoc ei humanitate concilii reservato, ut ipse Triferius in potestate habeat, quando voluerit ei relaxare."

Here is the bishop censuring Palladius the laic, and excommunicating Exuperantius the priest, and this having been done by his own sole authority, was ratified by the council, and the absolution reserved to the bishop too, which indeed was an act of favour; for they having complained to the council, by the council might have been absolved; but they were pleased to reserve to the bishop his own power.

These are particular instances, and made public by acts conciliary intervening.

But it was the general canon and law of Holy Church.

Thus we have it expressed in the council of Agatho: "Contumaces vero clerici, prout dignitatis ordo promiserit, ab episcopis corrigantur:" "Refractory clerks must be punished by their bishops, according as the order of their dignity allows."[s] I end this particular with some canons, commanding clerks to submit to the judgment and censures of their bishop, under a canonical penalty; and so go on "ad alia."

In the second council of Carthage: "Alypius episcopus dixit, nec illud prætermittendum est, ut si quis fortè presbyter, ab episcopo suo correptus, aut excommunicatus, rumore vel superbiâ inflatus putaverit separatim Deo sacrificia offerenda, vel aliud erigendum altare contra ecclesiasticam fidem disciplinamque crediderit, non exeat impunitus."[t] And the same is repeated in the Greek code of the African canons: "If any presbyter, being excommunicated, or otherwise punished by his bishop, shall not desist, but contest with his bishop, let him by no means go unpunished."[u] The like is in the council of Chalcedon;[x] the words are the same that I before cited out of the canons of the council of Antioch, and of the apostles. But Carosus, the archimandrite, spake home in that action: Κάρωσος ὁ εὐλαβέστατος ἀρχιμανδρίτης εἶπε· Τὴν τῶν τριακοσίων δεκαοκτὼ τῶν ἐν Νικαίᾳ γενομένων πατέρων πίστιν, ἐν ᾗ καὶ ἐβαπτίσθην, οἶδα. Ἐπεὶ ἐγὼ ἄλλην πίστιν οὐκ οἶδα. Ἐπίσκοποί εἰσι, καὶ ἐξουσίαν ἔχουσι, καὶ ἀφορίσαι, καὶ καθαιρῆσαι. Καὶ εἴ τι θέλωσιν, ἐξουσίαν ἔχουσι. Πλείω ταύτης ἐγὼ ἄλλην οὐκ οἶδα. "The faith of the three hundred and eighteen fathers of the council of Nice, into which I was baptized, I know; other faith I know not. They are bishops; they have power to excommunicate and condemn, and they have power to do what they please: other faith than this I know none."[y] This is to purpose, and it was in one of the four great councils of christendom, which all ages since have received, with all veneration and devout estimate.

Another of them was that of Ephesus, convened against Nestorius, and this ratifies those acts of condemnation, which the bishops had passed upon delinquent clerks. Ὅσοι δὲ ἐπὶ ἀτόποις πράξεσι κατεκρίθησαν ὑπὸ τῆς ἁγίας συνόδου, ἢ ὑπὸ τῶν οἰκείων ἐπισκόπων, &c. "They who are, for their unworthy practices, condemned by the synod, or by their own bishops;"[z] although Nestorius did endeavour to restore them, yet their condemnation should still remain vigorous and confirmed. Upon which canon Balsamon makes this observation, which indeed, of itself, is clear enough in the canon. Ἐμαθες ὅτι μητροπολίται καὶ ἐπίσκοποι δύνανται κρίνειν τοὺς κληρικοὺς αὐτῶν, καὶ ἀφορισμῷ ἢ καὶ καθαιρέσει ἐστὶν ὅτε καθυποβάλλειν· "Hence you have learned that metropolitans and bishops can judge their clergy, and suspend them, and sometimes depose them." Nay, they are bound to it: "Pastoralis tamen necessitas habet (ne per plures serpant dira contagia) separare ab ovibus sanis morbidam:" "It is necessary that the bishop should separate the scabbed sheep from the sound, lest their infection scatter;" So St. Austin. And, therefore, the fourth council of Carthage commands,[a] "Ut episcopus accusatores fratrum excommunicet;" "That the bishop excommunicate the accuser of their brethren;"[b] (viz. such as bring clergy-causes and catholic doctrine to be punished in secular tribunals;) for excommunication is called, by the fathers, "mucro episcopalis," the "bishop's sword," to cut offenders off from the catholic communion. I add no more but that excellent saying of St.

Austin, which doth freely attest both the preceptive and vindictive power of the bishop over his whole diocess: "Ergo præcipiant tantummodò nobis quid facere debeamus, qui nobis præsunt, et faciamus orent pro nobis, non autem nos corripiant, et arguant, si non fecerimus. Imò omnia fiant, quoniam doctores ecclesiarum apostoli omnia faciebant, et præcipiebant quæ fierent, et corripiebant si non fierent," &c.[c] And again: "Corripiantur itaque à præpositis suis subditi correptionibus de caritate venientibus, pro culparum diversitate diversis, vel minoribus, vel amplioribus, quia et ipsa, quæ damnatio nominatur, quam facit episcopale judicium, quâ pœnâ in ecclesiâ nulla major est, potest, si Deus voluerit, in correptionem saluberrimam cedere, atque proficere."[d] Here the bishops have a power acknowledged in them, to command their diocess, and to punish the disobedient, and of excommunication by way of proper ministry, "damnatio quam facit episcopale judicium," "a condemnation of the bishop's infliction."

Thus it is evident, by the constant practice of primitive christendom, by the canons of three general councils, and divers other provincial, which are made catholic by adoption, and in inserting them into the code of the catholic church, that the bishop was judge of his clergy, and of the laypeople of his diocess; that he had power to inflict censures upon them, in case of delinquency; that his censures were firm and valid; and as yet, we find no presbyters joining either in commission or fact, in power or exercise; but excommunication and censures to be appropriated to bishops, and to be only despatched by them, either in full council, if it was a bishop's cause, or in his own consistory, if it was the cause of a priest, or the inferior clergy, or a laic, unless in cases of appeal, and then it was "in pleno concilio episcoporum," "in a synod of bishops;" and all this was confirmed by secular authority, as appears in the imperial constitutions.

For the making up this paragraph complete, I must insert two considerations.

First, concerning universality of causes within the bishop's cognizance. And, secondly, of persons.[e]

The ancient canons, asserting the bishop's power, "in cognitione causarum," speak in most large and comprehensive terms. Καὶ εἴ τι θέλωσιν, ἐξουσίαν ἔχουσι· "They have power to do what they list." Their power is as large as their will. So the council of Chalcedon, before cited. It was no larger, though, than St. Paul's expression: "For to this end also did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things."[f] A large extent of power, when the apostles expected a universal obedience. Ἐν πᾶσι. And so the style of the church runs in descension, ἄνευ τοῦ ἐπισκόπου μηδὲν πράττειν ὑμᾶς· so Ignatius; "Ye must do nothing without your bishop:" καὶ κατὰ μηδὲν αὐτῷ ἀντιλέγειν, "to contradict him in nothing."[g] The expression is frequent in him, καὶ μετὰ κρίσεως ἕκαστα διαλαμβάνειν, "to comprehend all things in his judgment or cognizance;" so the council of Antioch.[h]

But these universal expressions must be understood, "secundùm materiam subjectam;" so St. Ignatius expresses himself. Ye must without your bishop do nothing; nothing τῶν ἀνηκόντων εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, "of things pertaining to the church." So also the council of Antioch, τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, "the things of the church," are τοῦ ἐπισκόπου τοῦ πεπιστευμένου πάντα τὸν λαὸν, "committed to the bishop to whom all the people is intrusted." They are ecclesiastical persons, it is an ecclesiastical power they are endowed with, it is for a spiritual end, viz. the regiment of the church, and the good of souls, and, therefore, only those things which are in this order are of episcopal cognizance. And what are those things?

1. Then it is certain, that since Christ hath professed his kingdom is not of this world, that government which he hath constituted "de novo," does no way in the world, make any entrenchment upon the royalty.

> Hostis Herodes impie,
> Christum venire quid times?
> Non eripit mortalia,
> Qui regna dat cœlestia.

So the church used to sing. Whatsoever, therefore the secular tribunal did take cognizance of before it was christian, the same it takes notice of after it is christened. And these are all actions civil, all public violations of justice, all breach of municipal laws. These the church hath nothing to do with unless, by the favour of princes and commonwealths it be indulged to them "in honorem Dei et S. Matris ecclesiæ;" but then when it is once indulged, that act which does annul such pious vows, is just contrary to that religion which first gave them; and then unless there was sin in the donative, the ablation of it is "contra honorem Dei et S. Matris ecclesiæ." But this, it may be, is impertinent.

2. The "bishop's all" comes in after this; and he is judge of all those causes which christianity hath brought in upon a new stock, by its new distinctive principles. I say by its "new principles;" for there where it extends justice, and pursues the laws of nature, there the secular tribunal is also extended, if it be christian; the bishop gets nothing of that: but those things which christianity, as it prescinds from the interest of the republic, hath introduced, all them, and all the causes emergent from them, the bishop is judge of. Such are causes of faith, ministration of sacraments, and sacramentals, subordination of inferior clergy to their superior, censures, irregularities, orders hierarchical, rites and ceremonies, liturgies, and public forms of prayer, (as is famous in the ancient story of Ignatius teaching his church the first use of antiphonas and doxologies, and thence was derived to all churches of christendom,[i]) and all such things as are in immediate dependence of these, as dispensation of church-vessels, and ornaments, and goods, receiving and disposing the patrimony of the church, and whatsoever is of the same consideration, according to the forty-first canon of the apostles; "Præcipimus ut in potestate suâ episcopus ecclesiæ res habeat: "Let the bishop have the disposing the goods of the church;" adding this reason: "Si enim animæ hominum pretiosæ illi sint creditæ, multò magis eum oportet curam pecuniarum gerere:" "He that is intrusted with our precious souls, may, much more, be intrusted with the offertories of faithful people."

3. There are some things of a mixed nature, and something of the secular interest and something of the ecclesiastical concur to their constitution, and these are of double cognizance; the secular power and the ecclesiastical do both, in their several capacities, take knowledge of them. Such are the delinquencies of clergymen, who are both clergy and subjects too; "clerus Domini," and "regis subditi;" and for their delinquencies, which are "in materiâ justitiæ," the secular tribunal punishes, as being a violation of that right which the state must defend, but because done by a person who is a member of the sacred hierarchy, and hath also an obligation of special duty to his bishop, therefore the bishop also may punish him; and when the commonwealth hath inflicted a penalty, the bishop also may impose a censure, for every sin of a clergyman is two. But of this nature also are the convening of synods, the power whereof is in the king, and in the bishop severally, insomuch as both the church and the commonwealth in their several respects have peculiar interest; the commonwealth for preservation of peace and charity, in which religion hath the deepest interest; and the church, for the maintenance of faith. And therefore both prince and bishop have indicted synods in several ages, upon the exigence of several occasions, and have several powers for the engagement of clerical obedience, and attendance upon such solemnities.

4. Because christianity is after the commonwealth, and is a capacity superadded to it, therefore those things which are of mixed cognizance, are chiefly in the king; the supremacy here is his, and so it is in all things of this nature, which are called ecclesiastical; because they are "in materiâ ecclesiæ, ad finem religionis:" but they are of a different nature and use from things spiritual, because they are not issues of those things which christianity hath introduced "de integro," and are separate from the interest of the commonwealth in its particular capacity, for such things only are properly spiritual.

5. The bishop's jurisdiction hath a compulsory derived from Christ only, viz. infliction of censures by excommunications, or other "minores plagæ," which are in order to it. But yet this internal compulsory, through the duty of good princes to God, and their favour to the church, is assisted by the secular arm, either superadding a temporal penalty in case of contumacy, or some other way abetting the censures of the church, and it ever was so since commonwealths were christian. So that ever since then episcopal jurisdiction hath a double part; an external, and an internal; this is derived from Christ, that from the king; which because it is concurrent in all acts of jurisdiction, therefore it is that the king is supreme of the jurisdiction, viz. that part of it which is the external compulsory.

And for this cause we shall sometimes see the emperor, or his prefect, or any man of consular dignity, sit judge when the question is of faith; not that the prefect was to judge of that, or that the bishops were not; but in case of the pervicacy of a peevish heretic, who would not submit to the power of the church, but flew to the secular power for assistance, hoping, by taking sanctuary there, to engage the favour of the prince. In this case the bishops also appealed thither, not for resolution, but assistance and sustentation of the church's power. It was so in the case of Ætius the Arian, and Honoratus the prefect, Constantius being emperor.[k] For all that the prefect did, or the emperor in this case, was by the prevalency of his intervening authority to reconcile the disagreeing parties, and to encourage the catholics; but the precise act of judicature, even in this case, was in the bishops; for they deposed Ætius for his heresy, for all his confident appeal; and Macedonius, Eleusius, Basilius, Ortasius, and Dracontius, for personal delinquencies. And all this is but to reconcile this act to the resolution and assertion of St. Ambrose, who refused to be tried in a cause of faith by lay judges, though delegates of the emperor. "Quando audisti, clementissime imperator, in causâ fidei laicos de episcopo judicâsse? "When was it ever known that laymen, in a cause of faith, did judge a bishop?"[l] To be sure, it was not in the case of Honoratus the prefect; for if they had appealed to him, or to his master Constantius, for judgment of the article, and not for encouragement and secular assistance, St. Ambrose in his confident question of "Quando audisti?" had quickly been answered, even with saying, "Presently after the council of Ariminum, in the case of Ætius and Honoratus." Nay, it was one of the causes why St. Ambrose deposed Palladius in the council of Aquileia, because he refused to answer, except it were before some honourable personages of the laity. And it is observable that the Arians were the first (and indeed they offered at it often) that did desire princes to judge matters of faith; for they, despairing of their cause in a conciliary trial, hoped to engage the emperor on their party, by making him umpire. But the catholic bishops made humble and fair remonstrance of the distinction of powers and jurisdictions; and as they might not intrench upon the royalty, so neither betray that right, which Christ concredited to them, to the encroachment of an exterior jurisdiction and power. It is a good story that Suidas tells of Leontius,[m] bishop of Tripolis, in Lydia, a man so famous and exemplary, that he was called ὁ κάνων τῆς ἐκκλησίας, "the rule of the church,"—that when Constantius the emperor did preside amongst the bishops, and undertook to determine causes of mere spiritual cognizance, instead of a "placet," he gave this answer, "Θαυμάζω (ἔφη) ὅπως ἕτερα διέπειν ταχθεὶς, ἑτέροις ἐπιχειρεῖς· στρατιωτικῶν μὲν καὶ πολιτικῶν πραγμάτων προεστηκὼς, ἐπισκόποις δὲ περὶ τῶν εἰς μόνους ἐπισκόπους ἡκόντων διαταττόμενος." Τὸν δὲ βασιλέα καταιδεσθέντα παύσασθαι τῆς ἐν τοῖς τοιούτοις ἤδη διακελεύσεως. "I wonder that thou, being set over things of a different nature, meddlest with those things that only appertain to bishops: the militia and the politia are thine, but matters of faith and spirit are of episcopal cognizance." Τοιοῦτος ἦν ὁ Λεόντιος ἐλευθέριος· "Such was the freedom of the ingenuous Leontius." Answerable to which was that christian and fair acknowledgment of Valentinian, when the Arian bishops of Bithynia and the Hellespont sent Hypatianus, their legate, to desire him, "Ut dignaretur ad emendationem dogmatis interesse," "That he would be pleased to mend the article." "Respondens Valentinianus, ait, 'Mihi quidem, quum unus de populo sim, fas non est talia perscrutari: verùm sacerdotes apud seipsos congregentur ubi voluerint.' Cùmque hæc respondisset princeps, in Lampsacum convenerunt episcopi." So Sozomen reports the story.[n] The emperor would not meddle with matters of faith, but referred the deliberation and decision of them to the bishops, to whom by God's law they did appertain; upon which intimation given, the bishops convened in Lampsacum. And thus a double power met in the bishops. A divine right to decide the article. "Mihi fas non est," saith the emperor; "It is not lawful for me to meddle." And then a right from the emperor to assemble, for he gave them leave to call a council. These are two distinct powers, one from Christ, the other from the prince.

And now, upon this occasion, I have fair opportunity to insert a consideration. The bishops have power over all causes emergent in their diocesses; all I mean in the sense above explicated; they have power to inflict censures; excommunication is the highest, the rest are parts of it, and in order to it. Whether or no must church-censures be used in all such causes as they take cognizance of, or may not the secular power find out some external compulsory instead of it, and forbid the church to use excommunication in certain cases?

1. To this I answer, that if they be such cases in which by the law of Christ they may, or such in which they must use excommunication, then in these cases no power can forbid them. For what power Christ hath given them, no man can take away.

2. As no human power can disrobe the church of the power of excommunication, so no human power can invest the church with a lay-compulsory. For if the church be not capable of a "jus gladii," as most certainly she is not, the church cannot receive power to put men to death, or to inflict lesser pains in order to it, or any thing above a salutary penance, I mean in the formality of a church-tribunal, then they give the church what she must not, cannot take. I deny not but clergymen are as capable of the power of life and death as any men; but not in the formality of clergymen. A court of life and death cannot be an ecclesiastical tribunal; and then if any man, or company of men, should persuade the church not to inflict her censures upon delinquents, in some cases in which she might lawfully inflict them, and pretend to give her another compulsory; they take away the church-consistory, and erect a very secular court, dependent on themselves, and by consequence to be appealed to from themselves, and so also to be prohibited as the lay-superior shall see cause for. Whoever, therefore, should be consenting to any such permutation of power, is "Traditor potestatis quam S. Mater ecclesia a Sponso suo acceperat;" "He betrays the individual and inseparable right of Holy Church." For her censure she may inflict upon her delinquent children without asking leave. Christ is her αὐθεντία for that, he is her "warrant and security." The other is begged or borrowed, none of her own, nor of a fit edge to be used in her abscissions and coercions. I end this consideration with that memorable canon of the apostles, of so frequent use in this question. Πάντων τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν πραγμάτων ὁ ἐπίσκοπος ἐχέτω τὴν φροντίδα· "Let the bishop have the care of provision for all affairs of the church, and let him dispense them "velut Deo contemplante," "as in the sight of God," to whom he must be responsive for all his diocess.[o]

The next consideration concerning the bishop's jurisdiction, is of what persons he is judge? and because our scene lies here in church-practice, I shall only set down the doctrine of the primitive church in this affair, and leave it under that representation.

Presbyters, and deacons, and inferior clerks, and the laity, are already involved in the precedent canons; no man there was exempted, of whose soul any bishop had charge. And all Christ's sheep hear his voice, and the call of his shepherd-ministers. Theodoret tells a story, that when the bishops of the province were assembled by the command of Valentinian, the emperor, for the choice of a successor to Auxentius, in the see of Milan,—the emperor wished them to be careful in the choice of a bishop in these words: Τοιοῦτον δὲ οὖν καὶ νῦν τοῖς ἀρχιερατικοῖς ἐγκαθιδρύσατε θώκοις, ὅπως καὶ ἡμεῖς οἱ τὴν βασιλείαν ἰθύνοντες εἰλικρινῶς αὐτῷ τὰς ἡμετέρας ὑποκλίνωμεν κεφαλάς· "Set such an one in the archiepiscopal throne, that we, who rule the kingdom, may sincerely submit our head unto him,"[p] viz. in matters of spiritual import. And since all power is derived from Christ, who is a King, and a Priest, and a Prophet, christian kings are "Christi domini," and vicars in his regal power, but bishops in his sacerdotal and prophetical. So that the king hath a supreme regal power in causes of the church, ever since his kingdom became christian, and it consists in all things, in which the priestly office is not precisely by God's law, employed for regiment, and cure of souls, and in these, also, all the external compulsory and jurisdiction is his own. For when his subjects became christian subjects, himself also, upon the same terms, becomes a christian ruler, and in both capacities he is to rule, viz. both as subjects and as christian subjects, except only in the precise issues of sacerdotal authority. And, therefore, the kingdom and the priesthood are excelled by each other in their several capacities. For superiority is usually expressed in three words, ὑπεροχὴ, ἀρχὴ, and ἐξουσία, "excellency, impery, and power." The king is supreme to the bishop in impery; the bishop hath an excellency, viz. of spiritual ministration, which Christ hath not concredited to the king; but in power, both king and bishop have it distinctly in several capacities; the king "in potentiâ gladii," the bishop "in potestate clavium." The sword and the keys are the emblems of their distinct power. Something like this is in the third epistle of St. Clement, translated by Ruffinus: "Quid enim in præsenti sæculo prophetâ gloriosius, pontifice clarius, rege sublimius?" "king, and priest, and prophet, are, in their several excellencies, the highest powers under Heaven." In this sense, it is easy to understand those expressions often used in antiquity, which might seem to make entrenchment upon the sacredness of royal prerogatives; were not both the piety and sense of the church sufficiently clear in the issues of her humblest obedience. And this is the sense of St. Ignatius, that holy martyr and disciple of the apostles: "Diaconi, et reliquus clerus, unà cum populo universo, militibus, principibus, et Cæsare, ipsi episcopo pareant:" "Let the deacons, and all the clergy, and all the people, the soldiers, the princes, and Cæsar himself, obey the bishop."[q] This is it which St. Ambrose said: "Sublimitas episcopalis nullis poterit comparationibus adæquari. Si regum fulgori compares, et principum diademati, erit inferius," &c.[r] This also was acknowledged by the great Constantine, that most blessed prince: "Deus vos constituit sacerdotes, et potestatem vobis dedit, de nobis quoque judicandi, et ideo nos à vobis rectè judicamur. Vos autem non potestis ab hominibus judicari," viz. "sæcularibus," and "in causis simplicis religionis." So that good emperor, in his oration to the Nicene fathers.

[n] Tripart. Hist. lib. vii. cap. 12.

[o] Can. 39.

[p] Theodoret. lib. iv. c. 5.

It was a famous contestation that St. Ambrose had with Auxentius, the Arian, pretending the emperor's command to him, to deliver up some certain churches in his diocess to the Arians. His answer was, that palaces belonged to the emperor, but churches to the bishop;[s] and so they did by all the laws of christendom. The like was in the case of St. Athanasius and Constantius the emperor, exactly the same "per omnia," as it is related by Ruffinus.[t] St. Ambrose, sending his deacon to the emperor, to desire him to go forth of the cancelli, in his church at Milan,—shows that then the powers were so distinct, that they made no entrenchment upon each other. It was no greater power, but a more considerable act, and higher exercise, the forbidding the communion to Theodosius, till he had, by repentance, washed out the blood that stuck upon him ever since the massacre at Thessalonica.[u] It was a wonderful concurrence of piety in the emperor, and resolution and authority in the bishop. But he was not the first that did it; for Philip, the emperor, was also guided by the pastoral rod, and the severity of the bishop. "De hoc traditum est nobis, quòd Christianus fuerit, et in die paschæ, i. e. in ipsis vigiliis, cùm interesse voluerit, et communicare mysteriis, ab episcopo loci non priùs esse permissum, nisi confiteretur peccata, et inter pœnitentes staret, nec ullo modo sibi copiam mysteriorum futuram nisi, priùs per pœnitentiam culpas, quæ de eo ferebantur plurimæ, deluisset:" "The bishop of the place would not let him communicate, till he had washed away his sins by repentance." And the emperor did so. "Ferunt igitur libenter eum quod a sacerdote imperatum fuerat, suscepisse:" "He did it willingly, undertaking the impositions laid upon him by the bishop."[x]

I doubt not but all the world believes the dispensation of the sacraments entirely to belong to ecclesiastical ministry.

It was St. Chrysostom's command to his presbyters, to reject all wicked persons from the holy communion. "If he be a captain, a consul, or a crowned king, that cometh unworthily, forbid him, and keep him off; thy power is greater than his. If thou darest not remove him, tell it me, I will not suffer it," &c.[y] And had there never been more error in the managing church-censures than in the foregoing instances, the church might have exercised censures, and all the parts of power that Christ gave her, without either scandal or danger to herself or her penitents. But when in the very censure of excommunication, there is a new ingredient put, a great proportion of secular inconveniences and human interest, when excommunications, as in the apostle's times they were deliverings over to Satan, so now shall be deliverings over to a foreign enemy or the people's rage; as then to be buffeted, so now to be deposed, or disinterested in the allegiance of subjects; in these cases, excommunication being nothing like that which Christ authorized, and no way co-operating toward the end of its institution, but to an end of private designs and rebellious interest, bishops have no power of such censures, nor is it lawful to inflict them, things remaining in that consistence and capacity. And thus is that famous saying to be understood, reported by St. Thomas to be St. Austin's, but is indeed found in the ordinary gloss upon Matt. xiii. "Princeps et multitudo non est excommunicanda:" "A prince or a commonwealth are not to be excommunicate."[z]

Thus I have given a short account of the persons and causes, of which bishops, according to catholic practice, did and might take cognizance. This use only I make of it. Although Christ hath given great authority to his church, in order to the regiment of souls, such a power, "quæ nullis poterit comparationibus adæquari," yet it hath its limits, and a proper cognizance, viz. things spiritual, and the emergencies, and consequents from those things which christianity hath introduced "de novo," and superadded, as things totally disparate from the precise interest of the commonwealth; and this I the rather noted, to show how those men would mend themselves that cry down the tyranny, as they list to call it, of episcopacy, and yet call for the presbytery. "For the presbytery does challenge cognizance of all causes whatsoever, which are either sins directly or by reduction: all crimes which, by the law of God, deserve death."[z] There they bring in murders, treasons, witchcrafts, felonies. Then the minor faults they bring in under the title of "scandalous and offensive." Nay, "quodvis peccatum," saith Snecanus, to which if we add this consideration, that they believe "every action of any man to have in it the malignity of a damnable sin," there is nothing in the world, good or bad, vicious or suspicious, scandalous or criminal, true or imaginary, real actions or personal; in all which, and in all contestations and complaints, one party is delinquent, either by false accusation or real injury: but they comprehend in their vast gripe, and then they have power to nullify, all courts and judicatories, besides their own; and being, for this their cognizance they pretend Divine institution, there shall be no causes imperfect in their consistory, no appeal from them, but they shall hear and determine with final resolution, and it will be sin, and therefore punishable, to complain of injustice and illegality. If this be confronted but with the pretences of episcopacy, and the modesty of their several demands, and the reasonableness and divinity of each vindication examined, I suppose were there nothing but prudential motives to be put into the balance, to weigh down this question, the cause would soon be determined; and the little finger of presbytery, not only in its exemplary and tried practices, but in its dogmatical pretensions, is heavier than the loins, nay, than the whole body of episcopacy; but it seldom happens otherwise, but that they who usurp a power prove tyrants in the execution, whereas the issues of a lawful power are fair and moderate.

SECTION XXXVII.

Forbidding Presbyters to officiate without Episcopal License.

But I must proceed to the more particular instances of episcopal jurisdiction. The whole power of ministration, both of the word and sacraments, was in the bishop by prime authority, and in the presbyters by commission and delegation, insomuch that they might not exercise any ordinary ministration without license from the bishop. They had power and capacity by their order to preach, to minister, to offer, to reconcile, and to baptize. They were, indeed, acts of order, but that they might not, by the law of the church, exercise any of these acts without license from the bishop, that is an act or issue of jurisdiction, and shows the superiority of the bishop over his presbyters, by the practice of christendom.

St. Ignatius hath done very good offices in all the parts of this question, and here also he brings in succour. Οὐκ ἔξόν ἐστὶ χωρὶς τοῦ ἐπισκόπου οὔτε βαπτίζειν, οὔτε προσφέρειν, οὔτε θυσίαν προσκομίζειν, οὔτε δοχὴν ἐπιτελεῖν· "It is not lawful without the bishop," viz. without his leave, "either to baptize, or to offer sacrifice, or to make oblation, or to keep feasts of charity:"[a] and a little before, speaking of the blessed eucharist, and its ministration, and having premised a general interdict for doing any thing without the bishop's consent, Ἐκείνη δὲ βεβαία εὐχαριστία ἡγείσθω, ἡ ὑπὸ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον οὖσα, ἢ ᾧ ἄν αὐτὸς ἐπιτρέψῃ· "But let that eucharist," saith he, "be held valid, which is celebrated under the bishop, or under him to whom the bishop shall permit."

I do not here dispute the matter of right, and whether or no the presbyters might "de jure" do any offices without episcopal license, but whether or no "de facto," it was permitted them in the primitive church? This is sufficient to show to what issue the reduction of episcopacy to a primitive consistence will drive; and if I mistake not, it is at least a very probable determination of the question of right too. For who will imagine that bishops should at the first, in the calenture of their infant devotion, in the new spring of christianity, in the times of persecution, in all the public disadvantages of state and fortune, when they anchored only upon the shore of a holy conscience, that then they should have thoughts ambitious, encroaching, of usurpation and advantages, of purpose to divest their brethren of an authority intrusted them by Christ; and then, too, when all the advantage of their honour did only set them upon a hill, to feel a stronger blast of persecution, and was not, as since it hath been, attested with secular assistance and fair arguments of honour, but was only in a mere spiritual estimate, and ten thousand real disadvantages. This will not be supposed either of wise or holy men. But however, "valeat quantum valere potest." The question is now of matter of fact; and if the church of martyrs, and the church of saints, and doctors, and confessors, now regnant in heaven, be fair precedents for practices of christianity, we build upon a rock, though we had digged no deeper than this foundation of catholic practice.

Upon the hopes of these advantages, I proceed. Εἴ τις πρεσβύτερος καταφρονήσας τοῦ ἰδίου ἐπισκόπου χωρὶς συναγωγὴν καὶ θυσιαστήριον πήξει, καθαιρείσθω· "If any presbyter, disrespecting his own bishop, shall make conventions apart, or erect an altar," (viz. without the bishop's license,) "let him be deposed;"[b] clearly intimating that "potestas faciendi concionem," "the power of making of church-meetings, and assemblies," for preaching or other offices, is derived from the bishop; and therefore the canon adds, καθαιρείσθω ὡς φίλαρχος· Τύραννος γάρ ἐστι· "He is a lover of rule, he is a tyrant;" that is, a usurper of that power and government which belongs to the bishop. The same thing is also decreed in the council of Antioch, and in the council of Chalcedon: Πάντες οἱ εὐλαβέστατοι ἐπίσκοποι ἐβόησαν, οὗτος δίκαιος κάνων, οὗτος ὁ κάνων τῶν ἁγίων πατέρων· "All the most reverend bishops cried out, This is a righteous law, this is the canon of the holy fathers."[c] "This," viz. the canon apostolical, now cited. Tertullian is something more particular, and instances in baptism: "Dandi baptismum jus habet summus sacerdos, qui est episcopus. Dehinc presbyteri et diaconi, non tamen sine episcopi auctoritate, propter honorem ecclesiæ quo salvo salva pax est; alioquin etiam laicis jus est."[d] The place is of great consideration, and carries in it its own objection and its answer. "The bishop hath the right of giving baptism. Then after him, presbyters and deacons, but not without the authority of the bishop;" (so far the testimony is clear;) "and this is for the honour of the church." But does not this intimate it was only by positive constitution, and neither by Divine nor apostolical ordinance? No, indeed, it does not. For it might be so ordained by Christ or his apostles, "propter honorem ecclesiæ;" and no harm done. For it is honourable for the church, that her ministrations should be most ordinate; and so they are when they descend from the superior to the subordinate. But the next words do of themselves make answer, "otherwise laymen have right to baptize;" that is "without the consent of the bishop, laymen can do it as much as presbyters and deacons." For, indeed, baptism conferred by laymen is valid, and not to be repeated; but yet they ought not to administer it, so neither ought presbyters without the bishop's license; so says Tertullian; let him answer it. Only the difference is this, laymen cannot "jure ordinario" receive a leave or commission, to make it lawful in them to baptize any; presbyters and deacons may; for their order is a capacity of possibility. But besides the sacrament of baptism, Tertullian affirms the same of the venerable eucharist: "Eucharistiæ sacramentum non de aliorum manu quàm præsidentium sumimus."[e] The former place will expound this, if there be any scruple in "præsidentium;" for clearly the christians receive the sacrament of the eucharist from none but bishops. I suppose he means "without episcopal license." Whatsoever his meaning is, these are his words.

The council of Gangra, forbidding conventicles, expresses it with this intimation of episcopal authority: "If any man shall make assemblies privately, and out of the church, so despising the church, or shall do any church offices," μὴ συνίοντος τοῦ πρεσβυτέρου κατὰ γνώμην ἐπισκόπου, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω· "without the presence of a priest, by the decree of a bishop, let him be anathema."[f] The priest is not to be assistant at any meeting for private offices, without the bishop's license. If they will celebrate synaxes privately, it must be by a priest; and he must be there by leave of the bishop; and then the assembly is lawful. And this thing was so known, that the fathers of the second council of Carthage call it ignorance or hypocrisy in priests, to do their offices without a license from the bishop. "Numidius episcopus Massilytanus dixit, In quibusdam locis sunt presbyteri qui, aut ignorantes simpliciter, aut dissimulantes audacter, præsente et inconsulto episcopo, complurimis in domiciliis agunt agenda, quod disciplinæ incongruum cognoscit esse sanctitas vestra:" "In some places there are priests that in private houses do offices," (houseling of people is the office meant, communicating them at home,) "without the consent or leave of the bishop, being either simply ignorant or boldly dissembling;"[g] implying that they could not else but know their duties to be, to procure episcopal license for their ministrations. "Ab universis episcopis dictum est, Quisquis presbyter inconsulto episcopo agenda in quolibet loco voluerit celebrare, ipse honori suo contrarius existit: "All the bishops said, If any priest, without leave of his bishop, shall celebrate the mysteries, be the place what it will be, he is an enemy to the bishop's dignity."

After this in time, but before in authority, is the great council of Chalcedon: Οἱ κληρικοὶ ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν ἑκάστῃ πόλει ἐπισκόπων τὴν ἐξουσίαν, κατὰ τὴν τῶν ἁγίων πατέρων παράδοσιν, διαμενέτωσαν· "Let the clergy, according to the tradition of the fathers, remain under the power of the bishops of the city."[h] So that they are, for their offices, in dependence of the authority of the bishop. The canon instances particularly to priests officiating in monasteries and hospitals, but extends itself to an indefinite expression, καὶ μὴ καταυθαδιάρεσθαι, ἢ ἀφηνιᾶν τοῦ ἰδίου ἐπισκόπου· "They must not dissent or differ from their bishop;" οἱ δὲ τολμῶντες ἀνατρέπειν τὴν τοιαύτην διατύπωσιν καθ' οἱονδήποτε τρόπον, &c. "All they that transgress this constitution, in any way, not submitting to their bishop, let them be punished canonically." So that now these general expressions of obedience and subordination to the bishop, being to be understood according to the exigence of the matter, to wit, the ministries of the clergy in their several offices,—the canon extends its prohibition to all ministrations, without the bishop's authority.

But it was more clearly and evidently law and practice in the Roman church; we have good witness for it; St. Leo, the bishop of that church, is my author: "Sed neque coram episcopo licet presbyteris in baptisterium introire, nec præsente antistite infantem tingere, aut signare, nec pœnitentem sine præceptione episcopi sui reconciliare, nec eo præsente, nisi illo jubente, sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Christi conficere, nec eo coràm posito populum docere, vel benedicere," &c. "It is not lawful for the presbyters to enter into the baptistery, nor to baptize any catechumens, nor to consecrate the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, in the presence of the bishop, without his command."[i] From this place of St. Leo, if it be set in conjunction with the precedent, we have fair evidence of this whole particular. It is not lawful to do any offices without the bishop's leave; so St. Ignatius; so the canons of the apostles; so Tertullian; so the councils of Antioch and Chalcedon. It is not lawful to do any offices in the bishop's presence without leave; so St. Leo. The council of Carthage joins them both together, "neither in his presence, nor without his leave in any place."

Now, against this practice of the church, if any man should discourse as St. Jerome is pretended to do by Gratian, "Qui non vult presbyteros facere quæ jubentur à Deo, dicat quis major est Christo:" "He that will not let presbyters do what they are commanded to do by God, let him tell us if any man be greater than Christ;"[k] viz. whose command it is that presbyters should preach. Why then did the church require the bishop's leave? Might not presbyters do their duty without a license? This is it which the practice of the church is abundantly sufficient to answer. For to the bishop is committed the care of the whole diocess; he it is that must give the highest account for the whole charge; he it is who is appointed, by peculiar designation, to feed the flock; so the canon of the apostles;[l] so Ignatius;[m] so the council of Antioch;[n] so every where, the presbyters are admitted "in partem solicitudinis;" but still the jurisdiction of the whole diocess is in the bishop; and without the bishop's admission to a part of it "per traditionem subditorum," although the presbyter by his ordination have a capacity of preaching and administering sacraments, yet he cannot exercise this without designation of a particular charge, either temporary or fixed. And, therefore, it is that a presbyter may not do these acts without the bishop's leave, because they are actions of relation, and suppose a congregation to whom they must be administered, or some particular person; for a priest must not preach to the stones, as some say venerable Bede did; nor communicate alone: the word is destructive of the thing; nor baptize, unless he have a chrysome child, or a catechumen. So that all of the diocess being the bishop's charge, the bishop must either authorize the priest, or the priest must not meddle, lest he be (what St. Peter blamed) ἀλλοτριεπίσκοπος, "a bishop in another's diocess:" not that the bishop did license the acts precisely of baptizing, of consecrating, &c.; for these he had by his ordination: but that in giving license, he did give him a subject to whom he might apply these relative actions, and did "quoad hoc" take him "in partem solicitudinis," and concredit some part of his diocess to his administration "cum curâ animarum."

But then on the other side, because the whole cure of the diocess is in the bishop, he cannot exonerate himself of it, for it is a burden of Christ's imposing, or it is not imposed at all; therefore, this taking of presbyters into part of the regiment and care does not divest him of his own power, or any part of it, nor yet ease him of his care; but that as he must still ἐπισκοπεῖν, "visit" and "see to his diocess," so he hath authority still in all parts of his diocess; and this appears in these places now quoted; insomuch as when the bishop came to any place, there the "vicaria" of the presbyters did cease: "In præsentiâ majoris cessat potestas minoris." And though, because the bishop could not do all the minor and daily offices of the priesthood, in every congregation of his diocess, therefore he appointed priests, severally to officiate, himself looking to the metropolis, and the daughter-churches, by a general supravision; yet when the bishop came into any place of his diocess, there he, being present, might do any office, because it was in his own charge; which he might concredit to another, but not exonerate himself of it; and, therefore, "præsente episcopo," (say the council of Carthage and St. Leo,) "if the bishop be present," the presbyter, without leave, might not officiate; for he had no subjects of his own, but by trust and delegation; and this delegation was given him to supply the bishop's absence, who could not "simul omnibus interesse;" but then, where he was present, the cause of delegation ceasing, the jurisdiction also ceased, or was at least absorbed in the greater, and so, without leave, might not be exercised; like the stars, which in the noon-day have their own natural light, as much as in the night, but appear not, shine not, in the presence of the sun.

This, perhaps, will seem uncouth in those presbyters, who, (as the council of Carthage's expression is,) are "contrarii honori episcopali;" but yet, if we keep ourselves in our own form, where God hath placed us, and where we were in the primitive church, we shall find all this to be sooth, and full of order. For consider: the elder the prohibition was, the more absolute and indefinite it runs: "Without the bishop it is not lawful to baptize, to consecrate," &c. So Ignatius. The prohibition is without limit: but in descent of the church it runs, "præsente episcopo," "the bishop being present," they must not without leave. The thing is all one, and a derivation from the same original, to wit, the "universality of the bishop's jurisdiction;" but the reason of the difference of expression is this; at first presbyters were in cities with the bishop, and no parishes at all concredited to them. The bishops lived in cities; the presbyters preached, and offered κατ' οἶκον, "from house to house," according as the bishop directed them. Here they had no ordinary charge, and, therefore, the first prohibitions run indefinitely; they must not do any clerical offices "sine episcopo," "unless the bishop sends them." But then afterwards, when the parishes were distinct, and the presbyters fixed upon ordinary charges, then it was only "præsente episcopo," "if the bishop was present," they might not officiate without leave. For, in his absence, they might do it, I do not say without leave, but I say they had leave given them, when the bishop sent them to officiate in a village with ordinary or temporary residence, as it is to this day; when the bishop institutes to a particular charge, he also gives power "hoc ipso," of officiating in that place. So that at first, when they did officiate in places by temporary missions, then they were to have leave, but this license was also temporary; but when they were fixed upon ordinary charges, they might not officiate without leave, but then they had an ordinary leave given them, "in traditione subditorum," and that was done "in subsidium muneris episcopalis," because it was that part of the bishop's charge which he could not personally attend, for execution of the minor offices, and, therefore, concredited it to a presbyter; but if he was present, a new leave was necessary; because as the power always was in the bishop, so now the execution also did return to him when he was there in person; himself, if he listed, might officiate.

All this is excellently attested in the example of St. Austin, of whom Possidonius, in his life, reports, that being but a presbyter, Valerius, the bishop, being a Greek born, and not well spoken in the Latin tongue, and so unfit for public orations: "Eidem presbytero," (viz. to Austin,) "potestatem dedit coram se in ecclesiâ evangelium prædicandi ac frequentissimè tractandi, contra usum quidem, et consuetudinem Africanarum ecclesiarum:" "He gave leave to Austin, then but presbyter, to preach in the church, even while himself was present; indeed against the use and custom of the African churches." And for this act of his he suffered soundly in his report, for the case was thus: in all Africa, ever since the first spring of the Arian heresy, the church had then suffered so much by the preaching of Arius, the presbyter, that they made a law not to suffer any presbyter to preach at all, at least in the mother church, and in the bishop's presence: Τοῦτο ἀρχὴν ἔλαβεν ἐφ' οὗ Ἄρειος τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἐτάραξε, saith Socrates; "Thence came this custom in the African churches." [o] But because Valerius saw St. Austin so able, and himself, for want of Latin, so unfit,—he gave leave to Austin to preach before him, against the custom of the African churches; but he adds this reason for his excuse too; it was not, indeed, the custom of Africa, but it was of the Oriental churches. For so Possidonius proceeds: "Sed et ille vir venerabilis, ac providus in Orientalibus ecclesiis id ex more fieri sciens;" in the Levant it was usual for bishops to give presbyters leave to preach; "Dummodo factitaretur à presbytero quod à se episcopo impleri minime posse cernebat," which determines us fully in the business. For this leave to do offices was but there to be given "where the bishop himself could not fulfil the offices;" which shows the presbyters, in their several charges, whether of temporary mission, or fixed residence, to be but delegates and vicars of the bishop, admitted "in partem solicitudinis;" to assist the bishop in his great charge of the whole diocess.

Against this it is objected, out of St. Jerome, and it is recorded by Gratian, "Ecce ego dico præsentibus episcopis suis, atque adstantibus in altari, presbyteros posse sacramenta conficere;" "Behold, I say that presbyters may minister sacraments in presence of the bishop:" so Gratian quotes it, indeed; [p] but St. Jerome says the express contrary, unless we all have false copies. For in St. Jerome it is not "ecce ego dico," but "nec ego dico." He does not say it is lawful for presbyters to officiate in the presence of their bishop. Indeed St. Jerome is angry at Rusticus, bishop of Narbona, because he would not give leave to presbyters to preach, nor to bless, &c. This, perhaps it was not well done, but this makes not against the former discourse; for though it may be fit for the bishop to give leave, the church requiring it still more and more in descent of ages, and multiplication of christians and parishes,—yet it is clear that this is not to be done without the bishop's leave; for it is for this very thing that St. Jerome disputes against Rusticus, to show he did amiss, because he would not give his presbyters license. And this he also reprehends in his epistle, "ad Nepotianum:" "Pessimæ consuetudinis est in quibusdam ecclesiis tacere presbyteros, et præsentibus episcopis non loqui:" "That presbyters might not be suffered to preach in presence of the bishop, that was an ill custom;" to wit, as things then stood; and it was mended presently after, for presbyters did preach in the bishop's presence, but it was by license from their ordinary. For so Possidonius relates, that upon this act of Valerius, before mentioned, "Postea currente et volante hujusmodi famâ, bono præcedente exemplo, acceptâ ab episcopis potestate, presbyteri nonnulli, coram episcopis, populis tractare cœperunt verbum Dei:" "By occasion of this precedent it came to pass, that some presbyters did preach to the people in the bishop's presence, having first obtained faculty from the bishop so to do." And a little after it became a custom, from a general faculty and dispensation indulged to them in the second council of Vase. [q] Now, if this evidence of church-practice be not sufficient to reconcile us to St. Jerome, let him then first be reconciled to himself, and then we are sure to be helped: for, in his dialogue against the Luciferians, his words are these: "Cui si non exsors quædam et ab omnibus eminens detur potestas, tot efficientur schismata quot sunt sacerdotes. Inde venit ut sine episcopi missione neque presbyter neque diaconus jus habeat baptizandi:" "Because the bishop hath an eminent power, and this power is necessary; thence it comes that neither presbyter nor deacon may so much as baptize without the bishop's leave."

This whole discourse shows clearly, not only the bishops to be superior in jurisdiction, but that they have sole jurisdiction, and the presbyters only in substitution and vicarage.

SECTION XXXVIII.

Reserving Church-Goods to Episcopal Dispensation.

Divers other acts there are to attest the superiority of the bishop's jurisdiction over priests and deacons, as that all the goods of the church were in the bishop's sole disposing; and as at first they were laid at the apostles' feet, so afterwards at the bishops'. So it is in the forty-first canon of the apostles; so it is in the council of Gangra: and all the world are excluded from intervening in the dispensation, without express delegation from the bishop, as appears in the seventh and eighth canons, and that under pain of an anathema by the holy council. And, therefore, when, in success of time, some patrons, that had founded churches and endowed them, thought that the dispensation of those lands did not belong to the bishop; of this the third council of Toledo complains, and makes remedy, commanding, "ut omnia, secundum constitutionem antiquam, ad episcopi ordinationem et potestatem pertineant."[a] The same is renewed in the fourth council of Toledo: "Noverint autem conditores basilicarum, in rebus quas eisdem ecclesiis conferunt, nullam se potestatem habere, sed juxta canonum instituta, sicut ecclesiam, ita et dotem ejus ad ordinationem episcopi pertinere."[b] These councils I produce, not as judges, but as witnesses in the business; for they give concurrent testimony that "as the church itself, so the dowry of it too, did belong to the bishop's disposition by the ancient canons."[c] For so the third council of Toledo calls it, "antiquam constitutionem," and itself is almost 1100 years old; so that still I am precisely within the bounds of the primitive church, though it be taken in a narrow sense. For so it was determined in the great council of Chalcedon, commanding that the goods of the church should be dispensed by a clergy steward, κατὰ γνώμην τοῦ ἰδίου ἐπισκόπου, "according to the pleasure or sentence of the bishop."

SECTION XXXIX.

Forbidding Presbyters to leave their own Diocess, or to travel, without Leave of the Bishop.

Add to this, that without the bishop's dimissory letters, presbyters might not go to another diocess. So it is decreed in the fifteenth canon of the apostles, under pain of "suspension or deposition;" μηκέτι λειτουργεῖν is the censure; and that especially, εἰ, προσκαλουμένου αὐτὸν τοῦ ἐπισκόπου αὐτοῦ, ἐπανελθεῖν οὐκ ὑπήκουσεν, "if he would not return, when his bishop calls him." The same is renewed in the council of Antioch, cap. 3. and in the council of Constantinople in Trullo, cap. 17.; the censure there is, καθαιρεῖσθω καὶ αὐτὸς, "Let him be deposed that shall, without dimissory letters from the bishop," ἐν ἑτέρᾳ κατατάττεσθαι ἐκκλησίᾳ, "fix himself in the diocess of another bishop;" but with license of his bishop he may: "Sacerdotes, vel alii clerici, concessione suorum episcoporum, possunt ad alias ecclesias transmigrare."[d] But this is frequently renewed in many other synodal decrees; these may suffice for this instance.

But this not leaving the diocess, is not only meant of promotion in another church; but clergymen might not travel from city to city without the bishop's license; which is not only an argument of his regiment, "in genere politico," but extends it almost to a despotic; but so strict was the primitive church in preserving the strict tie of duty and clerical subordination to their bishop. The council of Laodicea commands a priest or clergyman, ἄνευ κανονικῶν γραμμάτων μὴ ὁδεύειν, "not to travel without canonical or dimissory letters."[e] And who are to grant these letters is expressed in the next canon, which repeats the same prohibition, ὅτι οὐ δεῖ ἱερατικὸν ἢ κληρικὸν ἄνευ κελεύσεως ἐπισκόπου ὁδεύειν, "a priest or a clerk must not travel without the command of his bishop;"[f] and this prohibition is inserted into the body of the law, "De Consecrat. dist. 5. can. Non oportet," which puts in the clause of "Neque etiam laicum;" but this was beyond the council. The same is in the council of Agatho.[g] The council of Venice adds a censure,[h] that those clerks should be like persons excommunicate in all those places whither they went without letters of license from their bishop. The same penalty is inflicted by the council of Epaunum, "Presbytero, vel diacono, sine antistitis sui epistolis ambulanti, communionem nullus impendat."[i] The first council of Touraine, in France, and the third council of Orleans, attest the self-same power in the bishop, and duty in all his clergy.

SECTION XL.

And the Bishop had Power to prefer which of his Clerks he pleased.

But a coercitive authority makes not a complete jurisdiction, unless it be also remunerative; and "the princes of the nations are called εὐεργέται, benefactors;" for it is but half a tie to endear obedience, when the subject only fears "quod prodesse non poterit," "that which cannot profit." And, therefore, the primitive church, to make the episcopal jurisdiction up entire, gave power to the bishop to present the clerks of his diocess to the higher orders and nearer degrees of approximation to himself; and the clerks might not refuse to be so promoted. "Item placuit, ut quicunque clerici vel diaconi, pro necessitatibus ecclesiarum, non obtemperaverint episcopis suis, volentibus eos ad honorem ampliorem in sua ecclesia promovere, nec illic ministrent in gradu suo, unde recedere noluerunt." So it is decreed in the African code: "They that will not, by their bishop, be promoted to a greater honour in the church, must not enjoy what they have already."[a]

But it is a question of great consideration, and worth a strict inquiry, in whom the right and power of electing clerks was resident in the primitive church: for the right and the power did not always go together, and also several orders had several manners of election; presbyters and inferior clergy were chosen by the bishop alone; the bishop by a synod of bishops, or by their chapter; and lastly, because, of late, strong outcries are made upon several pretensions, amongst which the people make the biggest noise, though of all, their title to election of clerks be most empty; therefore let us consider it upon all its grounds.

1. In the Acts of the Apostles, which are most certainly the best precedents for all acts of Holy Church, we find that "Paul and Barnabas ordained elders in every church," and "they passed through Lystra, Iconium, Antioch, and Derbe," χειροτονήσαντες αὐτοῖς πρεσβυτέρους, "appointing them elders." St. Paul chose Timothy bishop of Ephesus, and he says of himself and Titus, "For this cause I sent thee to Crete," ἵνα καταστήσῃς κατὰ πόλιν πρεσβυτέρους, "that thou shouldst appoint presbyters or bishops" (be they which they will) "in every city." The word καταστήσῃς signifies that the whole action was his. For that he ordained them, no man questions; but he also appointed them, and that was, saith St. Paul, ὡς ἐγώ σοι διεταξάμην, "as I commanded thee."[b] It was, therefore, an apostolical ordinance, that the bishop should appoint presbyters. Let there be half so much shown for the people, and I will also endeavour to promote their interest. There is only one pretence of a popular election in Scripture; it is of the seven that were set over the widows. But first, this was no part of the hierarchy: this was no cure of souls: this was no Divine institution: it was in the dispensation of monies: it was by command of the apostles the election was made, and they might recede from their own right: it was to satisfy the multitude: it was to avoid scandal, which, in the dispensation of monies, might easily arise: it was in a temporary office: it was with such limitations and conditions as the apostles prescribed them: it was out of the number of the seventy that the election was made, if we may believe St. Epiphanius, so that they were presbyters before this choice: and lastly, it was only a nomination of seven men; the determination of the business, and the authority of rejection, was still in the apostles, and indeed the whole power "whom we may appoint over this business:" and after all this, there can be no hurt done by the objection, especially since clearly and indubiously the election of bishops and presbyters was in the apostles' own persons: ὁ πρῶτος ἐνεχειρίσθη παρὰ τῶν ἀποστόλων τὴν ὑμετέραν προστασίαν, saith St. Ignatius of Evodias: "Evodias was first appointed to be your governor or bishop by the apostles;"[c] and themselves did commit it to others that were bishops, as in the instances before reckoned. Thus the case stood in Scripture.

2. In the practice of the church it went according to the same law and practice apostolical. The people did not, might not, choose the ministers of Holy Church. So the council of Laodicea: Περὶ τοῦ μὴ τοὺς ὄχλους ἐπιτρέπειν τὰς ἐκλογὰς ποιεῖσθαι τῶν μελλόντων καθίστασθαι εἰς ἱερατεῖον. "The people must not choose those that are to be promoted to the priesthood."[d] The prohibition extends to their non-election of all the superior clergy, bishops, and presbyters. But who then must elect them? The council of Nice determines that; for in the sixteenth and seventeenth canons, the council forbids any promotion of clerks to be made, but by the bishop of that church where they are first ordained: which clearly reserves to the bishop the power of retaining or promoting all his clergy.

3. All ordinations were made by bishops alone, as I have already proved. Now let this be confronted with the practice of primitive christendom, that no presbyter might be ordained "sine titulo," without a particular charge, which was always custom, and at last grew to be a law in the council of Chalcedon: and we shall perceive that the ordainer was the only chooser; for then to ordain a presbyter was also to give him a charge; and the patronage of a church was not a lay inheritance, but part of the bishop's cure, for he had φροντίδα τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν ἐν πόλει, καὶ χώρᾳ, "the care of the churches in all the diocess;" as I have already shown. And, therefore, when St. Jerome, according to the custom of christendom, had specified some particular ordinations or election of presbyters by bishops, as how himself was made priest by Paulinus, and Paulinus by Epiphanius of Cyprus, "Gaudeat episcopus judicio suo, cùm tales Christo elegerit sacerdotes:" "Let the bishop rejoice in his own act, having chosen such worthy priests for the service of Christ."[e]

Thus St. Ambrose gives intimation, that the dispensing all the offices in the clergy was solely in the bishop: "Hæc spectet sacerdos, et quod cuique congruat, id officii deputet:" "Let the bishop observe these rules, and appoint every one his office, as is best answerable to his condition and capacity."[f] And Theodoret reports of Leontius, the bishop of Antioch, how, being an Arian, "Adversarios recti dogmatis suscipiens, licet turpem habentes vitam, ad presbyteratûs tamen ordinem et diaconatûs evexit. Eos autem qui universis virtutibus ornabantur et apostolica dogmata defendebant absque honore deseruit."[g] "He advanced his own faction, but would not promote any man that was catholic and pious." So he did. The power, therefore, of clerical promotion was in his own hands. This thing is evident and notorious; and there is scarce any example in antiquity of either presbyters or people choosing any priest, but only in the case of St. Austin, whom the people's haste snatched, and carried him to their bishop, Valerius, entreating him to ordain him priest. This, indeed, is true, that the testimony of the people, for the life of them that were to be ordained, was by St. Cyprian ordinarily required: "In ordinandis clericis, fratres carissimi, solemus vos ante consulere, et mores ac merita singulorum communi consilio ponderare." "It was his custom to advise with his people concerning the public fame of clerks to be ordained;" it was usual, I say, with him, but not perpetual; for it was otherwise in the case of Celerinus, and divers others, as I showed elsewhere.

4. In election of bishops, though not of priests, the clergy and the people had a greater actual interest, and did often intervene with their silent consenting suffrages or public acclamations. But first; this was not necessary. It was otherwise amongst the apostles, and in the case of Timothy, of Titus, of St. James, of St. Mark, and all the successors, whom they did constitute in the several charges. 2. This was not by law, or right, but in fact only. It was against the canon of the Laodicean council, and the thirty-first canon of the apostles, which, under pain of deposition, commands that a bishop be not promoted to his church by the intervening of any lay power.[h]

Against this discourse St. Cyprian is strongly pretended: "Quando ipsa [plebs] maximè habeat potestatem vel eligendi dignos sacerdotes, vel indignos recusandi: quod et ipsum videmus de Divinâ auctoritate descendere," &c. Thus he is usually cited: "The people have power to choose or to refuse their bishops, and this comes to them from Divine authority." No such matter. The following words expound him better: "Quod et ipsum videmus de Divinâ auctoritate descendere, ut sacerdos, plebe præsente, sub omnium oculis deligatur, et dignus atque idoneus publico judicio ac testimonio comprobetur:" "That the bishop is chosen publicly, in the presence of the people, and he only be thought fit who is approved by public judgment and testimony;" or, as St. Paul's phrase is, "He must have a good report of all men:" that is indeed a Divine institution: and that to this purpose, and for the public attestation of the act of election and ordination, the people's presence was required, appears clearly by St. Cyprian's discourse in this epistle. For what is the Divine authority that he mentions? It is only the example of Moses, whom God commanded to take the son of Eleazar, and clothe him with his father's robes, "coram omni synagogâ," "before all the congregation." The people chose not; God chose Eleazar, and Moses consecrated him, and the people stood and looked on: that is all that this argument can supply. Just thus bishops are and ever were ordained: "Non nisi sub populi assistentis conscientiâ: "In the sight of the people standing by:" but to what end? "Ut, plebe præsente, detegantur malorum crimina, vel bonorum merita prædicentur." All this while the election is not in the people, nothing but the public testimony and examination; for so it follows, "Et sit ordinatio justa et legitima, quæ omnium suffragio et judicio fuerit examinata."

But St. Cyprian hath two more proofs whence we may learn either the sense or the truth of his assertion. The one is of the apostle's ordaining the seven deacons; but this we have already examined; the other of St. Peter choosing St. Matthias into apostolate; it was indeed done in the presence of the people. But here it is considerable, that at this surrogation of St. Matthias, the number of the persons present was but one hundred and twenty, of which eleven were apostles, and seventy-two were disciples and presbyters; they make up eighty-three, and then there remains but thirty-seven of the laity, of which many were women, which I know not yet whether any man would admit to the election of an apostle, and whether they do or do not, the laity is a very inconsiderable number, if the matter had been to be carried by plurality of voices; so that let the worst come that is imaginable, the whole business was, in effect, carried by the clergy, whom in this case we have no reason to suspect to be divided, and of a distinct or disagreeing interest. Let this discourse be of what validity it will, yet all this whole business was miraculous and extraordinary; for though the apostles named two candidates, yet the Holy Ghost chose them by particular revelation. And yet for all this, it was lawful for St. Peter alone to have done it without casting lots. "An non licebat ipsi [Petro] eligere? Licebat, et quidem maxime; verum id non facit, ne cui videretur gratificari. Quanquam alioqui non erat particeps Spiritûs." For all "he had not as yet received the Holy Ghost, yet he had power himself to have completed the election." So St. Chrysostom.[i]

So that now, if St. Cyprian means more than the presence of the people for suffrage of public testimony, and extends it to a suffrage of formal choice, his proofs of the Divine authority are invalid; there is no such thing can be deduced from thence; and then this his complying so much with the people, which hath been the fault of many a good man, may be reckoned together with his rebaptization. But truth is, he means no more than suffrage of testimony, viz. that he who is to be chosen bishop be, for his good life, a man of good fame, and approved of before God and all the people; and this is all the share they have in their election. And so indeed himself sums up the whole business, and tells of another "jus Divinum" too: "Propter quod diligenter de traditione Divinâ, et apostolicâ observatione, observandum est et tenendum, quod apud nos quoque, et ferè apud provincias universas, tenetur, ut ad ordinationes ritè celebrandas ad eam plebem cui præpositus ordinatur, episcopi ejusdem provinciæ proximi quinque conveniant, et episcopus deligatur plebe præsente, quæ singulorum vitam plenissimè novit:" "It is most diligently to be observed, for there is a Divine tradition and an apostolical ordinance for it, and it is used by us, and almost by all churches, that all the bishops of the province assembled to the making of right ordinations, and that a bishop be chosen in the face of the people, who best know their life and conversation." So that the bishops were to make the formal election, the people to give their judgment of approbation in this particular, and so much as concerned the exemplary piety and good life of him that was to be their bishop. Here we see in St. Cyprian is a "jus Divinum" for the bishop's choosing a colleague or a brother-bishop, as much as for the presence of the people, and yet the presence was all. And howsoever the people were present to give this testimony, yet the election was clearly in the bishops, and that by Divine tradition and apostolical observation, saith St. Cyprian; and thus it was in all churches almost.

[i] Homil. 3. in Act.

In Africa this was, and so it continued till after St. Austin's time, particularly in the choice of Eradius, his successor. It was so in the Greek church, as St. Chrysostom tells us.[k] It was so in Spain, as St. Isidore tells us;[l] and in many other places, that the people should be present, and give acclamation and tumultuary approbation; but to the formal election of the clergy, made by enumeration of votes and subscription, the people never were admitted.

5. Although that in times of persecution, at first, and to comply with the people, who were, in all respects, to be sweetened, to make them, with easier appetite, swallow the bitter pill of persecution, and also to make them more obedient to their bishop, if they did, though but in a tumult and noise, cry him up in his ordination: "Ne plebs in vitâ episcopum non optatum, aut contemnat, aut oderit, et fiat minùs religiosa quàm convenit, cui non licuerit habere quem voluit," for so St. Leo expresses the cause:[m] yet the formality and right of proper election was in the clergy, and often so practised without any consent at all, or intervening act of the people. The right, I say, was in the bishops; so it was decreed in the Nicene council: Ἐπίσκοπον προσήκει μάλιστα μὲν ὑπὸ πάντων τῶν ἐν τῇ ἐπαρχίᾳ καθίστασθαι· "The bishop must be appointed or constituted by all the bishops of the province:" Τὸ δὲ κῦρος τῶν γινομένων δίδοσθαι καθ' ἑκάστην ἐπαρχίαν τῷ μητροπολίτῃ· "It must be confirmed and established by the metropolitan."[n] No presbyters here all this while, no people. But the excise of this power is more clearly seen in the acts of some councils, where the fathers degraded some bishops, and themselves appointed others in their rooms. The bishops in the council of Constantinople deposed Marcellus: "In cujus locum Basilium in Ancyram miserunt:" "They sent Basilius bishop in his room," saith Sozomen.[o] "Ostendat Bassianus si per synodum reverendissimorum episcoporum, et consuetâ lege episcopus Ephesiorum metropolis est constitutus," said the fathers of the council of Chalcedon:[p] "Let Bassianus show that he was made bishop of Ephesus by a synod of bishops, and according to the accustomed law." The law I showed before, even the Nicene canon: the fathers of which council sent a synodal epistle to the church of Alexandria, to tell them they had deposed Melitius from the office of a bishop, only left him the name, but "took from him all power:" "Nullam verò omnimodò habere potestatem, neque eligendi, neque ordinandi," &c.[q] Neither suffering him to "choose" nor "to ordain clerks." It seems, then, that was part of the episcopal office in ordinary, "placitos sibi eligere," as the epistle expresses it in the sequel, "to choose whom they listed." But the council deposed Melitius and sent Alexander, their bishop and patriarch, to rule the church again. And particularly to come home to the case of the present question, when Auxentius, bishop of Milan, was dead, and the bishops of the province, and the clergy of the church, and the people of the city, were assembled at the choosing of another,—the emperor makes a speech to the bishops only, that they should be careful in their choice. So that although the people were present, "quibus pro fide et religione etiam honor deferendus est," as St. Cyprian's phrase is;[r] "to whom respect is to be had, and fair complyings to be used, so long as they are pious, catholic, and obedient;" yet both the right of electing and solemnity of ordaining was in the bishops; the people's interest did not arrive to one half of this.

6. There are, in antiquity, divers precedents of bishops who choose their own successors; it will not be imagined the people will choose a bishop over his head, and proclaim that they were weary of him. In those days they had more piety. Agelius did so, he chose Sisinnius; and that it may appear it was without the people, they came about him, and entreated him to choose Marcian, to whom they had been beholden in the time of Valens the emperor; he complied with them and appointed Marcian to be his successor, and Sisinnius, whom he had first chosen, to succeed Marcian.[s] Thus did Valerius choose his successor, St. Austin; for though the people named him for their priest, and carried him to Valerius to take orders, yet Valerius chose him bishop. And this was usual; ὡς καὶ αἱ ἄλλαι πόλεις, as Epiphanius expresses this case; it was ordinary to do so in many churches.

7. The manner of election in many churches was various; for although indeed the church had commanded it, and given power to the bishops to make the election, yet in some times and in some churches, the presbyters or the chapter chose one out of themselves. St. Jerome says they always did so in Alexandria, from St. Mark's time to Heraclas and Dionysius. St. Ambrose says, that at the first the bishop was not, by a formal new election, promoted, but "recedente uno, sequens ei succedebat:" "as one died, so the next senior did succeed him."[t] In both these cases no mixture of the people's votes.

8. In the church of England, the people were never admitted to the choice of a bishop, from its first becoming christian to this very day: and, therefore, to take it from the clergy, in whom it always was by permission of princes, and to interest the people in it, is to recede "à traditionibus majorum," "from the religion of our forefathers," and to innovate in a high proportion.

9. In those churches where the people's suffrage (by way of testimony, I mean, and approbation) did concur with the synod of bishops in the choice of a bishop, the people at last, according to their usual guise, grew hot, angry, and tumultuous; and then were engaged, by divisions in religion, to name a bishop of their own sect, and to disgrace one another by public scandal and contestation, and often grew up to sedition and murder; and, therefore, although they were never admitted (unless where themselves usurped) farther than I have declared, yet even this was taken from them; especially since in tumultuary assemblies they were apt to carry all before them, they knew not how to distinguish between power and right, they had not well learned to take denial; but began to obtrude whom they listed,—to swell higher, like a torrent, when they were checked; and the soleship of election, which, by the ancient canons, was in the bishops, they would have asserted wholly to themselves, both in right and execution.

I end this with the annotation of Zonoras upon the twelfth canon of the Laodicean council: "Populi suffragiis olim episcopi eligebantur," (understand him in the senses above explicated;) "sed cùm multæ inde seditiones existerent, hinc factum est ut episcoporum uniuscujusque provinciæ auctoritate eligi episcopum quemque oportere decreverint patres:" "Of old time, bishops were chosen, not without the suffrage of the people," (for they concurred by way of testimony and acclamation,) "but when this occasioned many seditions and tumults, the fathers decreed that a bishop should be chosen by the authority of the bishops of the province." And he adds, that in the election of Damascus, one hundred and thirty-seven men were slain, and that six hundred examples more of that nature were producible.

Truth is, the nomination of bishops in Scripture was in the apostles alone; and though the kindred of our blessed Saviour were admitted to the choice of Simeon Cleophæ, the successor of St. James, to the bishopric of Jerusalem, as Eusebius witnesses;[u] it was "propter singularem honorem," "an honorary and extraordinary privilege," indulged to them for their vicinity and relation to our blessed Lord, the Fountain of all benison to us; and for that very reason Simeon himself was chosen bishop too. Yet this was "præter regulam apostolicam." The rule of the apostles and their precedents were for the sole right of the bishops, to choose their colleagues in that sacred order. And then in descent, even before the Nicene council, the people were forbidden to meddle in election, for they had no authority by Scripture to choose; by the necessity of times, and for the reasons before asserted, they were admitted to such a share of the choice as is now folded up in a piece of paper, even to a testimonial; and yet I deny not but they did often take more, as in the case of Nilammon, "quem cives elegerunt," saith the story out of Sozomen;[x] they chose him alone (though God took away his life, before himself would accept of their choice); and then they behaved themselves oftentimes with so much insolence, partiality, faction, sedition, cruelty, and pagan baseness, that they were quite interdicted it, above one thousand two hundred years ago. So that they had their little in possession but a little while, and never had any due; and therefore, now their request for it is no petition of right, but a popular ambition, and a snatching at a sword to hew the church in pieces.[y]

But I think I need not have troubled myself half so far; for they that strive to introduce a popular election, would as fain have episcopacy out as popularity of election let in. So that all this of popular election of bishops may seem superfluous. For I consider, that if the people's power of choosing bishops be founded upon God's law, as some men pretend from St. Cyprian, (not proving the thing from God's law, but God's law from St. Cyprian,) then bishops themselves must be by God's law; for surely God never gave them power to choose any man into that office, which himself hath no way instituted. And, therefore, I suppose these men will desist from their pretence of Divine right of popular election, if the church will recede from her Divine right of episcopacy. But for all their blundering and confounding, their bold pretences have made this discourse necessary.

SECTION XLI.

Bishops only did vote in Councils, and neither Presbyters nor People.

IF we add to all these foregoing particulars the power of making laws to be in bishops, nothing else can be required to the making up of a spiritual principality. Now, as I have shown that the bishop of every diocess did give laws to his own church for particulars, so it is evident that the laws of provinces, and of the catholic church, were made by conventions of bishops, without the intervening or concurrence of presbyters, or any else, for sentence and decision.

The instances of this are just so many as there are councils. St. Athanasius, reprehending Constantius the Arian, for interposing in the conciliary determinations of faith, "Si judicium episcoporum est," saith he, "quid cum eo commune habet imperator?" "It is a judgment to be passed by bishops," (meaning the determination of the article,) "and not proper for the emperor."[a] And when Hosius of Corduba reproved him for sitting president in a council, "Quis enim videns eum in decernendo principem se facere episcoporum, non meritò dicat illum eam ipsam abominationem desolationis?"

"He that sits president, makes himself chief of the bishops," &c., intimating bishops only to preside in councils, and to make decision. And, therefore, "conventus episcoporum" and "concilium episcoporum" are the words for general and provincial councils. "Bis in anno episcoporum concilia celebrentur," said the thirty-eighth canon of the apostles; and "congregatio episcopalis," the council of Sardis is called by Theodoret.[b] And when the question was started, in the time of Pope Victor, about the celebration of Easter, "Ob quam causam," saith Eusebius, "conventus episcoporum, et concilia per singulas quasque provincias convocantur."[c] Where, by the way, it is observable, that at first, even provincial synods were only held by bishops, and presbyters had no interest in the decision; however, we have of late sat so near bishops in provincial assemblies, that we have sat upon the bishop's skirts. But my lords the bishops have a concerning interest in this. To them I leave it; and because the four general councils are the precedents and chief of all the rest, I shall only instance in them for this particular.

1. The title of the Nicene council runs thus: Κανόνες τῶν τριακοσίων δεκαοκτὼ ἁγίων πατέρων τῶν ἐν Νικαίᾳ συνελθόντων· "The canons of the three hundred and eighteen fathers met in Nice." These fathers were all that gave suffrage to the canons; for if they had been more, the title could not have appropriated the sanction to three hundred and eighteen. And that there were no more St. Ambrose gives testimony, in that he makes it to be a mystical number; "Nam et Abraham trecentos decem et octo duxit ad bellum: de conciliis id potissimùm sequor, quod trecenti decem et octo sacerdotes velut tropæum extulerunt, ut mihi videatur hoc esse Divinum, quod eodem numero, in conciliis, fidei habemus oraculum, quo, in historiâ, pietatis exemplum."[d] Well! three hundred and eighteen was the number of the judges, the Nicene fathers; and they were all bishops, for so is the title of the subscriptions. "Subscripserunt trecenti decem et octo episcopi, qui in eodem concilio convenerunt;" thirteen whereof were chorepiscopi, but not one presbyter; save only that Vitus and Vincentius subscribed as legates of the bishop of Rome, but not by their own authority.

2. The great council of Constantinople was celebrated by one hundred and fifty bishops: Κανόνες τῶν ἑκατὸν πεντήκοντα ἁγίων πατέρων, τῶν ἐν Κωνσταντινουπόλει συνελθόντων· that is the title of the canons. "The canons of one hundred and fifty holy fathers who met in Constantinople:" and that these were all bishops appears by the title of St. Gregory Nazianzen's oration in the beginning of the council. Τοῦ ἁγίου Γρηγορίου τοῦ Ναζιανζήνου συντακτήριος εἰς τὴν τῶν ἑκατὸν πεντήκοντα ἐπισκόπων παρουσίαν· "The oration of St. Gregory Nazianzen, in the presence of one hundred and fifty bishops." And of this council it was that Socrates speaking, "Imperator," saith he, "nullâ morâ interpositâ, concilium episcoporum convocat."[e] Here, indeed, some few bishops appeared by proxy, as Montanus, bishop of Claudiopolis, by Paulus, a presbyter,—and Atarbius, bishop of Pontus, by Cylus, a reader,—and about some four or five more. This only, amongst the subscriptions I find Tyrannus, Auxanon, Helladius, and Elpidius, calling themselves presbyters. But their modesty hinders not the truth of the former testimonies; they were bishops, saith the title of the council, and the oration, and the canons, and Socrates; and lest there be scruple concerning Auxanon, "presbyter Apameæ," because, before Johannes, Apameensis subscribed, which seems to intimate that one of them was the bishop, and the other but a presbyter indeed, without a subterfuge of modesty, the titles distinguish them. For John was bishop in the province of Cœlo-Syria,—and Auxanon, of Apamea in Pisidia.

3. The third was the council of Ephesus, "episcoporum plurium quàm ducentorum," as it is often said in the acts of the council; "of above two hundred bishops," but no presbyters; for, "Cùm episcopi supra ducentos extiterint qui Nestorium deposuerunt, horum subscriptionibus contenti fuimus:" "We were content with the subscription of the two hundred and odd bishops," saith the council:[f] and Theodosius junior, in his epistle to the synod, "Illicitum est," saith he, "eum, qui non sit in ordine sanctissimorum episcoporum, ecclesiasticis immisceri tractatibus:" "It is unlawful for any but them who are in the order of the most holy bishops, to be interested in ecclesiastical assemblies."

4. The last of the four great conventions of christendom was "sexcentorum triginta episcoporum," "of six hundred and thirty bishops, at Chalcedon, in Bithynia." But in all these assemblies, no mere presbyter gave suffrage, except by legation from his bishop and delegation of authority. And, therefore, when in this council some laics, and some monks, and some clergymen, not bishops, would interest themselves, Pulcheria, the empress, sent letters to Consularius, to repel them by force, "Si præter nostram evocationem, aut permissionem suorum episcoporum, ibidem commorantur:" "Who come without command of the empress, or the bishops' permission." Where it is observable that the bishops might bring clerks with them to assist, to dispute, and to be present in all the action; and thus they often did suffer abbots or archimandrites to be there, and to subscribe too; but that was "præter regulam," and by indulgence only and condescension; for when Martinus, the abbot, was requested to subscribe, he answered, "Non suum esse sed episcoporum tantùm subscribere:" "It belonged only to bishops to subscribe to councils."[g] For this reason, the fathers themselves often called out in the council, "Mitte foras superfluos; concilium episcoporum est."

But I need not more particular arguments; for till the council of Basil the church never admitted presbyters, as in their own right, to voice in councils; and that council we know, savoured too much of the schismatic; but before this council, no example, no precedent of subscriptions of the presbyters, either to œcumenical or provincial synods. Indeed, to a diocesan synod, viz. that of Auxerre, in Burgundy, I find thirty-two presbyters subscribing. This synod was neither œcumenical nor provincial, but merely the convocation of a diocess: for here was but one bishop, and some few abbots, and thirty-two presbyters. It was, indeed, no more than a visitation, or the calling of a chapter; for of this we receive intimation in the seventh canon of that assembly: "Ut, in medio Maio, omnes presbyteri ad synodum venirent;" that was their summons; "et, in Novembri, omnes abbates ad concilium:"[h] so that here is intimation of a yearly synod besides the first convention, the greatest of them but diocesan, and, therefore, the lesser but "conventus capitularis;" or, however, not enough to give evidence of a subscription of presbyters to so much as a provincial council; for the guise of christendom was always otherwise, and therefore, it was the best argument that the bishops, in the Arian hurry, used to acquit themselves from the suspicion of heresy: "Neque nos sumus Arii sectatores; quî namque fieri potest, ut cùm simus episcopi, Ario presbytero auscultemus?"[i] Bishops never receive determination of any article from priests, but priests do from bishops: "Nam vestrum est eos instruere," saith St. Clement, speaking of the bishop's office and power over priests and all the clergy, and all the diocess; "eorum est vobis obedire, ut Deo, cujus legatione fungimini."[k] And, a little after: "Audire ergo eum attentius oportet, et ab ipso suscipere doctrinam fidei, monita autem vitæ à presbyteris inquirere:" "Of the priests we must inquire for rules of good life; but of the bishop receive positions and determinations of faith."

Against this if it be objected, "Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus tractari debet;" "That which is of general concernment, must also be of general scrutiny:" I answer, it is true, unless where God himself hath intrusted the care of others in a body, as he hath in the bishops, and will require the souls of his diocess at his hand, and commanded us to require the law at their mouths, and to follow their faith,[l] whom he hath set over us. And, therefore, the determination of councils pertains to all, and is handled by all, not in diffusion, but in representation. For, "Ecclesia est in episcopo, et episcopus in ecclesiâ," saith St. Cyprian: "The church is in the bishop," viz. by representment, "and the bishop is in the church,"[m] viz. as a pilot in a ship, or a master in a family, or rather as a steward and guardian, to rule in his master's absence; and for this reason the synod of the Nicene bishops is called, in Eusebius, "conventus orbis terrarum,"[n] and, by St. Austin, "consensus totius ecclesiæ;" not that the whole church was there present, in their several persons, but was there represented by the catholic bishops; and, if this representment be not sufficient for obligation to all, I see no reason but the ladies, too, may vote in councils; for I doubt not but they have soul too.

But, however, if this argument were concluding in itself, yet it loses its force in England, where the clergy are bound by laws of parliament, and yet, in the capacity of clergymen, are allowed to choose neither procurators, to represent us as clergy, no knights of the shire, to represent us as commons. In conclusion of this, I say to the presbyters, as St. Ambrose said of the lay-judges, whom the Arians would have brought to judge in council (it was an old heretical trick): "Veniant planè, si qui sunt, ad ecclesiam, audiant cum populo, non ut quisquam judex resideat, sed unusquisque de suo affectu habeat examen, et eligat quem sequatur;" "So may presbyters be present; so they may judge, not for others, but for themselves."[o] And so may the people be present, and anciently were so; and, therefore councils were always kept in open churches "ubi populus judicat," not for others, but for themselves: not by external sentence, but internal conviction; so St. Ambrose expounds himself in the forecited allegation.

There is no considerable objection against this discourse, but that of the first council of Jerusalem where the apostles and elders did meet together, to determine of the question of circumcision; for, although in the story of celebration of it, we find no man giving sentence but Peter and James, yet in Acts xvi. they are called δόγματα κεκριμένα ὑπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων καὶ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, "decrees judged by the apostles and elders." But first, in this the difficulty is the less, because "presbyter" was a general word for all that were not of the number of the twelve, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and doctors. And then, secondly, it is none at all, because Paul and Barnabas are signally and by name reckoned as present in the synod, and one of them protocutor, or else both: so that such presbyters may well define in such conventual assemblies. 3. If yet there were any difficulty latent in the story, yet the catholic practice of God's church is certainly the best expositor of such places, where there either is any difficulty, or where any is pretended; and of this I have already given account.

I remember also, that this place is pretended for the people's power of voicing in councils. It is a pretty pageant, only that it is against the catholic practice of the church, against the exigence of Scripture, which bids us require the law at the mouth of our spiritual rulers, against the gravity of such assemblies, for it would force them to be tumultuous, and at the best, are the worst of sanctions as being issues of popularity; and, to sum up all, it is no way authorized by this first copy of christian councils. The pretence is in the synodal letter, written in the name of "the apostles, and elders and brethren;" that is, says Geta, the apostles and presbyters, and people. But why not brethren that is, all the deacons, and evangelists, and helpers in government, and ministers of the churches? There is nothing, either in words or circumstances, to contradict this. If it be asked, who then are meant by elders, if by "brethren" St. Luke understands these church officers? I answer, that here is such variety, that although I am not certain which officers he precisely comprehends under the distinct titles of elders and brethren, yet here are enough to furnish both with variety; and yet neither to admit mere presbyters, in the present acceptation of the word, nor yet the laity, to a decision of the question, nor authorizing the decretal; for besides the twelve apostles, there were apostolical men which were presbyters, and something more, as Paul, and Barnabas, and Silas, and evangelists, and pastors besides, which might furnish out the last appellative sufficiently. But, however, without any further trouble, it is evident that this word "brethren" does not distinguish the laity from the clergy: "Now, when they heard this, they were pricked in their hearts, and said unto Peter and to the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Judas and Silas, who were apostolical men, are called in Scripture, chief men among the brethren: but this is too known to need a contestation.

I only insert the saying of Basilius, the emperor, in the eighth synod: "De vobis autem laicis, tam qui in dignitatibus, quàm qui absolutè versamini, quid amplius dicam non habeo, quàm quòd nullo modo vobis licet de ecclesiasticis causis sermonem movere, neque penitùs resistere integritati ecclesiæ, et universali synodo adversari:" Laymen," says the emperor, "must by no means meddle with causes ecclesiastical, nor oppose themselves to the catholic church, or councils œcumenical." They must not meddle, for these things appertain to the cognizance of bishops and their decision. And now, after all this, what authority is equal to this legislative of the bishops? Μάλιστα δὲ, ὡς ἁπλῶς εἰπεῖν, ἀρχὰς λεκτέον ταύτας, ὅσαις ἀποδίδοται βουλεύσασθαί τε περί τινων, καὶ κρῖναι καὶ ἐπιταξαι, καὶ μάλιστα τοῦτο· τὸ γὰρ ἐπιτάττειν ἀρχικώτερον, saith Aristotle:[q] "They are all evidences of power and authority, to deliberate, to determine, or judge, to make laws: but to make laws is the greatest power that is imaginable." The first may belong fairly enough to presbyters; but I have proved the two latter to be appropriate to bishops.

SECTION XLII.

And the Bishop had a Propriety in the Persons of his Clerks.

LASTLY, as if all the acts of jurisdiction, and every imaginable part of power, were in the bishop, over the presbyters and subordinate clergy, the presbyters are said to be "episcoporum presbyteri," the "bishops' presbyters," as having a propriety in them, and therefore a superiority over them; and as the bishop was a dispenser of those things which were "in bonis ecclesiæ," so he was of the persons too, a ruler in propriety. St. Hilary, in the book which himself delivered to Constantine, "Ecclesiæ adhuc," saith he, "per presbyteros meos communionem distribuens:" "I still give the holy communion to the faithful people by my presbyters." And, therefore, in the third council of Carthage, a great deliberation was had about requiring a clerk of his bishop to be promoted in another church: "Denique qui unum habuerit, numquid debet illi ipse unus presbyter auferri?" saith Posthumianus:[a] "If the bishop have but one presbyter, must one be taken from him?" "Id sequor," saith Aurelius, "ut conveniam episcopum ejus, atque ei inculcem quod ejus clericus à quâlibet ecclesiâ postuletur." And it was resolved, "ut clericum alienum, nisi concedente ejus episcopo;" "No man shall retain another's clerk, without the consent of the bishop, whose clerk he is."

When Athanasius was abused by the calumny of the heretics, his adversaries, and entered to purge himself, "Athanasius ingreditur cum Timotheo presbytero suo;" "He comes in with Timothy his presbyter;"[b] and Arsenius, "cujus brachium dicebatur excisum, lector aliquando fuerat Athanasii;" "Arsenius was Athanasius's reader." "Ubi autem ventum est ad rumores de poculo fracto à Macario presbytero Athanasii,"[c] &c.; "Macarius was another of Athanasius's priests." So Theodoret: Peter and Irenæus were two more of his presbyters, as himself witnesses. "Paulinianus sometimes to visit us," saith St. Jerome to Pammachius, "but not as your clerk:" "sed ejus à quo ordinatur;" "his clerk, who did ordain."[d] But these things are too known to need a multiplication of instances.

The sum is this; the question was, Whether or no, and how far, the bishops had superiority over presbyters in the primitive church? Their doctrine and practice have furnished us with these particulars: the power of church-goods, and the sole dispensation of them, and a propriety of persons, was reserved to the bishop; for the clergy and church-possessions were in his power, in his administration; the clergy might not travel without the bishop's leave; they might not be preferred in another diocess, without license of their own bishop: in their own churches the bishop had sole power to prefer them; and they must undertake the burden of any promotion, if he calls them to it; without him they might not baptize, not consecrate the eucharist, not communicate, not reconcile penitents, not preach; not only not without his ordination, but not without a special faculty, besides the capacity of their order. The presbyters were bound to obey their bishops in their sanctions and canonical impositions, even by the decree of the apostles themselves, and the doctrine of Ignatius, and the constitution of St. Clement, of the fathers in the council of Arles, Ancyra, and Toledo, and many others: the bishops were declared to be judges in ordinary of the clergy and people of their diocess, by the concurrent suffrages of almost two thousand holy fathers, assembled in Nice, Ephesus, Chalcedon, in Carthage, Antioch, Sardis, Aquileia, Taurinum, Agatho, and by the emperor, and by the apostles; and all this attested by the constant practice of the bishops of the primitive church inflicting censures upon delinquents, and absolving them as they saw cause, and by the dogmatical resolution of the old catholics, declaring in their attributes and appellatives of the episcopal function, that they have supreme and universal spiritual power, (viz. in the sense above explicated,) over all the clergy and laity of the diocess; as, "That they are higher than all power, the image of God, the figure of Christ, Christ's vicar, president of the church, prince of priests, of authority incomparable, unparalleled power," and many more. If all this be witness enough of the superiority of episcopal jurisdiction, we have their depositions, we may proceed as we see cause for, and reduce our episcopacy to the primitive state, for that is truly a reformation, "Id Dominicum quod primum, id hæreticum quod posterius;" and then we shall be sure episcopacy will lose nothing by these unfortunate contestations.

SECTION XLIII.

Their Jurisdiction was over many Congregations, or Parishes.

BUT against the cause it is objected "super totam materiam;" that bishops were not diocesan, but parochial; and therefore of so confined a jurisdiction, that perhaps our village or city-priests shall advance their pulpit as high as the bishop's throne.

Well! Put case they were not diocesan but parish bishops, what then? yet they were such bishops as had presbyters and deacons in subordination to them, in all the particular advantages of the former instances.

2. If the bishops had the parishes, what cure had the priests? so that this will debase the priests as much as the bishops; and if it will confine a bishop to a parish, it will make that no presbyter can be so much as a parish-priest. If it brings a bishop lower than a diocess, it will bring the priest lower than a parish. For set a bishop where you will, either in a diocess or a parish, a presbyter shall still keep the same duty and subordination, the same distance still. So that this objection upon supposition of the former discourse, will no way mend the matter for any side, but make it far worse; it will not advance the presbytery, but it will depress the whole hierarchy, and all the orders of the Holy Church.

But because this trifle is so much used amongst the enemies of episcopacy, I will consider it in little; and besides that it does no body any good advantage, I will represent it in its fucus, and show the falsehood of it.

1. Then it is evident that there were bishops before there were any distinct parishes: for the first division of parishes in the West was by Evaristus, who lived almost one hundred years after Christ, and divided Rome into seven parishes, assigning to every one a presbyter. So Damasus reports of him in the pontifical book: "Hic titulos in urbe Româ divisit presbyteris, et septem diaconos ordinavit, qui custodirent episcopum prædicantem propter stylum veritatis:" "He divided the parishes or titles in the city of Rome to presbyters." The same also is, by Damasus, reported of Dionysius, in his life: "Hic presbyteris ecclesias divisit, et cœmiteria, parochiasque, et diœceses constituit." Marcellus increased the number in the year 305. "Hic fecit cœmiterium viâ Salariâ, et viginti-quinque titulos in urbe Româ constituit quasi diœceses propter baptismum, et pœnitentiam multorum qui convertebantur ex paganis, et propter sepulturas martyrum:" "He made a sepulture or cemetery for the burial of martyrs, and appointed twenty-five titles or parishes:" but he adds, "quasi diœceses," "as it had been diocesses," that is, distinct and limited to presbyters, as diocesses were to bishops; and the use of parishes, which he subjoins, clears the business; for he appointed them only "propter baptismum, et pœnitentiam multorum et sepulturas," "for baptism, and penance, and burial;" for as yet there was no preaching in parishes, but in the mother church. Thus it was in the West.

But in Egypt we find parishes divided something sooner than the earliest of these; for Eusebius reports out of Philo, that the christians in St. Mark's time had several churches in Alexandria. "Etiam de ecclesiis quæ apud eos sunt ita dicit. Est autem in singulis locis consecrata orationi domus," &c.[a] But even before this there were bishops; for in Rome there were four bishops, before any division of parishes, though St. Peter be reckoned for none. And before parishes were divided in Alexandria, St. Mark himself, who did it, was the bishop, and before that time St. James was bishop of Jerusalem and in divers other places where bishops were, there were no distinct parishes of a while after Evaristus's time; for when Dionysius had assigned presbyters to several parishes, he writes of it to Severus, bishop of Corduba, and desires him to do so too in his diocess, as appears in his epistle to him.

For indeed necessity required it, when the christians multiplied and grew to be μέγιστος καὶ ἀναρίθμητος λαὸς, as Cornelius called the Roman christians, "a great and an innumerable people;"[b] and did "implere omnia," as Tertullian's phrase is, "filled all places:" and public and great assemblies drew danger upon themselves, and increased jealousies in others, and their public offices could not be performed with so diffused and particular advantage,—then they were forced to divide congregations, and assigned several presbyters to their cure in subordination to the bishop, and so we see the elder christianity grew, the more parishes there were. At first, in Rome there were none, Evaristus made seven, Dionysius made some more, and Marcellus added twenty-five, and in Optatus's time there were forty.[c]

[a] Lib. ii. Hist. c. 17.

[b] Apud Binium, tom. i. Concil. Euseb. lib. vi. c. 43. Apolog. c. 37.

Well, then! the case is thus: Parishes were not divided at first; therefore, to be sure, they were not of Divine institution. Therefore, it is no Divine institution that a presbyter should be fixed upon a parish; therefore, also, a parish is not, by Christ's ordinance, an independent body; for, by Christ's ordinance, there was no such thing at all, neither absolute nor in dependence neither; and then for the main issue, since bishops were before parishes, in the present sense, the bishops, in that sense, could not be parochial.

But which was first, a private congregation or a diocess? If a private congregation, then a bishop was at first fixed in a private congregation, and so was a parochial bishop. If a diocess was first, then the question will be, how a diocess could be without parishes, for what is a diocess but a jurisdiction over many parishes?

I answer, it is true that diocess and parish are words used now in contradiction; and now a diocess is nothing but the multiplication of many parishes: "Sed non fuit sic ab initio;" for at first, a diocess was "the city and the regio suburbicaria," "the neighbouring towns;" in which there was no distinction of parishes: that which was a diocess in the secular sense, that is, a particular province or division of secular prefecture, that was the assignation of a bishop's charge. Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Laodicea, were κεφαλαὶ διοικήσεως, "heads of the diocess," saith Pliny,[d] meaning in respect of secular jurisdiction; so they were in ecclesiastical regiment. And it was so upon great reason, for when the regiment of the church was extended just so as the regiment of the commonwealth, it was of less suspicion to the secular power, while the church-regiment was just fixed together with the political, as if of purpose to show their mutual consistence, and its own subordination. And besides this, there was in it a necessity; for the subjects of another province or diocess could not, either safely or conveniently, meet where the duty of the commonwealth did not engage them; but being all of one prefecture and diocess, the necessity of public meetings, in order to the commonwealth, would be fair opportunity for the advancement of their christendom. And this, which at first was a necessity in this case, grew to be a law in all, by the sanction of the council of Chalcedon,[e] and of Constantinople in Trullo,[f] Τοῖς πολίτικοῖς καὶ δημοσίοις τύποις καὶ τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν πραγμάτων ἡ τάξις ἀκολουθείτω· "Let the order of the church follow the order and guise of the commonwealth;" viz. in her regiment and prefecture.

But in the modern sense of this division, a bishop's charge was neither a parish nor a diocess, as they are taken in relation; but a bishop had the supreme care of all the christians, which he by himself or his presbyters had converted, and he also had the charge of endeavouring the conversion of all the country. So that although he had not all the diocess actually in communion and subjection, yet his charge, his diocess, was so much. Just as it was with the apostles, to whom Christ gave all the world for a diocess; yet at first they had but a small congregation that did actually obey them.

And now to the question: Which was first, a particular congregation or a diocess? I answer, that a diocess was first; that is, the apostles had a charge, before they had a congregation of converts; and St. Mark was sent bishop to Alexandria by St. Peter before any were converted. But, ordinarily, the apostles, when they had converted a city or nation, then fixed bishops upon their charge, and there indeed the particular congregation was before the bishop's taking of the diocess; but, then, this city or nation, although it was not the bishop's diocess before it was a particular congregation, yet it was part of the apostles' diocess, and this they concredited to the bishops respectively.

St. Paul was ordained, by the prophets at Antioch, apostle of the uncircumcision; all the gentiles was his diocess, and even of those places he then received power, which, as yet, he had not converted. So that, absolutely, a diocess was before a particular congregation. But if a diocess be taken collectively, as now it is, for a multitude of parishes united under one bishop, then one must needs be before twenty, and a particular congregation before a diocess; but then that particular congregation was not a parish, in the present sense, for it was not a part of a diocess, taking a diocess for a collection of parishes; but that particular congregation was the first-fruits of his diocess, and like a grain of mustard-seed, that in time might, and did, grow up to a considerable height, even to a necessity of distinguishing titles and parts of the diocess, assigning several parts to several priests.

2. We see that the primitive bishops, before the division of parishes, had the city and country; and after the division of parishes, had them all under their jurisdiction, and ever, even before the apostles' times, had several provinces (some of them I mean) within their limits and charges. The thirty-fifth canon of the apostles gives power to the bishop to dispose only of those things ὅσα τῇ αὐτοῦ παροικίᾳ ἐπιβάλλει καὶ ταῖς ὑπὸ αὐτὴν χώραις, "which are under his diocess, and the neighbour-villages;" and the same thing is repeated in the ninth and tenth canons of the council of Antioch, calling it ἀρχαῖον τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν κανόνα, "the ancient canon of our forefathers;" and yet itself is older than three of the general councils; and if then it was an ancient canon of the fathers, that the city and villages should be subject to the bishop, surely a primitive bishop was a diocesan.

But a little before this was the Nicene council.[g] and there I am sure, we have a bishop that is at least a diocesan: Τὰ ἀρχαῖα ἔθη κρατείτω· "Let the old customs be kept." What are those? Τὰ ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ, καὶ Λιβύῃ, καὶ Πενταπόλει. Ὥστε τὸν Ἀλεξανδρείας ἐπίσκοπον πάντων τούτων ἔχειν ἐξουσίαν· "Let the bishop of Alexandria have power over all Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis:" it was a good large parish; and yet this parish, if we have a mind to call it so, was κατὰ τὸ ἀρχαῖον ἔθος, "according to the old custom of their forefathers," and yet that was so early that St. Anthony was then alive, who was born in St. Irenæus's time, who was himself but second from the apostles.

It was also a good large parish that Ignatius was bishop of, even all Syria, Cœlosyria, Mesopotamia, and both the Ciliciæ. Ἐπίσκοπος Συρίας, "the bishop of Syria," he calls himself in his epistle to the Romans;[h] and τῶν κατ' ἀνατολὴν ἐπισκόπων ἡγούμενος, so Theodoret:[i] and besides all these, his successors, in the council of Chalcedon, had the two Phœniciæ and Arabia yielded to them by composition. These alone would have made two or three reasonably good parishes, and would have taken up time enough to perambulate, had that been then the guise of christendom. But examples of this kind are infinite. Theodorus, bishop of Cyrus, was pastor over eight hundred parishes; Athanasius was bishop of Alexandria, Egypt, Thebais, Mareotis, Libya, Ammoniaca, and Pentapolis, saith St. Epiphanius;[k] and his predecessor, Julinianus, successor of Agrippinus, was bishop τῶν κατ' Ἀλεξάνδρειαν ἐκκλησιῶν, "of the churches about Alexandria."[l] Either it was a diocess, or at least a plurality. St. Chrysostom had Pontus, Asia, and all Thrace, in his parish, even as much as came to sixteen prefectures;[m] a fair bounds surely; and so it was with all the bishops: a greater or a lesser diocess they had; but all were diocesan; for they had several parishes: "Singuli ecclesiarum episcopi habent sub se ecclesias," saith Epiphanius in his epistle to John of Jerusalem,[n] and in his book "contra hæreses: "Quotquot enim in Alexandriâ catholicæ ecclesiæ sunt, sub uno archiepiscopo sunt, privatimque ad has destinati sunt presbyteri propter ecclesiasticas necessitates, ita ut habitatores vicini sint uniuscujusque ecclesiæ." All Italy was the parish of Liberius, saith Socrates.[o] Africa was St. Cyprian's parish, saith St. Gregory Nazianzen;[p] and St. Basil the Great was parish-priest to all Cappadocia;[q] but I rather believe, if we examine their several stories, they will rather prove metropolitans than mere parochians.[r]

Thirdly: The ancient canons forbade a bishop to be ordained in a village, castle, or town. It was so decreed in the council of Laodicea, before the first Nicene, Ὅτι οὐ δεῖ ἐν ταῖς κώμαις καὶ ἐν ταῖς χώραις καθίστασθαι ἐπισκόπους·[s] "In the villages or countries, bishops must not be constituted." And this was renewed in the council of Sardis: Μὴ ἐξεῖναι ἁπλῶς καθιστᾷν ἐπίσκοπον ἐν κώμῃ τινὶ, ἐν βραχείᾳ πόλει, ᾗ τίνι καὶ εἷς μόνος πρεσβύτερος ὑπάρχει· "It is not lawful to ordain bishops in villages or little towns, to which one presbyter is sufficient;" ἀλλ' ἐπίσκοποι ἐν ταύταις ταῖς πόλεσι καθιστᾷν ἐπισκόπους ὀφείλουσι, ἔνθα καὶ πρότερον ἐτύγχανον γεγονότες ἐπίσκοποι, "but bishops must ordain bishops in those cities where bishops formerly have been."[t] So that this canon does not make a new constitution, but perpetuates the old sanction. Bishops, "ab antiquo," were only ordained in great cities, and presbyters in little villages. Who, then, was the parish-curate? the bishop, or the priest? The case is too apparent.

Only here it is objected, that some bishops were of small towns, and, therefore, these canons were not observed, and bishops might be, and were, parochial, as St. Gregory, of Nazianzum,—Zoticus, of Comana,—Maris, in Dolicha. The one of these is called κώμη, by Eusebius;[u] and another πολίχνη, by Theodoret,[x] "a little town." This is all is pretended for this great scarecrow of parochial bishops.

But, first, suppose these had been parishes, and these three parochial bishops—it follows not that all were; not those to be sure, which I have proved to have been bishops of provinces and kingdoms. Secondly: It is a clear case, that Nazianzum, though a small city, yet was the seat of a bishop's throne; so it is reckoned in the διατύπωσις, made by Leo, the emperor,[y] where it is accounted "inter thronos ecclesiarum patriarchæ Constantinopolitano subjectarum," and is in the same account with Cæsarea, with Ephesus, with Crete, with Philippi, and almost fourscore more. As for Zoticus, he indeed came from Comana, a village-town, for there he was born;[z] but he was "episcopus Otrenus," "bishop of Otrea, in Armenia," saith Nicephorus.[a] And for Maris, the bishop of Dolicha, it was indeed such a small city, as Nazianzum was, but that proves not but his diocess and territory was large enough. Thus was Asclepius "vici non grandis," but yet he was "Vagensis territorii episcopus."[b] His seat might usually be in a little city, if it was one of those towns in which, according to the exigence of the canons, ἔνθα καὶ πρότερον ἐτύγχανον γεγονότες ἐπίσκοποι, "in which bishops anciently were ordained," and yet the appurtenances of his diocess large, and extended, and too great for a hundred parish priests.

Fourthly: The institution of chorepiscopi proves most evidently that the primitive bishops were diocesan, not parochial; for they were instituted to assist the bishop in part of his country-charge, and were περιοδευταὶ, "visiters," as the council of Laodicea calls them. But what need of such suffragans, such coadjutors, to the managing of a parish? Indeed they might possibly have been needful, for the managing of a city-parish, especially if a whole city was a parish, as these objectors must pretend, or not say primitive bishops were parochial. But being these chorepiscopi were suffragans to the bishop, and did their offices in the country, while the bishop was resident in the city, either the bishop's parish extended itself from city to country, and then it is all one with a diocess, or else we can find no employment for a chorepiscopus, or visiter. The tenth canon of the council of Antioch describes their use and power: "Qui in villis et vicis constituti sunt chorepiscopi, placuit sanctæ synodo, ut modum proprium recognoscant, ut gubernent sibi subjectas ecclesias:" "They were to govern the churches delegated to their charge." It seems they had many churches under their provision, and yet they were but the bishop's vicars, for so it follows in the canon; he must not ordain any presbyters and deacons, "absque urbis episcopo, cui ipse subjicitur et regio:" "without leave of the bishop of the city, to whom both himself and all the country is subordinate."

5. The bishop was one in a city wherein were many presbyters. Ἓν θυσιαστήριον πάσῃ τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ καὶ εἷς ἐπίσκοπος ἅμα τῷ πρεσβυτερίῳ καὶ τοῖς διακόνοις, saith St. Ignatius:[c] "There is one altar in every church, and one bishop, together with the presbytery and the deacons." Either then a whole city, such as Rome or Jerusalem, (which, as Josephus reports, had four hundred synagogues,) must be but one parish, and then they had as good call a bishop's charge a diocess as a parish in that latitude; or if there were many parishes in a city, and the bishop could have but one of them, why, what hindered but that there might in a city be as many bishops as presbyters? for if a bishop can have but one parish, why may not every parish have a bishop? But by the ancient canons, a city, though never so great, could have but one for itself and all the country; therefore, every parish-priest was not a bishop, nor the bishop a mere parish-priest.

"Ne in unâ civitate duo sint episcopi," was the constitution of the Nicene fathers, as saith Ruffinus;[d] and long before this, it was so known a business, that one city should have but one bishop, that Cornelius exprobrates to Novatus his ignorance:[e] "Is ergo qui evangelium vindicabat, nesciebat in ecclesiâ catholicâ unum episcopum esse debere, ubi videbat esse presbyteros quadraginta et sex:" "Novatus (the father of the old puritans) was a goodly gospeller, that did not know, that, in a catholic church, there should be but one bishop, wherein there were forty-six presbyters;" intimating clearly, that a church that had two bishops, is not catholic, but schismatic at least, if both be pretended to be of a fixed residence; what then is he that would make as many bishops in a church as presbyters? He is θεόμαχος, "he fights against God," if St. Ambrose say true,[f] "Deus enim singulis ecclesiis singulos episcopos præesse decrevit:" "God hath decreed that one bishop should rule in one church;" and of what extent this one church was, may easily be guessed by himself, who was the ruler and bishop of the great city and province of Milan. And, therefore, when Valerius, as it was then sometimes used in several churches, had ordained St. Austin to be bishop of Hippo, whereof Valerius was also bishop at the same time, St. Austin was troubled at it, as an act most uncanonical, and yet he was not ordained to rule in common with Valerius, but to rule in succession and after the consummation of Valerius.[g] It was the same case in Angelius, a Novatian bishop, ordaining Marcian to be his successor, and Sisinnius to succeed him: the acts were indeed irregular; but yet there was no harm in it to this cause, they were ordained to succeed, not in conjunction. Διχονοίας σύμβολόν ἐστι, καὶ ἐκκλησιαστικοῦ θεσμοῦ ἀλλότριον, saith Sozomen:[h] "It is a note of schism, and against the rule of Holy Church, to have two bishops in one chair." "Secundus episcopus nullus est," saith St. Cyprian;[i] and as Cornelius reports it, in his epistle to St Cyprian, it was the voice of the confessors that had been the instruments and occasions of the Novatian schism, by erecting another bishop: "Nec non ignoramus unum Deum esse, unum Christum esse Dominum, quem confessi sumus, unum Spiritum Sanctum, unum episcopum in catholicâ ecclesiâ esse debere." And these very words the people also used in the contestation about Liberius and Felix. For when the emperor was willing that Liberius should return to his see, on condition that Felix, the Arian, might be bishop there too, they derided the suggestion, crying out, "One God, one Christ, one bishop." So Theodoret reports.[k] But who lists to see more of this may be satisfied, if plenty will do it, in St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, St. Jerome, Œcumenius,[l] Optatus,[m] St. Ambrose,[n] and if he please he may read a whole book of it written by St. Cyprian, "de Unitate Ecclesiæ, sive de Singularitate Prælatorum."

6. Suppose the ordinary diocesses had been parishes, yet what were the metropolitans and the primates? were they also parish-bishops? Surely if bishops were parochial, then these were at least diocesan by their own argument, for to be sure they had many bishops under them. But there were none such in the primitive church? Yes, most certainly. The thirty-fifth canon of the apostles tells us so most plainly, and, at the worst, they were a very primitive record. "Episcopos gentium singularum scire convenit, quis inter eos primus habeatur, quem velut caput existiment, et nihil amplius præter ejus conscientiam gerant, quàm ea sola quæ parochiæ propriæ, et villis quæ sub eâ sunt, competunt: "The bishops of every nation must know who is their primate, and esteem him as their head, and do nothing without his consent, but those things that appertain to their own diocess." And from hence the fathers of the council of Antioch derived their sanction:[o] "Per singulas regiones episcopos convenit nosse, metropolitanum episcopum sollicitudinem totius provinciæ gerere," &c. "The bishops of every province must know, that their metropolitan-bishop does take cure of all the province." For this was an apostolical constitution, saith St. Clement,[p] that in the conversion of gentile cities in place of the archflamines, archbishops, primates, or patriarchs, should be placed, "qui reliquorum episcoporum judicia, et majora (quoties necesse foret) negotia in fide agitarent, et secundùm Dei voluntatem, sicut constituerunt sancti apostoli, definirent." Alexandria was a metropolitical see long before the Nicene council, as appears in the sixth canon, before cited;[q] nay, Dioscorus, the bishop of that church, was required to bring ten of the metropolitans that he had under him, to the council of Ephesus, by Theodosius and Valentinian, emperors; so that it was a patriarchate.

These are enough to show, that in the primitive church there were metropolitan bishops. Now, then, either bishops were parochial or no: if no, then they were diocesan; if yea, then at least many of them were diocesan; for they had, according to this rate, many parochial bishops under them. But I have stood too long upon this impertinent trifle; but as now-a-days it is made, the consideration of it is material to the main question. Only this I add, that if any man should trouble the world with any other fancy of his own, and say that our bishops are nothing like the primitive, because all the bishops of the primitive church had only two towns in their charge, and no more, and each of these towns had in them one hundred and seventy families, and were bound to have no more, how should this man be confuted? It was just such a device as this in them, that first meant to disturb this question, by pretending that the bishops were only parochial, not diocesan, and that there was no other bishop but the parish-priest. Most certainly, themselves could not believe the allegation, only they knew it would raise a dust. But, by God's providence, there is water enough in the primitive fountains to allay it.

SECTION XLIV.

And was aided by Presbyters, but not impaired.

Another consideration must here be interposed, concerning the intervening of presbyters in the regiment of the several churches. For though I have twice already shown, that they could not challenge it of right, either by Divine institution or apostolical ordinance; yet here also it must be considered how it was in the practice of the primitive church; for those men that call the bishop a pope, are themselves desirous to make a conclave of cardinals too, and to make every diocess a Roman consistory.

1. Then the first thing we hear of presbyters, (after Scripture, I mean, for of it I have already given account,) is from the testimony of St. Jerome:[a] "Antequam studia in religione fierent, et diceretur in populis, Ego sum Pauli, &c. communi presbyterorum consilio ecclesiæ gubernabantur:" "Before factions arose in the church, the church was governed by the common council of presbyters." Here St. Jerome either means it of the time before bishops were constituted in particular churches, or after bishops were appointed. If "before bishops were appointed," no hurt done, the presbyters might well rule in common, before themselves had a ruler appointed to govern both them and all the diocess beside. For so St. Ignatius,[b] writing to the church of Antioch, exhorts the presbyters to feed the flock until God should declare τὸν μέλλοντα ἄρχειν ὑμῶν, "whom he would make their ruler." And St. Cyprian, speaking of Etecusa, and some other women that had made defailance in time of persecution, and so were put to penance, "præceperunt eas præpositi tantisper sic esse, donec episcopus constituatur:" The presbyters, whom "sede vacante" he, "præter morem suum," calls "præpositos," they gave order that "they should so remain till the consecration of a bishop." But if St. Jerome means this saying of his "after bishops were fixed," then his expression answers the allegation, for it was but "communi consilio presbyterorum," the judicium might be solely in the bishop; he was the judge, though the presbyters were the counsellors. For so himself adds, that "upon occasion of those first schisms in Corinth, it was decreed in all the world, "ut omnis ecclesiæ cura ad unum pertineret," "all the care of the diocess was in the bishop," and, therefore, all the power; for it was unimaginable that the burden should be laid on the bishop, and the strength put into the hands of the presbyters. And so St. Ignatius styles them σύμβουλοι, καὶ συνεδρευταὶ τοῦ ἐπισκόπου, "assessors and counsellors to the bishop." But yet if we take our estimate from Ignatius, "the bishop is the ruler; without him, though all concurred, yet nothing could be done, nothing attempted; the bishop was superior in all power and authority; he was to be obeyed in all things, and contradicted in nothing; the bishop's judgment was to sway, and nothing must seem pleasing to the presbyters that was cross to the bishop's sentence:" this, and a great deal more, which I have formerly made use of, is in Ignatius;[c] and now let their assistance and counsel extend as far as it will, the bishop's authority is invulnerable. But I have already enough discussed this instance of St. Jerome's section; thither I refer the reader.

2. But St. Cyprian must do this business for us, if any man; for of all the bishops, he did acts of the greatest condescension and seeming declination of episcopal authority. But let us see the worst. "Ad id verò, quod scripserunt mihi compresbyteri nostri, solus rescribere nihil potui, quando à primordio episcopatûs mei statuerim nihil, sine consilio vestro et sine consensu plebis meæ, privatâ sententiâ gerere."[d] And again, "Quamvis mihi videantur debere pacem accipere, tamen ad consultum vestrum eos dimisi, ne videar aliquid temerè præsumere."[e] And a third time, "Quæ res cùm omnium nostrûm consilium et sententiam spectat, præjudicare ego et soli mihi rem communem vindicare non audeo."[f] These are the greatest steps of episcopal humility that I find "in materiâ juridicâ;" the sum whereof is this, that St. Cyprian did consult his presbyters and clergy in matters of consequence, and resolved to do nothing without their advice. But then, consider also it was "statui apud me," "I have resolved with myself," to do nothing without your counsel. It was no necessity "ab extrà," no duty, no sanction of Holy Church, that bound him to such a modesty; it was his own voluntary act. 2. It was as well "diaconorum," as "presbyterorum consilium," that he would have in conjunction, as appears by the titles of the sixth and eighteenth epistles: "Cyprianus presbyteris, ac diaconis fratribus salutem:" so that here the presbyters can no more challenge a power of regiment in common, than the deacons, by any Divine law or catholic practice. 3. St. Cyprian, also, would actually have the consent of the people, too; and that will as well disturb the "jus Divinum" of an independent presbytery, as of an independent episcopacy.

But, indeed, neither of them both need to be much troubled, for all this was voluntary in St. Cyprian, like Moses, "qui cùm in potestate suâ habuit, ut solis possit præesse populo, seniores elegit," (to use St. Jerome's[g] expression,) "who, when it was in his power alone to rule the people, yet chose seventy elders for assistants:" for, as for St. Cyprian, this very epistle clears it, that no part of his episcopal authority was impaired; for he shows what himself alone could do: "Fretus igitur dilectione vestrâ, et religione, quam satis novi, his literis et hortor et mando," &c.; "I entreat and command you:" "Vice meâ fungamini circa gerenda ea, quæ administratio religiosa deposcit;" "Be my substitutes in the administration of church-affairs." He entreats them, "pro dilectione," "because they loved him;" he commands them, "pro religione," "by their religion;" for it was a piece of their religion to obey him, and in him was the government of his church; else how could he have put the presbyters and deacons in substitution?

Add to this, it was the custom of the church, that although the bishop did only impose hands in the ordination of clerks, yet the clergy did approve and examine the persons to be ordained; and it being a thing of public interest, it was then not thought fit to be a personal action, both in preparation and ministration too; and for this St. Chrysostom was accused, "in consilio nefario," as the title of the edition of it expresses it,[h] that he made ordinations ἄνευ συνεδρίου καὶ παρὰ γνώμην τοῦ κλήρου· yet when St. Cyprian saw occasion for it, he did ordain without the consent of the clergy of his church; for so he ordained Celerinus; so he ordained Optatus and Saturnus, when himself was from his church, and in great want of clergymen to assist in the ministration of the daily offices. He did as much in jurisdiction, too, and censures; for himself did excommunicate Felicissimus and Augendus, and Repostus, and Irene, and Paula, as appears in his thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth epistles, and tells Rogatianus[i] that he might have done as much to the petulant deacon that abused him, by virtue of his episcopal authority: and the same power, singly and solely, he exercised in his acts of favour and absolution: "Unus atque alius, obnitente plebe et contradicente, meâ tamen facilitate suscepti sunt."[k] Indeed here is no contradiction of the clergy expressed, but yet the absolution, said to be his own act, against the people, and without the clergy; for he alone was the judge, insomuch that he declared that it was the cause of schism and heresy, that the bishop was not obeyed: "Nec unus in ecclesiâ ad tempus sacerdos, et ad tempus judex, vice Christi, cogitatur," "and that one high priest in a church, and judge, instead of Christ, is not admitted."[l] So that the bishop must be one, and that one must be judge,—and to acknowledge more, in St. Cyprian's Lexicon, is called schism and heresy. Further yet, this judicatory of the bishop is independent, and responsive to none but Christ: "Actum suum disponit, et dirigit unusquisque episcopus, rationem propositi sui Domino redditurus:"[m] and again, "Habet in ecclesiæ administratione voluntatis suæ arbitrium liberum unusquisque præpositus, rationem actûs sui Domino redditurus;" "The bishop is lord of his own actions, and may do what seems good in his own eyes, and for his actions he is to account to Christ."[n]

This general account is sufficient to satisfy the allegations out of the sixth and eighth epistles, and indeed, the whole question. But for the eighteenth epistle, there is something of peculiar answer; for first, it was a case of public concernment, and, therefore, he would so comply with the public interest, as to do it by public council. Secondly, "It was a necessity of times," that made this case peculiar: "Necessitas temporum facit, ut non temerè pacem demus:" they are the first words of the next epistle, which is of the same matter, for if the "lapsi" had been easily, and without a public and solemn trial, reconciled, it would have made gentile sacrifices frequent, and martyrdom but seldom. Thirdly, the common council, which St. Cyprian here said he would expect, was the council of the confessors, to whom, for a peculiar honour, it was indulged, that they should be interested in the public assoiling of such penitents, who were overcome with those fears which the confessors had overcome: so that this is evidently an act of positive and temporary discipline; and as it is no disadvantage to the power of the bishop, so, to be sure, no advantage to the presbyter. But the clause of objection, from the nineteenth epistle, is yet unanswered, and that runs something higher, "tamen ad consultum vestrum eos dimisi, ne videar aliquid temerè præsumere." It is called "presumption" to reconcile the penitents without the advice of those to whom he writ; but from this we are fairly delivered by the title: "Cypriano, et compresbyteris Carthagine consistentibus; Caldonius salutem." It was not the epistle of Cyprian to his presbyters, but of Caldonius, one of the suffragan bishops of Numidia, to his metropolitan; and now, what wonder if he call it presumption to do an act of so public consequence, without the advice of his metropolitan. He was bound to consult him by the canons apostolical, and so he did, and no harm done to the present question, of the bishop's sole and independent power, and unmixed with the conjunct interest of the presbytery, who had nothing to do beyond ministery, counsel, and assistance.

3. In all churches where a bishop's seat was, there were not always a college of presbyters, but only in the greatest churches; for some time in the lesser cities there were but two: "Esse oportet, et aliquantos presbyteros, ut bini sint per ecclesias, et unus in civitate episcopus;" so St. Ambrose:[o] "sometimes there was but one in a church." Posthumianus, in the third council of Carthage, put the case: "Deinde qui unum presbyterum habuerit, numquid debet illi ipse unus presbyter auferri?" The church of Hippo had but one; Valerius was the bishop, and Austin was the priest; and, after him, Austin was the bishop, and Eradius the priest. Sometimes not one, as in the case Aurelius put in the same council now cited, of a church that hath never a presbyter to be consecrated bishop, in the place of him that died; and once, at Hippo, they had none, even then when the people snatched St. Austin, and carried him to Valerius to be ordained: in these cases I hope it will not be denied but the bishop was judge alone; I am sure he had but little company, sometimes none at all.

4. But suppose it had been always done, that presbyters were consulted in matters of great difficulty and possibility of scandal, for so St. Ambrose[p] intimates, "Ecclesia seniores habuit, sine quorum consilio nihil gerebatur in ecclesiâ," understand in these churches where presbyters were fixed; yet this might be necessary, and was so, indeed, in some degree at first, which in succession, as it proved troublesome to the presbyters, so unnecessary and impertinent to the bishops. At first, I say, it might be necessary, for they were times of persecutions and temptation; and if both the clergy and people, too, were not complied withal in such exigence of time, and agonies of spirit, it was the way to make them relapse to gentilism; for a discontented spirit will hide itself, and take sanctuary in the reeds and mud of Nilus, rather than not take complacence in an imaginary security and revenge. Secondly: As yet there had been scarce any synods to determine cases of public difficulty; and what they could not receive from public decision, it was fitting they should supply by the maturity of a conciliary assistance and deliberation: for although, by the canons of the apostles, bishops were bound twice a year to celebrate synods, yet, persecution intervening, they were rather twice a year a διασπορὰ than συνόδος, "a dispersion than a synod." Thirdly: Although synods had been as frequently convened as was intended by the apostles, yet it must be length of time, and a successive experience, that must give opportunity and ability to give general rules for the emergency of all particulars; and therefore, till the church grew of some considerable age, a fixed standing college of presbyters was more requisite than since it hath been, when the frequency of general councils, and provincial synods, and the peace of the church, and the innumerable volumes of the fathers, and decretals of bishops, and a digest of ecclesiastical constitutions, hath made the personal assistance of presbyters unnecessary. 4. When necessity required not their presence and counsel, their own necessity required that they should attend their several cures. For let it be considered, they that would now have a college of presbyters assist the bishop, whether they think of what follows; for either they must have presbyters ordained without a title, which I am sure they have complained of these threescore years, or else they must be forced to non-residence; for how else can they assist the bishop in the ordinary and daily occurrences of the church, unless either they have no cure of their own, or else neglect it? And as for the extraordinary, either the bishop is to consult his metropolitan, or he may be assisted by a synod, if the canons already constituted do not aid him; but in all these cases the presbyter is impertinent.

5. As this assistance of presbyters was at first for necessity, and after by custom it grew a law; so now, "retrò," first the necessity failed, and then the desuetude abrogated the law, which before custom had established: "Quod quâ negligentiâ obsoleverit nescio," saith St. Ambrose:[q] "he knew not how it came to be obsolete," but so it was; it had expired before his time: not but that presbyters were still in mother churches, (I mean in great ones,) "In ecclesiâ enim habemus senatum nostrum, actum presbyterorum;" "We have still," saith St. Jerome,[r] "in the church, our senate, a college, or chapter of presbyters;" he was then at Rome or Jerusalem: but they were not consulted in church-affairs, and matter of jurisdiction; that was it that St. Ambrose wondered how it came to pass: and thus it is to this day. In our mother churches we have a chapter, too, but the bishop consults them not in matters of ordinary jurisdiction; just so it was in St. Ambrose's time; and, therefore, our bishops have altered no custom in this particular; the alteration was pregnant, even before the end of the four general councils, and, therefore, is no violation of a Divine right; for then, most certainly, a contrary provision would have been made in those conventions, wherein so much sanctity, and authority, and catholicism, and severe discipline, were conjunct; and then, besides, it is no innovation in practice which pretends so fair antiquity; but, however, it was never otherwise than voluntary in the bishops, and positive discipline in the church, and conveniency in the thing for that present, and counsel in the presbyters, and a trouble to the presbyters' persons, and a disturbance of their duties, when they came to be fixed upon a particular charge.

One thing more before I leave: I find a canon of the council of Hispalis[s] objected: "Episcopus presbyteris solus honorem dare potest, solus autem auferre non potest:" "A bishop may alone ordain a priest; a bishop may not alone depose a priest." Therefore, in censures there was in the primitive church a necessity of conjunction of presbyters with the bishop in imposition of censures.

To this I answer, first, it is evident that he that can give an honour, can also take it away, if any body can; for there is in the nature of the thing no greater difficulty in pulling down than in raising up. It was wont always to be accounted easier; therefore this canon, requiring a conjunct power in deposing presbyters, is a positive constitution of the church, founded, indeed, upon good institution, but built upon no deeper foundation, neither of nature or higher institution, than its own present authority.

But that is enough, for we are not now in question of Divine right, but of catholic and primitive practice. To it, therefore, I answer, that the conjunct hand—required to pull down a presbyter—was not the chapter, or college of presbyters; but a company of bishops, a synodal sentence, and determination; for so the canon runs, "qui profecto nec ab uno damnari nec uno judicante poterint honoris sui privilegiis exui: sed præsentati synodali judicio, quod canon de illis præceperit definiri." And the same thing was determined in the Greeks' council of Carthage.[t] "If a presbyter or a deacon be accused, their own bishop shall judge them, not alone, but with the assistance of six bishops more, in the case of a presbyter; three of a deacon; τῶν δὲ λοιπῶν κληρικῶν τὰς αἰτίας καὶ μόνος ὁ ἐντόπιος ἐπίσκοπος διαγνῶ καὶ περατώσῃ· but the causes of the other clergy, the bishop of the place must alone "hear and determine them." So that by this canon, in some things, the bishop might not be alone, but then his assistants were bishops, not presbyters: in other things he alone was judge, without either, and yet his sentences must not be clancular, but in open court, in the full chapter, for his presbyters must be present; and so it is determined for Africa, in the fourth council of Carthage:[u] "Ut episcopus nullius causam audiat absque præsentiâ clericorum suorum: alioquin irrita erit sententia episcopi nisi præsentiâ clericorum confirmetur." Here is, indeed, a necessity of the presence of the clergy of his church, where his consistory was kept, lest the sentence should be clandestine, and so illegal; but it is nothing but "præsentia clericorum," for it is "sententia episcopi," "the bishop's sentence," and the clerks' presence only; for μόνος ὁ ἐντόπιος ἐπίσκοπος, "the bishops alone might give sentence," in the causes of the inferior clergy, even by this canon itself, which is used for objection against the bishop's sole jurisdiction.

I know nothing now to hinder our process; for the bishop's jurisdiction is clearly left in his own hand, and the presbyters had no share in it, but by delegation and voluntary assumption. Now I proceed in the main question.

SECTION XLV.

So that the Government of the Church by Bishops was believed necessary.

WE have seen what episcopacy is in itself; now, from the same principles, let us see what it is to us; and, first, antiquity taught us it was simply necessary, even to the being and constitution of a church: that runs high, but we must follow our leaders. St. Ignatius[a] is express in this question: "Qui intra altare est, mundus est, quare et obtemperat episcopo et sacerdotibus. Qui vero foris est, hic is est, qui sine episcopo, sacerdote, et diacono, quicquam agit, et ejusmodi inquinatam habet conscientiam, et infideli deterior est:" "He that is within the altar, that is, within the communion of the church, he is pure, for he obeys the bishop and the priests. But he that is without, that is, does any thing without his bishop and the clergy, he hath a filthy conscience, and is worse than an infidel." "Necesse itaque est, quicquid facitis, ut sine episcopo nihil faciatis:" "It is necessary, that whatever ye do, ye be sure to do nothing without the bishop." "Quid enim aliud est episcopus," &c. "For what else is a bishop, but he that is greater than all power?" So that the obeying the bishop is the necessary condition of a christian and catholic communion; he that does not is worse than an infidel. The same also he affirms again:[b] "Quotquot enim Christi, sunt partium episcopi; qui vero ab illo declinant, et cum maledictis communionem amplectuntur, hi cum illis excidentur:" "All they that are on Christ's side, are on the bishop's side; but they that communicate with accursed schismatics, shall be cut off with them." If, then, we will be Christ's servants, we must be obedient and subordinate to the bishop. It is the condition of christianity. We are not christians else. So is the intimation of St. Ignatius.[c] As full and pertinent is the peremptory resolution of St. Cyprian, in that admirable epistle of his "ad Lapsos;" where, after he had spoken how Christ instituted the honour of episcopacy, in concrediting the keys to St. Peter and the other apostles, "Inde," saith he, "per temporum et successionum vices episcoporum ordinatio, et ecclesiæ ratio decurrit, ut ecclesia super episcopos constituatur, et omnis actus ecclesiæ per eosdem præpositos gubernetur:" "Hence is it, that by several successions of bishops the church is continued, so that the church hath its being or constitution by bishops, and every act of ecclesiastical regiment is to be disposed by them." "Cùm hoc itaque Divinâ lege fundatum sit, miror," &c. "Since, therefore, this is so established by the law of God, I wonder any man should question it," &c. And, therefore, as in all buildings, the foundation being gone, the fabric falls, so "if ye take away bishops, the church must ask a writing of divorce from God, for it can no longer be called a church." This account we have from St. Cyprian, and he reinforces again upon the same charge, in his epistle "ad Florentium Pupianum,"[d] where he makes a bishop to be ingredient into the definition of a church: "Ecclesia est plebs sacerdoti adunata, et pastori suo grex adhærens:" "The church is a flock adhering to its pastor, and a people united to their bishop:" for that so he means by "sacerdos," appears in the words subjoined: "Unde et scire debes, episcopum in ecclesiâ esse, et ecclesiam in episcopo, et si qui cum episcopo non sit, in ecclesiâ non esse, et frustra sibi blandiri eos, qui pacem cum sacerdotibus Dei non habentes obrepunt, et latenter apud quosdam communicare se credunt," &c. "As a bishop is in the church, so the church is in the bishop; and he that does not communicate with the bishop, is not in the church; and therefore, they vainly flatter themselves, that think their case fair and good, if they communicate in conventicles, and forsake their bishop."

And for this cause the holy primitives were so confident and zealous for a bishop, that they would rather expose themselves and all their tribes to a persecution, than to the greater misery, the want of bishops. Fulgentius tells an excellent story to this purpose.[e] When Frasamund, king of Byzac, in Africa, had made an edict that no more bishops should be consecrate, to this purpose, that the catholic faith might expire, (so he was sure it would, if this device were perfected,) "ut arescentibus truncis absque palmitibus omnes ecclesiæ desolarentur," the good bishops of the province met together in a council, and having considered of the command of the tyrant, "Sacra turba pontificum qui remanserant, communicato inter se consilio, definierunt adversus præceptum regis in omnibus locis celebrare ordinationes pontificum, cogitantes aut regis iracundiam, si qua forsan existeret, mitigandam, quo facilius ordinati in suis plebibus viverent, aut si persecutionis violentia nasceretur, coronandos etiam fidei confessione, quos dignos inveniebant promotione." It was full of bravery and christian sprite. "The bishops resolved, for all the edict against new ordination of bishops, to obey God rather than man, and to consecrate bishops in all places, hoping the king would be appeased; or if not, yet those whom they thought worthy of a mitre, were in a fair disposition to receive a crown of martyrdom." They did so. "Fit repente communis assumptio," and they all strove who should be first, and thought a blessing would outstrip the hindmost. They were sure they might go to heaven, though persecuted, under the conduct of a bishop; they knew without him the ordinary passage was obstructed.

Pius the First, bishop of Rome, and martyr, speaking of them that calumniate and disgrace their bishops,[f] endeavouring to make them infamous "They add," saith he, "evil to evil, and grow worse," "non intelligentes quòd ecclesia Dei in sacerdotibus consistit, et crescit in templum Dei:" "not considering that the church of God doth consist or is established in bishops, and grows up to a holy temple." To him I am most willing to add St. Jerome,[g] because he is often obtruded in defiance of the cause: "Ecclesiæ salus in summi sacerdoti dignitate pendet:" "The safety of the church depends upon the bishop's dignity."

SECTION XLVI.

For they are Schismatics that separate from their Bishop.

THE reason which St. Jerome gives, presses this business to a further particular. "For if an eminent dignity, and an unmatchable power, be no given to him," "tot efficientur schismata, quot sacerdotes." So that he makes bishops therefore necessary, because without them "the unity of a church cannot be preserved;" and we know that unity and being are of equal extent; and if the unity of the church depends upon the bishop, then where there is no bishop, no pretence to a church and therefore to separate from the bishop makes a man at least a schismatic. For unity, which the fathers press so often, they make to be dependent on the bishop. "Nihil sit in vobis quod possit vos dirimere, sed unimini episcopo, subjecti Deo per illum in Christo," saith St. Ignatius:[a] "Let nothing divide you, but be united to your bishop being subject to God in Christ through your bishop." And it is his congé to the people of Smyrna, to whom he writ in his epistle to Polycarpus,[b] "Optet vos semper valere in Deo nostro Jesu Christo, in quo manete per unitatem Dei et episcopi:" "Fare well in Christ Jesus, in whom remain by the unity of God and of the bishop." "Quantò vos beatiores judico, qui dependetis ab illo, (episcopo,) ut ecclesia à Domino Jesu et Dominus à Patre suo, ut omnia per unitatem consentiant:" "Blessed people are ye that depend upon your bishop, as the church on Christ, and Christ on God, that all things may consent in unity."

"Neque enim aliundè hæreses obortæ sunt, aut nata sunt schismata, quàm inde quòd sacerdoti Dei non obtemperatur, nec unus in ecclesiâ ad tempus sacerdos, et ad tempus judex vice Christi cogitatur:" "Hence come schisms, hence spring heresies, that the bishop is not obeyed, and admitted alone to be the high priest, alone to be the judge."[c] The same St. Cyprian repeats again;[d] and by it we may see his meaning clearer: "Qui vos audit, me audit," &c. "Inde enim hæreses et schismata obortæ sunt et oriuntur, dum episcopus, qui unus est et ecclesiæ præest, superbâ quorundam præsumptione contemnitur, et homo dignatione Dei honoratus, indignus hominibus judicatur." The pride and peevish haughtiness of some factious people that contemn their bishops, is the cause of all heresy and schism. And, therefore, it was so strictly forbidden, by the ancient canons, that any man should have any meetings, or erect an altar, out of the communion of his bishop,—that if any man proved delinquent in this particular, he was punished with the highest censures, as appears in the thirty-second canon of the apostles, in the sixth canon of the council of Gangra, the fifth canon of the council of Antioch, and the great council of Chalcedon,[e] all which I have before cited. The sum is this: the bishop is the band and ligature of the church's unity; and separation from the bishop is διχονοίας σύμβολον, as Theodoret's expression is; a "symbol of faction;" and he that separates, is a schismatic.

But how if the bishop himself be a heretic or schismatic? May we not then separate? Yes, if he be judged so by a synod of bishops; but then he is sure to be deposed too; and then in these cases no separation from a bishop. For till he be declared so, his communion is not to be forsaken by the subjects of his diocess, lest they, by so doing, become their judge's judge; and when he is declared so, no need of withdrawing from obedience to the bishop, for the heretic or schismatic must be no longer bishop. But let the case be what it will be, no separation from a bishop, "ut sic," can be lawful; and yet if there were a thousand cases, in which it were lawful to separate from a bishop, yet in no case is it lawful to separate from episcopacy; that is the quintessence and spirit of schism, and a direct overthrow to christianity, and a confronting of a Divine institution.

SECTION XLVII.

And Heretics.

BUT is it not also heresy? Aerius was condemned for heresy by the catholic church. The heresy from whence the Aerians were denominated was, "sermo furiosus magis quàm humanæ conditionis, et dicebat, 'Quid est episcopus ad presbyterum? nihil differt hic ab illo;'"[a] "A mad and unmanly heresy to say, that a bishop and a priest are all one." So Epiphanius: "Assumpsit autem ecclesia, et in toto mundo assensus factus est, antequam esset Aerius, et qui ab ipso appellantur Aeriani." And the good catholic father is so angry at the heretic Aerius, that he thinks his name was given him by Providence, and he is called Aerius, "aeriis spiritibus pravitatis;" for he was possessed with an unclean spirit: he could never else have been the inventor of such heretical pravity. St. Austin, also, reckons him in the accursed roll of heretics, and adds, at the conclusion of his catalogue, "that he is no catholic christian that assents to any of the foregoing doctrines;" amongst which this is one of the principal. Philastrius does as much for him.

But against this it will be objected, first, that heresies, in the primitive catalogues, are of a large extent: and every dissent from a public opinion was esteemed heresy. Secondly, Aerius was called heretic, for denying prayer for the dead. And why may he not be as blameless in equalling a bishop and a presbyter, as in that other, for which he also is condemned by Epiphanius and St. Austin. Thirdly, he was never condemned by any council; and how, then, can he be called heretic?

I answer,—That dissent from a public or a received opinion was never called heresy, unless the contrary truth was indeed a part of catholic doctrine. For the fathers, many of them, did so; as St. Austin from the millenary opinion; yet none ever reckoned them in the catalogues of heretics; but such things only set them down there, which were either directly opposite to catholic belief, though "in minoribus articulis," or to a holy life. Secondly;—It is true that Epiphanius and St. Austin reckon his denying prayer for the dead to be one of his own opinions, and heretical. But I cannot help it, if they did; let him and them agree it; they are able to answer for themselves. But yet they accused him also of Arianism; and shall we therefore say, that Arianism was no heresy, because the fathers called him heretic in one particular upon a wrong principle? We may as well say this as deny the other. Thirdly; He was not condemned by any council. No: for his heresy was ridiculous, and a scorn to all wise men, as Epiphanius observes; and it made no long continuance; neither had it any considerable party. But yet this is certain, that Epiphanius, and Philastrius, and St. Austin, called this opinion of Aerius a heresy, and against the catholic belief. And themselves affirm that the church did so; and then it would be considered, that it is but a sad employment to revive old heresies, and make them a piece of the new religion.

And yet after all this, if I mistake not, although Aerius himself was so inconsiderable as not to be worthy noting in a council, yet certainly the one-half his error is condemned for heresy in one of the four general councils, viz. the first council of Constantinople.[b] Αἱρετικοὺς δὲ λέγομεν, τούς τε πάλαι τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἀποκήρυχθέντας, καὶ τοὺς μετὰ ταῦτα ὑφ' ὑμῶν ἀναθεματισθέντας· "We call all them heretics, whom the ancient church hath condemned, and whom we shall anathematize." Will not Aerius come under one of these titles for a condemned heretic? Then see forward. Πρὸς δὲ τούτοις καὶ τοὺς τὴν πίστιν μὲν τὴν ὑγιῆ προσποιουμένους ὁμολογεῖν, ἀποσχίζοντας δὲ καὶ ἀντισυνάγοντας τοῖς κανονικοῖς ἡμῶν ἐπισκόποις. Here is enough for Aerius and all his hyperaspists, new and old; for the holy council condemns them "for heretics, who do indeed confess the true faith, but separate from their bishops, and make conventicles apart from his communion." Now this I the rather urge, because an act of parliament, made tenth of Elizabeth, does make this council, and the other three of Nice, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, the rule of judging heresies.

I end this particular with the saying of the council of Paris against the Acephali, (who were the branch of a crab-stock, and something like Aerius,) cited by Burchard:[c] "Nullâ ratione clerici aut sacerdotes habendi sunt, qui sub nullius episcopi disciplinâ et providentiâ gubernantur. Tales enim Acephalos, id est, sine capite, priscæ ecclesiæ consuetudo nuncupavit:" "They are, by no means, to be accounted clergymen, or priests, that will not be governed by a bishop. For such men the primitive church called ἀκεφάλους, that is, 'headless,' witless people."

This only. Acephali was the title of a sect, a formal heresy, and condemned by the ancient church, say the fathers of the council of Paris. Now if we can learn exactly what they were, it may, perhaps, be another conviction for the necessity of episcopal regiment. Nicephorus[d] can best inform us. "Eodem tempore, et Acephali, quorum dux Severus Antiochenus fuit," &c. "Severus of Antioch was the first broacher of this heresy." But why were they called "Acephali?" "id est, sine capite, quem sequuntur hæretici; nullus enim eorum reperitur auctor, à quo exorti sunt," saith Isidore. But this cannot be, for their head is known: Severus was the heresiarch. But then why are they called "Acephali?" Nicephorus[e] gives this reason, and, withal, a very particular account of their heresy: "Acephali autem ob eam causam dicti sunt, quod sub episcopis non fuerunt:" "They refused to live under bishops." Thence they had their name; what was their heresy? They denied the distinction of natures in Christ. That was one of their heresies; but they had more; for they were "trium capitulorum in Chalcedone impugnatores," saith Isidore;[f] "they opposed three canons of the council of Chalcedon." One we have heard; what their other heresies were we do not so well know; but by the canon of the council of Paris, and the intimation of their name, we are guided to the knowledge of a second: they refused to live under the government of a bishop. And this also was "impugnatio unius articuli in Chalcedone;" for the eighth canon of the council of Chalcedon commands, that the clergy should be under episcopal government. But these Acephali would not, they were anti-episcopal men; and, therefore, they were condemned heretics; condemned in the councils of Paris, of Seville, and of Chalcedon.

But the more particular account that Nicephorus gives of them, I will now insert, because it is of great use. "Proinde episcopis, et sacerdotibus apud eos defunctis, neque baptismus juxta solennem atque receptum ecclesiæ morem apud eos administratur, neque oblatio, aut res aliqua divina facta, ministeriumve ecclesiasticum, sicuti mos est, celebratum est. Communionem verò illi, à plurimo tempore asservatam habentes, feriis Paschalibus, in minutissimas incisam partes convenientibus ad se hominibus dederunt. Quo tempore quam quisqu voluisset placitam sibi sumebat potestatem. I propterea quod quilibet, quodcunque visum esse fidei insertum volebat, quamplurima defectorun atque hæreticorum turba exorta est." It is a stor worthy observation. "When any bishop die they would have no other consecrated in succession and, therefore, could have no more priests, whe any of them died." But how then did they to ba tize their children? Why, they were fain to mak shift, and do it without any church-solemnity. B how then did they for the holy sacrament?—f that could not be consecrated without a priest, an he not ordained without a bishop. True: but ther fore "they, while they had a bishop, got a grea deal of bread consecrated, and kept a long time and when Easter came, cut it into small bits, crumbs rather, to make it go the further, and gav it to their people." And must we do so too? Go forbid. But how did they when all that was gone for crumbs would not last always. The stor specifies it not, but yet I suppose they then got bishop for their necessity, to help them to som more priests, and some more crumbs; for I find, the council of Seville,[g] the fathers saying, "I gressus est ad nos quidam ex hæresi Acephaloru episcopus;" they had then, it seems, got a bisho but this they would seldom have—and never, b when their necessity drove them to it. But wa this all the inconvenience of the want of bishops No: "for every man," saith Nicephorus, "migh do what he list, and if he had a mind to it, migh put his fancy into the creed, and thence came i numerable troops of schismatics and heretics." S that this device was one simple heresy in the roo but it was forty heresies in the fruit and branches clearly proving, that want of bishops is the cause all schism and recreant opinions that are imaginabl

I sum this up with the saying of St. Clement the disciple of St. Peter, "Si autem vobis episcop non obedierint omnes presbyteri, &c. tribus, linguæ non obtemperaverint, non solùm infames, se extorres à regno Dei, et consortio fidelium, ac limitibus sancti Dei ecclesiæ alieni erunt:" "A priests, and clergymen, and people, and nations, an languages, that do not obey their bishop, shall b shut forth of the communion of holy church her and of heaven hereafter." It runs high, but I ca not help it; I do but translate Ruffinus, as he b fore translated St. Clement.

never have imagined. For, could they, to whom bishops were placed in a right and a true light,—they who believed and saw them to be the fathers of their souls, the guardian of their life and manners, (as King Edgar called St. Dunstan,) the guide of their consciences, the instruments and conveyances of all the blessings Heaven uses to pour upon us by the ministration of the holy gospel; would they, that thought their lives a cheap exchange for a free and open communion with a catholic bishop, would they have contested upon an airy title, and the imaginary privilege of an honour, which is far less than their spiritual dignity, but infinitely less than the burden and charge of the souls of all their diocess? Charity thinks nothing too much, and that love is but little that grudges at the good words a bishopric carries with it.

However, let us see whether titles of honour be either unfit in themselves to be given to bishops; or what the guise of christendom hath been in her spiritual heraldry.

1. St. Ignatius, in his epistle to the church of Smyrna, gives them this command: "Honora episcopum ut principem sacerdotum, imaginem Dei referentem:" "Honour the bishop as the image of God, as the prince of priests." Now since honour and excellency are terms of mutual relation, and all excellency that is in men and things, is but a ray of Divine excellency; so far as they participate of God, so far they are honourable. Since, then, the bishop carries the impress of God upon his forehead, and bears God's image, certainly this participation of such perfection makes him very honourable. And since "honor est in honorante," it is not enough that the bishop is honourable in himself, but it tells us our duty, we must honour him, we must do him honour; and, of all the honours in the world, that of words is the cheapest and the least.

St. Paul, speaking of the honour due to the prelates of the church, οἱ καλῶς προεστῶτες πρεσβύτεροι διπλῆς τιμῆς ἀξιούσθωσαν· "Let them be accounted worthy of double honour." And one of the honours that he there means, is a costly one, an honour of maintenance; the other must certainly be an honour of estimate, and that is cheapest. The council of Sardis, speaking of the several steps and capacities of promotion to the height of episcopacy, uses this expression: Καὶ αὐτὸς ἄξιος τῆς θείας ἱεροσύνης νομισθεὶς, τῆς μεγίστης ἀπολαῦσαι τιμῆς·[a] "He that shall be found worthy of so Divine a priesthood, let him be advanced to the highest honour." Ego procidens ad pedes ejus rogabam, excusans me, et declinans honorem cathedræ et potestatem,"[b] saith St. Clement, when St. Peter would have advanced him to the honour and power of the bishop's chair. But in the third epistle, speaking of the dignity of Aaron, the high priest, and then, by analogy, of the bishop, who, although he be a minister in the order of Melchisedeck, yet he hath also the honour of Aaron; "Omnis enim pontifex sacro chrismate perunctus, et in civitate constitutus, et in Scripturis sacris conditus, carus et pretiosus hominibus oppidò esse debet:" "Every high priest ordained in the city, (viz. a bishop,) ought forthwith to be dear and precious in the eyes of men."—"Quem quasi Christi locum tenentem, honorare omnes debent, eique servire, et obedientes ad salutem suam fideliter existere, scientes quòd sive honor, sive injuria quæ ei defertur, in Christum redundat, et à Christo in Deum:" "The bishop is Christ's vicegerent, and therefore he is to be obeyed, knowing that whether it be honour or injury that is done to the bishop, it is done to Christ, and so to God." And, indeed, what is the saying of our blessed Saviour himself? "He that despiseth you, despiseth me." If bishops be God's ministers, and in higher order than the rest, then, although all discountenance and disgrace done to the clergy reflect upon Christ, yet what is done to the bishop is far more, and then there is the same reason of the honour. And if so, then the question will prove but an odd one; even this, whether Christ be to be honoured or no, or depressed to the common estimate of vulgar people? for if the bishops be, then he is. This is the condition of the question.

2. Consider we, that all religions, and particularly all christianity, did give titles of honour to their high priests and bishops respectively. I shall not need to instance in the great honour of the priestly tribe among the Jews, and how highly honourable Aaron was in proportion. Prophets were called "lords," in Holy Scripture. "Art not thou 'my lord' Elijah?" said Obadiah, to the prophet. "Knowest thou not, that God will take 'thy lord' from thy head this day?" said the children in the prophets' schools. So it was then. And in the New Testament, we find a prophet honoured every where but in his own country. And to the apostles and presidents of churches, greater titles of honour given than was ever given to man by secular complacence and insinuation:—Angels, and governors, and fathers of our faith, and stars, lights of the world, the crown of the church, apostles of Jesus Christ, nay, God's,[c] to whom the word of God came; and of the compellation of apostles, particularly St. Jerome saith, that when St. Paul called himself the "apostle of Jesus Christ," it was as magnifically spoken, as if he had said, "Præfectus prætorio Augusti Cæsaris, magister exercitus Tiberii Imperatoris;"[d] and yet bishops are apostles, and so called in Scripture. I have proved that already.

Indeed, our blessed Saviour in the case of the two sons of Zebedee, forbad them to expect by virtue of their apostolate, any princely titles, in order to a kingdom, and an earthly principality. For that was it which the ambitious woman sought for her sons, viz. fair honour and dignity in an earthly kingdom; for such a kingdom they expected with their Messias. To this their expectation, our Saviour's answer is a direct antithesis; and that made the apostles to be angry at the two petitioners, as if they had meant to supplant the rest, and get the best preferment from them, to wit, in a temporal kingdom. "No," saith our blessed Saviour, "ye are all deceived." "The kings of the nations, indeed, do exercise authority, and are called εὐεργέται, benefactors:" so the word signifies, " gracious lords," so we read it; " but it shall not be so with you."[e] What shall not be so with them? shall not they exercise authority? " Who then is that faithful and wise steward, whom his Lord made ruler over his household?" Surely the apostles, or nobody. Had Christ authority? Most certainly. Then so had the apostles, for Christ gave them his, with a " sicut misit me Pater," &c. Well! the apostles might, and we know they did exercise authority. What then " shall not be so with them?" Shall not they be called εὐεργέται? Indeed, if St. Mark had taken that title upon him in Alexandria, the Ptolemies, whose honorary appellative that was, would have questioned him highly for it. But if we go to the sense of the word, the apostles might be " benefactors," and, therefore, might be called so. But what then? Might they not be called " gracious lords?" The word would have done no hurt, if it had not been an ensign of a secular principality.

For as for the word " lord," I know no more prohibition for that, than for being called rabbi, or master, or doctor, or father.[f] What shall we think now? May we not be called doctors? " God hath constituted in his church, pastors and doctors," saith St. Paul.[g] Therefore, we may be called so. But what of the other, the prohibition runs alike for all, as is evident in the several places of the gospels; and may no man be called master, or father? Let an answer be thought on for these, and the same will serve for the other also without any sensible error. It is not the word, it is the ambitious seeking of a temporal principality, as the issue of christianity, and an affix of the apostolate that Christ interdicted his apostles. And if we mark it, our blessed Saviour points it out himself. " The princes of the nations," κατακυριεύουσιν, " exercise authority over them, and are called benefactors;" οὐχ οὕτως ἔσται ἐν ὑμῖν: " It shall not be so with you." Not so? how? Not as the princes of the gentiles, for theirs is a temporal regiment, your apostolate must be spiritual. They rule as kings, you as fellow-servants; καὶ ὃς ἐὰν θέλῃ ἐν ὑμῖν εἶναι πρῶτος, ἔστω ὑμῶν δοῦλος· " He that will be first amongst you, let him be your minister, or servant;" it seems then among Christ's disciples there may be a superiority, when there is a minister or servant? But it must be ἐν τῷ διακονεῖν that this greatness doth consist, it must be in " doing the greatest service and ministration that the superiority consists." But more particularly, it must be ὥσπερ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. It must not be " as the princes of the gentiles," but it must be " as the Son of man;" so Christ says expressly.[h] And how was that? why, " he came to minister and to serve," and yet in the lowest act of his humility, the washing his disciples' feet, he told them, " Ye call me Lord, and Master, and ye say well, for so I am."[i] It may be " so with you." Nay, it must be " as the Son of man;" but then, the being called rabbi, or lord, nay, the being lord " in spirituali magisterio et regimine," " in a spiritual superintendency," and ὥσπερ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου may stand with the humility of the gospel, and office of ministration.

So that now I shall not need to take advantage of the word[k] κατακυριεύουσιν, which signifies to rule with more than a political regiment, even with an absolute and despotic, and is so used in Holy Scripture, viz. " in sequiorem partem." God gave authority to man over the creatures; κατακυριεύσατε is the word in the Septuagint;[l] and we know the power that man hath over beasts, is to kill, and to keep alive. And thus to our blessed Saviour, the power that God gave him over his enemies, is expressed by κατακυριεύειν· κατακυρίευε ἐν μέσῳ τῶν ἐχθρῶν σου.[m] And this we know how it must be exercised, ἐν ῥάβδῳ σιδηρᾷ with a rod of iron, ὡς σκεῦος κεραμέως συντρίψεις αὐτούς. He shall break them in pieces like a potter's vessel.[n] That is κατακυριεύειν, but " it shall not be so with you."

But let this be as true as it will. The answer needs no way to rely upon a criticism. It is clear that the form of regiment only is distinguished, not all regiment and authority taken away. Οὐχ οὕτως, but ὥσπερ ὁ υἱὸς, " Not as the kings of the gentiles, but as the Son of man;" so must your regiment be, for " sicut misit me pater," &c. " As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you." It must be a government, not for your impery, but for the service of the church. So that it is not for your advancement, but the public ministry, that you are put to rule over the household. And thus the fathers express the authority and regiment of bishops. " Qui vocatur ad episcopatum, non ad principatum vocatur, sed ad servitutem totius ecclesiæ," saith Origen.[o] And St. Jerome; " Episcopi sacerdotes se esse noverint, non dominos;" and yet St. Jerome himself, writing to St. Austin, calls him, " Domine verè sancte, et suspiciende papa." " Forma apostolica hæc est, dominatio interdicitur, indicitur ministratio."[p] It is no principality that the apostles have, but it is a ministry; a ministry in chief, the officers of which ministration must govern, and we must obey. They must govern, not in a temporal regiment by virtue of their episcopacy, but in a spiritual; not for honour to the rulers, so much as for benefit and service to the subject. So St. Austin, " Nomen est operis, non honoris, ut intelligat se non esse episcopum, qui præesse dilexerit, non prodesse."[q] And in the fourteenth chapter of the same book, " Qui imperant serviunt iis rebus quibus videntur imperare. Non enim dominandi cupidine imperant, sed officio consulendi; nec principandi superbiâ, sed providendi misericordiâ." And all this is intimated in the prophetical visions where the regiment of Christ is designed by the face of a man, and the empire of the world by beasts. The first is the regiment of a father, the second of a king. The first spiritual, the other secular. And of the fatherly authority it is that the prophet says, " Instead of fathers thou shalt have children, whom thou mayest make princes in all lands." This, say the fathers, is spoken of the apostles and their successors the bishops, who may be ἄρχοντες Ἐκκλησιῶν, "Princes or rulers of churches," not princes of kingdoms, by virtue or challenge of their apostolate. But if this ecclesiastical rule or chiefty be interdicted, I wonder how the presidents of the presbyters, the προεστῶτες in the reformed churches, will acquit themselves. How will their superiority be reconciled to the place, though it be but temporary? For is it a sin if it continues, and no sin if it lasts, but for a week? Or is it lawful to sin, and domineer, and lord it over their brethren for a week together? But suppose it were, what will they say that are perpetual dictators? Calvin was perpetual president,—and Beza, till Danæus came to Geneva, even for many years together. But beyond all this how can the presbytery, which is a fixed lasting body, rule and govern in causes spiritual and consistorial, and that over all princes, and ministers, and people, and that for ever? For is it a sin in episcopacy to do so, and not in the presbytery? If it be lawful here, then Christ did not interdict it to the apostles; for who will think that a presbytery shall have leave to domineer, and (as they call it now-a-days) to lord it over their brethren, when a college of apostles shall not be suffered to govern? But if the apostles may govern, then we are brought to a right understanding of our Saviour's saying to the sons of Zebedee, —and then also their successors, the bishops, may do the same.

If I had any further need of answer or escape, it were easy to pretend that this being a particular directory to the apostles, was to expire with their persons. So St. Cyprian intimates, "Apostoli pari fuêre consortio prædíti et honoris, et dignitatis:"[r] and indeed this may be concluding against the supremacy of St. Peter's successors, but will be no ways pertinent to impugn episcopal authority. For "inter se," they might be equal, and yet superior to the presbyters and the people.

Lastly: "It shall not be so with you:" so Christ said, "Non designando officium," but "sortem," "not their duty, but their lot;" intimating that their future condition should not be honorary, but full of trouble, not advanced, but persecuted. But I had rather insist on the first answer; in which I desire it be remembered that I said, seeking temporal principality to be forbidden the apostles, as an appendix to the office of an apostle. For, in other capacities, bishops are as receptive of honour and temporal principalities as other men. Bishops, "ut sic," are not secular princes, must not seek for it; but some secular princes may be bishops, as in Germany and in other places, to this day, they are. For it is as unlawful for a bishop to have any land, as to have a country, and a single acre is no more due to the order than a province; but both these may be conjunct in the same person, though still, by virtue of Christ's precept, the functions and capacities must be distinguished; according to the saying of Synesius, Συνάπτειν τὴν βασιλείαν τῇ ἱεροσύνῃ συγκλώθειν ἐστὶ τὰ ἀσύγκλωστα· "To confound and intermix the kingdom and the priesthood, is to join things incompossible and inconsistent;" inconsistent, I say, not in person, but absolutely discrepant in function.

3. Consider we, that St. Peter, when he speaks of the duteous subordination of Sarah to her husband Abraham, he propounds her as an example to all married women, in these words, "She obeyed Abraham, and called him lord:" why was this spoken to christian women, but that they should do so too? And is it imaginable that such an honourable compellation as Christ allows every woman to give to her husband, a mechanic, a hard-handed artisan, he would forbid to those eminent pillars of his church, those lights of christendom, whom he really endued with a plenitude of power for the regiment of the catholic church. "Credat Apella."

4. Pastor and father are as honourable titles as any. They are honourable in Scripture. "Honour thy father," &c. Thy father, in all senses. They are also made sacred by being the appellatives of kings and bishops, and that not only in secular addresses, but even in Holy Scripture, as is known. Add to this, ἡγούμενοι, προεστῶτες, and προϊστάμενοι, are used in Scripture for the prelates of the church,[s] and I am certain, that duke and captain, rulers and commanders, are but just the same in English that the other are in Greek, and the least of these is as much as κύριος, or lord. And then if we consider that since Christ excited a spiritual regiment, and used words of secular honour to express it, as in the instances above, although Christ did interdict a secular principality, yet he forbad not a secular title; he used many himself.

5. The voice of the spouse, the holy church, hath always expressed their honourable estimate, in reverential compilations and epithets of honour, to their bishops, and have taught us so to do. Bishops were called "principes ecclesiarum," "princes of the churches." I had occasion to instance it, in the question of jurisdiction. Indeed the third council of Carthage forbad the bishop of Carthage to be called "princeps sacerdotum," or "summus sacerdos," or "aliquid hujusmodi," but only "primæ sedis episcopus." I know not what their meaning was, unless they would dictate a lesson of humility to their primate, that he might remember the principality not to be so much in his person as in the see, for he might be "called bishop of the prime see." But whatsoever fancy they had at Carthage, I am sure it was a guise of christendom, not to speak of bishops "sine præfatione honoris," "but with honourable mention." Τῷ Κυρίῳ μακαριοτάτῳ, "To our most blessed Lord:" so the letters were superscribed to Julius, bishop of Rome, from some of his brethren; in Sozomen.[t] Let no man speak untruths of me μηδὲ τῶν κυρίων τῶν ἐπισκόπων, "Nor of my lords the bishops," said St. Gregory Nazianzen.[u] The synodical book of the council of Constantinople is inscribed, "Dominis reverendissimis ac piissimis fratribus ac collegis, Damaso, Ambrosio," &c. "To our most reverend lords, and holy brethren," &c.[x] And the council of Illyricum, sending their synodal letters to the bishops of Asia, by Bishop Elpidius, "Hæc pluribus," say they, "persequi non est visum, quòd miserimus unum ex omnibus, Dominum, et collegam nostrum Elpidium, qui cognosceret, esset ne sicut dictum fuerat à Domino, et collegâ nostro Eustathio:"[y] "Our lord and brother Elpidius." "Our lord and brother Eustathius." The oration in the council of Epaunum begins thus: "Quod præcipientibus tantis Dominis meis ministerium proferendi sermonis assumo," &c. "The prolocutor took that office on him, at the command of so many great lords the bishops." When the church of Spain became catholic, and abjured the Arian heresy, King Recaredus, in the third council of Toledo, made a speech to the bishops, "Non incognitum reor esse vobis, reverendissimi sacerdotes," &c. "Non credimus vestram latere sanctitatem," &c. "Vestra cognovit beatitudo," &c. "Venerandi patres," &c. And these often, "Your holiness," "your blessedness," "most reverend," "venerable fathers:" those were the addresses the king made to the fathers of the synod. Thus it was when Spain grew catholic, but not such a speech to be found in all the Arian records. They amongst them used but little reverence to their bishops. But the instances of this kind are innumerable.[z] Nothing more ordinary in antiquity, than to speak of bishops with the titles of κύριοι τιμιώτατοι, θεοφιλέστατοι, ἁγιότατοι, "Domine verè sancte, et suspiciende papa." So St. Jerome, a presbyter, to St. Austin, a bishop.[a] "Secundùm enim honorum vocabula, quæ jam ecclesiæ usus obtinuit, episcopatus presbyteriâ major est," saith St. Austin,[b] "Episcopacy is greater than the office and dignity of a presbyter, according to the titles of honour which the custom of the church hath introduced." But I shall sum up these particulars in a total, which is thus expressed by St. Chrysostom; "Hæretici à diabolo honorum vocabula episcopis non dare didicerunt:" "Heretics have learned of the devil not to give due titles of honour to bishops."[c] The good patriarch was surely angry when he said so. For my own part, I am confident that my lords the bishops do so undervalue any fastuous or pompous title, that were not the duty of their people in it, they would as easily reject them, as it is our duty piously to use them. But if they still desire appellatives of honour, we must give them; they are their due; if they desire them not, they deserve them much more. So that either for their humility, or, however, for their works' sake, we must "highly honour them that have the rule over us;" it is the precept of St. Paul;[d] and St. Cyprian, observing how curious our blessed Saviour was, that he might give honour to the priests of the Jews, even then when they were reeking in their malice, hot as the fire of hell; he did it to teach us a duty. "Docuit enim sacerdotes veros legitime et plene honorari, dum circa falsos sacerdotes ipse talis extitit."[e] It is the argument he uses to procure a full honour to the bishop.

To these I add; if sitting in a throne even above the seat of elders be a title of a great dignity, then we have it confirmed by the voice of all antiquity, calling the bishop's chair a throne, and the investiture of a bishop, in his church, an enthronization. "Quando inthronizantur propter communem utilitatem episcopi," &c. saith Pope Anterus, in his decretal epistle to the bishops of Bœtica and Toledo. "Enthroning" is the primitive word for "the consecration" of a bishop. "Sedes in episcoporum ecclesiis excelsæ constitutæ et præparatæ, ut thronus speculationem et potestatem judicandi à Domino sibi datam materiam docent," saith Urban.[f] And St. Ignatius to his deacon Hero, πιστεύω γὰρ εἰς τὸν πατέρα τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ—ὅτι δείξει μοι ὁ Θεὸς Ἥρωνα ἐπὶ τοῦ θρόνου μου, "I trust that the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ will show to me Hero, sitting upon my throne."[g]

The sum of all is this. Bishops, if they must be at all, most certainly must be beloved; it is our duties, and their work deserves it. St. Paul was as dear to the Galatians as their eyes, and it is true eternally, "Formosi pedes evangelizantium," "the feet of the preachers of the gospel are beauteous," and then much more of the chief. "Ideo ista prætulimus, carissimi, ut intelligatis potestatem episcoporum vestrorum, in eisque Deum veneremini, et eos ut animas vestras diligatis, ut quibus illi non communicant, non communicetis," &c.[h] Now, love to our superiors is ever honourable; for it is more than "amicitia," that is amongst peers; but love to our betters, is reverence, obedience, and high estimate. And if we have the one, the dispute about the other would be a mere impertinence. I end this with the saying of St. Ignatius; "Et vos decet non contemnere ætatem episcopi, sed juxta Dei Patris arbitrium omnem illi impertiri reverentiam:"[i] "It is the will of God the Father, that we should give all reverence, honour, or veneration to our bishops."

SECTION XLIX.

And trusted with Affairs of Secular Interest.

WELL! However things are now, it was otherwise in the old religion; for no honour was thought too great for them, whom God had honoured with so great degrees of approximation to himself in power and authority. But then also they went further. For they thought whom God had intrusted with their souls, they might, with an equal confidence, trust with their personal actions and employments of greatest trust.

For it was great consideration, that they who were "antistites religionis," the doctors, and great dictators of faith and conscience, should be the composers of those affairs, in whose determination a Divine wisdom, and the interests of conscience, and the authority of religion, were the best ingredients.

But it is worth observing how the church and the commonwealth did actions contrary to each other, in pursuance of their several interests. The commonwealth still enabled bishops to take cognizance of causes, and the confidence of their own people would be sure to carry them thither, where they hoped for fair issue, upon such good grounds as they might fairly expect from the bishops' abilities, authority, and religion: but, on the other side, the church did as much decline them as she could, and made sanctions against it, so far as she might, without taking from themselves all opportunities both of doing good to their people, and engaging the secular arm to their own assistance. But this we shall see, by consideration of particulars,

1. It was not, "in naturâ rei," unlawful for bishops to receive an office of secular employment. St. Paul's tent-making was as much against the calling of an apostle, as sitting in a secular tribunal is against the office of a bishop. And it is hard, if we will not allow that to the conveniences of a republic, which must be indulged to a private, personal necessity. But we have not St. Paul's example only, but his rule too, according to primitive exposition. "Dare any of you having a matter before another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints? If then ye have judgment of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church."[a]—Who are they? The clergy, I am sure, now-a-days. But St. Ambrose also thought that to be his meaning seriously: "Let the ministers of the church be the judges."[b] For by "least esteemed" he could not mean the most ignorant of the laity; they would most certainly have done very strange justice, especially in such causes which they understand not. No, but set them to judge, who by their office are servants, and ministers of all; and those are the clergy, who, as St. Paul's expression is, "Preach not themselves, but Jesus to be the Lord, and themselves your servants, for Jesus' sake." "Meliùs dicit, apud Dei ministros agere causam." Yea, but St. Paul's expression seems to exclude the governors of the church from intermeddling. "Is there not one wise man among you, that is able to judge between his brethren?" Why brethren, if bishops and priests were to be the judges; they are fathers. The objection is not worth the noting, but only for St. Ambrose's answer to it. "Ideò autem fratrem judicem eligendum dicit, qui adhuc rector ecclesiæ illorum non erat ordinatus." "St. Paul used the word 'brethren,' for as yet a bishop was not ordained amongst them of that church;" intimating that the bishop was to be the man, though till then, "in subsidium," a prudent christian man might be employed.[c]

2. The church did always forbid to clergymen a voluntary assumption of engagements in "rebus sæculi." So the sixth canon of the apostles, ἐπίσκοπος, ἢ πρεσβυτέρος, ἢ διάκονος κοσμικας φροντίδας μὴ ἀναλαμβανέτω· εἰ δὲ, καθαιρείσθω. "A bishop, and a priest, and a deacon, must not assume, or take on himself worldly cares: if he does, let him be deposed."[d] Here the prohibition is general, "No worldly cares." Not domestic. But how, if they come on him by Divine imposition, or accident? That is nothing, if he does not assume them; that is, by his voluntary act acquire his own trouble. So that if his secular employment be an act of obedience, indeed it is trouble to him, but no sin. But if he seeks it for itself, it is ambition. In this sense, also, must the following canon be understood. Κληρικὸς ἐγγύας δίδους καθαιρείσθω. "A clerk must not be a tutor or guardian," viz. of secular trust, that is, must not seek a diversion from his employment by voluntary tutorship.

3. The church, also, forbade all secular negociation for base ends, not precisely the employment itself, but the illness of the intention; and this, indeed, she expressly forbids in her canons. "Pervenit ad sanctam synodum, quòd quidam qui in clero sunt allecti, propter lucra turpia, conductores alienarum possessionum fiant, et sæcularia negotia sub curâ suâ suscipiant, Dei quidem ministerium parvipendentes, sæcularium verò discurrentes domos, et, propter avaritiam, patrimoniorum sollicitudinem sumentes."[e] Clergymen were farmers of lands, and did take upon them secular employment for covetous designs, and with neglect of the church. These are the things the council complained of, and, therefore, according to this exigence, the following sanction is to be understood. "Decrevit itaque hoc sanctum magnumque concilium, nullum deinceps, non episcopum, non clericum, vel monachum, aut possessiones conducere, aut negotiis secularibus se immiscere;" "No bishop, no clergyman, no monk, must farm grounds, nor engage himself in secular business." What, in none? No, none. "Præter pupillorum, si forte leges imponant inexcusabilem curam, aut civitatis episcopus ecclesiasticarum rerum sollicitudinem habere præcipiat, aut orphanorum, et viduarum earum quæ sine ullâ defensione sunt, ac personarum quæ maximè ecclesiastico indigent adjutorio, et propter timorem Domini causa deposcat." This canon will do right to the question.

All secular affairs and bargains, either for covetousness, or with considerable disturbance of church offices, are to be avoided. For a clergyman must not be covetous, much less for covetise must he neglect his cure. To this purpose is that of the second council of Arles, "Clericus, turpis lucri gratiâ, aliquod genus negotiationis non exerceat."[f] But not here nor at Chalcedon is the prohibition absolute, nor declaratory of an inconsistence and incapacity; for, for all this, the bishop or clerk may do any office that is "in piâ curiâ." He may undertake "the supra-vision of widows and orphans." And, although he be forbid by the canon of the apostles to be "a guardian of pupils," yet it is expounded here, by this canon of Chalcedon, for a voluntary seeking; it is forbidden by the apostles, but here it is permitted only with "si fortè leges imponant," "if the law or authority commands him," then he may undertake it. That is, if either the emperor commands him, or if the bishop permits him, then it is lawful. But without such command or license, it was against the canon of the apostles. And, therefore, St. Cyprian did himself severely punish Geminius Faustinus, one of the priests of Carthage, for undertaking the executorship of the testament of Geminius Victor:[g] he had no leave of his bishop so to do, and for him, of his own head, to undertake that which would be an avocation of him from his office, did in St. Cyprian's consistory deserve a censure. 3. By this canon of Chalcedon, any clerk may be the œconomus, or steward of a church, and dispense her revenue, if the bishop command him. 4. He may undertake the patronage or assistance of any distressed person that needs the church's aid. From hence it is evident, that all secular employment did not "hoc ipso" avocate a clergyman from his necessary office and duty; for some secular employments are permitted him; "All causes of piety, of charity, all occurrences concerning the revenues of the church, and nothing for covetousness, but any thing in obedience," any thing, I mean, of the forenamed instances. Nay, the affairs of church revenues, and dispensation of ecclesiastical patrimony, was imposed on the bishop by the canons apostolical,[h] and then considering how many possessions were deposited first at the apostles' feet, and afterwards in the bishops' hands, we may quickly perceive that a case may occur, in which something else may be done by the bishop and his clergy besides prayer and preaching. Αἱ χῆραι μὴ ἀμελείσθωσαν· μετὰ τὸν Κύριον σὺ αὐτῶν φροντιστὴς ἔσω, saith Ignatius to St. Polycarp of Smyrna. "Let not the widows be neglected; after God, do thou take care of them."—"Qui locupletes sunt, et volunt, pro arbitrio quisque suo quod libitum est, contribuit; et quod collectum est apud præsidem deponitur, atque is inde opitulatur orphanis, et viduis, iisque qui vel morbo vel aliâ de causâ egent: tum iis qui vincti sunt, et peregrè advenientibus hospitibus: et, ut uno verbo dicam, omnium indigentium curator est:" "All the collects and offerings of faithful people are deposited with the bishop, and thence he dispenses for the relief of the widows and orphans, thence he provides for travellers, and, in one word, he takes care of all indigent and necessitous people."[i] So it was in Justin Martyr's time, and all this, a man would think, required a considerable portion of his time, besides his studies, and prayer, and preaching.

This was also done even in the apostles' times, for first they had the provision of all the goods and persons of the cœnobium of the church at Jerusalem. This they themselves administered, till a complaint arose which might have proved a scandal; then they chose seven men, men full of the Holy Ghost, men that were priests, for they were of the seventy disciples, saith Epiphanius; and such men as preached and baptized, so St. Stephen and St. Philip; therefore, to be sure, they were clergymen, and yet they left their preaching for a time, at least abated of the height of the employment; for therefore the apostles appointed them, that "themselves might not leave the word of God and serve tables;" plainly implying that such men who were to serve these tables, must leave the ministry of the word in some sense or degree; and yet they chose presbyters, and no harm neither, and for a while themselves had the employment. I say there was no harm done by this temporary office to their priestly function and employment; for to me it is considerable. If the calling of a presbyter does not take up the whole man, then what inconvenience, though his employment be mixed with secular allay? But if it does take up the whole man, then it is not safe for any presbyter ever to become a bishop, which is a dignity of a far greater burden, and requires more than a man's all, if all was required to the function of a presbyter. But I proceed.

4. The church prohibiting secular employment to bishops and clerks, do prohibit it only "in gradu impedimenti officii clericalis;" and therefore when the offices are supplied by any of the order, it is never prohibited, but that the personal abilities of any man may be employed for the fairest advantages either of church or commonwealth. And, therefore, it is observable that the canons provide that the church be not destitute, not that such a particular clerk should there officiate. Thus the council of Arles decreed, "Ut presbyteri, sicut hactenus factum est, indiscretè per diversa non mittantur loca; ne fortè propter eorum absentiam, et animarum pericula, et ecclesiarum, in quibus constituti sunt, negligantur officia."[k] So that here we see, 1. That it had been usual to send priests on embassies, "sicut hactenus factum est." 2. The canon forbids the indiscreet or promiscuous doing of it; not that men of great ability and choice be not employed, but that there be discretion or discerning in the choice of the men, viz. that such men be chosen whose particular worth did, by advancing the legation, make compensation for absence from their churches; and then I am sure there was no indiscretion in the embassy, "quoad hoc" at least; for the ordinary offices of the church might be dispensed by men of even abilities, but the extraordinary affairs of both states require men of a heightened apprehension. 3. The canon only took care, that "the cure of the souls of a parish be not relinquished;" for so is the title of the canon, "Ne presbyteri causâ legationis per diversa mittantur loca, curâ animarum relictâ." But then if the cure be supplied by delegation, the fears of the canon are prevented.

In pursuance of this consideration, the church forbade clergymen to receive honour, or secular preferment; and so it is expressed where the prohibition is made. It is in the council of Chalcedon.[l] "Qui semel in clero deputati sunt, aut monachorum vitam expetiverunt, statuimus neque ad militiam, neque ad dignitatem aliquam venire mundanam." That is the inhibition; but the canon subjoins a temper; "Aut hoc tentantes et non agentes pœnitentiam quo minùs redeant ad hoc quod propter Deum primitus elegerunt, anathematizari;" "they must not turn soldiers, or enter upon any worldly dignity to make them leave their function, which, for the honour of God, they have first chosen:" for then, it seems, he that took on him military honours, or secular prefectures, or consular dignity, could not officiate in holy orders, but must renounce them to assume the other: it was in obstruction of this abuse, that the canon directed its prohibition, viz. in this sense clearly, that a clerk must not so take on him secular offices, as to make him "redire in sæculum," having put his hand to the plough, to look back, to change his profession, or to relinquish the church, and make her become a widow. The case of St. Matthew and St. Peter distinguish and clear this business. "Ecce reliquimus omnia," was the profession of their clerical office. St. Matthew could not return to his trade of publican at all, for that would have taken him from his apostolate. But St. Peter might, and did return to his nets, for all his "reliqui omnia." Plainly telling us, that a secular calling, a continued fixed attendance on a business of the world, is an impediment to the clerical office and ministration, but not a temporary employment or secession.

5. The canons of the church do as much forbid the cares of household, as the cares of public employment to bishops. So the fourth council of Carthage decrees. "Ut episcopus nullam rei familiaris curam ad se revocet, sed lectioni, et orationi, et verbi Dei prædicationi tantummodò vacet."[m] Now if this canon be confronted with that saying of St. Paul, "He that provides not for them of his own household, is worse than an infidel," it will easily inform us of the church's intention. For they must provide, saith St. Paul, but yet so provide, as not to hinder their employment, or else they transgress the canon of the council; but this caveat may be as well entered, and observed in things political as œconomical.

Thus far we have seen what the church hath done in pursuance of her own interest; and that was, that she might with sanctity, and without distraction, tend her grand employment; but yet many cases did occur in which she did canonically permit an alienation of employment, and revocation of some persons from an assiduity of ecclesiastical attendance, as in the case of the seven set over the widows, and of St. Peter, and St. Paul, and all the apostles, and the canon of Chalcedon.

Now, let us see how the commonwealth also pursued her interest; and, because she found bishops men of religion and great trust, and confident abilities, there was no reason that the commonwealth should be disserved in the promotion of able men to a bishop's throne. Who would have made recompence to the emperor for depriving him of Ambrose his prefect, if episcopal promotion had made him incapable of serving his prince in any great negociation? It was a remarkable passage in Ignatius, τὸν ουν ἐπίσκοπον——ὡς αὐτὸν τὸν Κύριον δεῖ προσβλέπειν, τῷ Κυρίῳ προεστῶτα· ὁρατικὸν δὲ ἄνδρα καὶ ὀξὺν τοῖς ἔργοις βασιλεῦσι δεῖ παρεστάναι, καὶ μὴ παρεστάναι ἀνθρώποις νωθροῖς.[n] "As our Lord is to be observed, so also must we observe the bishop, because he assists and serves the Lord. And wise men, and of great understanding, must serve kings, for he must not be served with men of small parts." Here either Ignatius commends bishops to the service of kings, or else propounds them as the fittest men in the world to do them service. For, if only men of great abilities are fit to serve kings, surely as great abilities are required to enable a man for the service of God in so peculiar manner of approximation. He, then, that is fit to be a bishop, is most certainly fit for the service of his king. This is the sense of Ignatius's discourse.

For, consider; Christianity might be suspected for a design; and, if the church should choose the best and most pregnant understandings for her employment, and then these men become incapable of aiding the republic, the promotion of these men would be an injury to those princes, whose affairs would need support. The interest of the subjects also is considerable. For we find by experience, that no authority is so full of regiment, and will so finely force obedience, as that which is seated in the conscience; and, therefore, Numa Pompilius made his laws, and imposed them with a face of religious solemnity. For the people are stronger than any one governor, and were they not awed by religion, would quickly "miscere sacra profanis," jumble heaven and earth into a miscellany; and, therefore, not only in the sanction of laws, but in the execution of them, the "Antistites Religionis" are the most competent instruments; and this was not only in all religions that ever were, and in ours, ever till now, but even now we should quickly find it, were but our bishops in that veneration and esteem that by the law of God they ought, and that actually they were in the calenture of primitive devotion, and that the doctors of religion were ever even amongst the most barbarous and untaught pagans.

Upon the confidence of these advantages, both the emperors themselves, when they first became christian, allowed appeals from secular tribunals to the bishop's consistory,[o] even in causes of secular interest, and the people would choose to have their difficulties there ended, whence they expected the issues of justice and religion; I say, this was done as soon as ever the emperors were christian. Before this time, bishops and priests, to be sure, could not be employed in state affairs, they were odious for their christianity; and then, no wonder if the church forbade secular employment in meaner offices, the attendance on which could by no means make recompence for the least avocation of them from their church employment. So that it was not only the avocation, but the sordidness of the employment.

that was prohibited the clergy in the constitutions of Holy Church. But as soon as ever their employment might be such as to make compensation for a temporary secession, neither church nor state did then prohibit it; and that was as soon as ever the princes were christian, for then immediately the bishops were employed in honorary negociations. It was evident in the case of St. Ambrose; for the church of Milan had him for their bishop, and the emperor had him one of his prefects, and the people their judge in causes of secular cognizance. For when he was chosen bishop, the emperor, who was present at the election, cried out, "Gratias tibi ago, Domine, quoniam huic viro ego quidem commisi corpora; tu autem animas, et meam electionem ostendisti tuæ justitiæ convenire."[p] So that he was bishop and governor of Milan at the same time; and therefore, by reason of both these offices, St. Austin was forced to attend a good while before he could find him at leisure. "Non enim quærere ab eo poteram quod volebat sicut volebam, secludentibus me ab ejus aure atque ore catervis negotiosorum hominum, quorum infirmitatibus serviebat."[q] And it was his own condition too, when he came to sit in the chair of Hippo, "Non permittor at quod volo vacare, ante meridiem; post meridiem, occupationibus hominum teneor."[r] And again; Et homines quidem causas suas sæculares apud nos finire cupientes, quando eis necessarii fuerimus, sic nos sanctos, et Dei servos appellant, ut negotia terræ suæ peragant. Aliquando et agamus negotium salutis nostræ et salutis ipsorum, non de auro, non de argento, non de fundis, et pecoribus, pro quibus rebus quotidiè submisso capite salutamur, ut dissensiones hominum terminemus."[s] "It was almost the business of every day to him, to judge causes concerning gold and silver, cattle and glebe, and all appurtenances of this life." This St. Austin would not have done, if it had not been lawful, so we are to suppose in charity; but yet this we are sure of, St. Austin thought it not only lawful, but a part of his duty; "quibus nos molestiis idem affixit apostolus:"[t] and that by the authority, not of himself, but of him that spake within him, even the Holy Ghost. So he.

Thus also it was usual for princes, in the primitive church, to send bishops their ambassadors. Constans, the emperor, sent two bishops chosen out of the council of Sardis, together with Salianus the great master of his army, to Constantius. St. Chrysostom was sent ambassador to Gainas.[u] Maruthus, the bishop of Mesopotamia, was sent ambassador from the emperor to Isdigerdes, the king of Persia.[x] St. Ambrose, from Valentinian the younger, to the tyrant Maximus.[y] Dorotheus was a bishop and a chamberlain to the emperor.[z] Many more examples there are of the concurrence of the episcopal office, and a secular dignity or employment.[a] Now then consider: the church did not, might not, challenge any secular honour or employment, by virtue of her ecclesiastical dignity precisely. 2. The church might not be ambitious or indagative of such employment. 3. The church's interest, abstractedly considered, was not promoted by such employment; but where there was no greater way of compensation, was interrupted and depressed. 4. The church, though in some cases she was allowed to make secession, yet might not relinquish her own charge to intervene in another's aid. 5. The church did by no means suffer her clerks to undertake any low secular employment, much more did she forbid all sordid ends and covetous designs. 6. The bishop or his clerks might ever do any action of piety, though of secular burden. Clerks were never forbidden to read grammar or philosophy to youth to be masters of schools or hospitals; they might reconcile their neighbours that were fallen out about a personal trespass or real action; and yet since now-a-days a clergyman's employment and capacity is bounded within his pulpit or reading desk, or his study of divinity at most, these that I have reckoned are as verily secular as any thing and yet no law of christendom ever prohibited any of these, or any of the like nature, to the clergy nor any thing that is ingenuous, that is fit for a scholar, that requires either fineness of parts, or great learning, or overruling authority, or exemplary piety. 7. Clergymen might do any thing that was imposed on them by their superiors. 8. The bishops and priests were men of great ability and surest confidence for determinations of justice, in which religion was ever the strongest binder. And therefore the princes and people sometimes forced the bishops from their own interest to serve the commonwealth, and in it they served themselves directly, and by consequence too; the church had not only a sustentation from the secular arm, but an addition of honour and secular advantages; and all this warranted by precedent of Scripture, and the practice of the primitive church, and particularly of men whom all succeeding ages have put into the calendar of saints. So that it would be considered that all this while it is the king's interest and the people's that is pleaded, when we assert a capacity to the bishops to undertake charges of public trust. It is no addition to the calling of bishops. It serves the king, it assists the republic; and, in such a plethory and almost a surfeit of clergymen, as this age is supplied with, it can be no disservice to the church, whose daily offices may be plentifully supplied by vicars; and for the temporary avocation of some few, abundant recompence is made to the church, which is not at all injured by becoming an occasion of endearing the church to those whose aid she is.

There is an admirable epistle written by Petrus Blesensis,[b] in the name of the archbishop of Canterbury, to Pope Alexander III., in the defence of the bishops of Ely, Winchester, and Norwich, that attended the court upon service of the king. "Non est novum," saith he, "quòd regum consiliis intersint episcopi. Sicut enim honestate, et sapientiâ cæteros antecedunt, sic expeditiores et efficaciores in reipublicæ administratione censentur. Quia, sicut scriptum est, 'minùs salubriter disponitur regnum, quod non regitur consilio sapientum.' In quo notatur, eos consiliis regum debere assistere, qui sciant et velint, et possint patientibus compati, paci terræ ac populi saluti prospicere, erudire ad justitiam reges, imminentibus occursare periculis, vitæque maturioris exemplis informare subditos et quâdam auctoritate potestativâ præsumptionem malignantium cohibere:" "It is no new thing for bishops to be counsellors to princes," saith he; their wisdom and piety, that enables them for a bishop, proclaims them fit instruments to promote the public tranquillity of the commonwealth. They know how to comply with oppressed people, to advance designs of peace and public security: it is their office to instruct the king to righteousness, by their sanctity to be a rule to the court, and to diffuse their exemplary piety over the body of the kingdom, to mix influences of religion with designs of state, to make them have as much of the dove as of the serpent, and, by the advantage of their religious authority, to restrain the malignity of accursed people, in whom any image of a God or of religion is remaining." He proceeds in the discourse, and brings the examples of Samuel, Isaiah, Elisha, Jehoiada, Zacharias, who were priests and prophets respectively, and yet employed in princes' courts and councils of kings; and adds this: "Unum noveritis, quia nisi familiares, et consiliarii regis essent episcopi, supra dorsum ecclesiæ hodie fabricarent peccatores. et immaniter ac intolerabiliter opprimeret clerum præsumptio laicalis." That is most true: if the church had not the advantage of additional honorary employments, "the ploughers would plough upon the church's back, and make long furrows." The whole epistle is worth transcribing, but I shall content myself with this summary of the advantages, which are acquired both to policy and religion by the employment of bishops in princes' courts: "Istis mediantibus, mansuescit circa simplices judiciarius rigor, admittitur clamor pauperum, ecclesiarum dignitas erigitur, relevatur pauperum indigentia, firmatur in clero libertas, pax in populis, in monasteriis quies, justitia liberè exercetur, superbia opprimitur, augetur laicorum devotio, religio fovetur, diriguntur judicia," &c. "When pious bishops are employed in princes' councils, then the rigour of the laws is abated, equity introduced, the cry of the poor is heard, their necessities are made known, the liberties of the church are conserved, the peace of kingdoms laboured for, pride is depressed, religion increaseth, the devotion of the laity multiplies, and tribunals are made just, and incorrupt, and merciful." Thus far Petrus Blesensis. These are the effects, which though perhaps they do not always fall out, yet these things may in expectation of reason be looked for from the clergy; their principles and calling promise all this. "Et quia in ecclesiâ magis lex est, ubi Dominus legis timetur, meliùs dicit apud Dei ministros agere causam. Faciliùs enim Dei timore sententiam legis veram promunt;" saith St. Ambrose;[c] and, therefore, certainly the fairest reason in the world that they be employed. But if personal defailance be thought reasonable to disemploy the whole calling, then neither clergy nor laity should ever serve a prince.

And now we are easily driven into an understanding of that saying of St. Paul, "No man that warreth, entangleth himself with the affairs of this life."[d] For although this be spoken of all christian people, and concerns the laity in their proportion, as much as the clergy, yet, nor one nor the other is interdicted any thing that is not a direct hinderance to their own precise duty of christianity. And such things must be pared away from the fringes of the laity, as well as the long robe of the clergy. But if we should consider how little we have now left for the employment of a bishop, I am afraid a bishop would scarce seem to be a necessary function, so far would it be from being hindered by the collateral intervening of a lay judicature. I need not instance in any particulars; for if the judging matters and questions of religion be not left alone to them, they may well be put into a temporal employment, to preserve them from suspicion of doing nothing.

I have now done with this; only entreating this to be considered: Is not the king "fons utriusque jurisdictionis?" In all the senses of common law, and external compulsory, he is. But if so, then why may not the king as well make clergy-judges, as lay-delegates? For, to be sure, if there be an incapacity in the clergy of meddling with secular affairs, there is the same at least in the laity of meddling with church affairs. For if the clergy be above the affairs of the world, then the laity are under the affairs of the church; or else, if the clergy be incapable of lay-business because it is of a different and disparate nature from the church, does not the same argument exclude the laity from intervening in church affairs? For the church differs no more from the commonwealth, than the commonwealth differs from the church. And now, after all this, suppose a king should command a bishop to go on embassy to a foreign prince, to be a commissioner in a treaty of pacification, if the bishop refuse, did he do the duty of a subject? If yea, I wonder what subjection that is which a bishop owes to his prince, when he shall not be bound to obey him in any thing but the saying and doing of his office, to which he is obliged, whether the prince commands him yea or no. But if no, then the bishop was tied to go, and then the calling makes him no way incapable of such employment, for no man can be bound to do a sin.

bishops to a temporary absence? And what remedy was there for that? For the church is not to be left destitute, that is agreed on by all the canons. They must not be like the Sicilian bishops whom Petrus Blesensis complains of, that attended the court, and never visited their churches, or took care either of the cure of souls, or of the church possessions. What then must be done? The bishops, in such cases, may give delegation of their power and offices to others, though now-a-days they are complained of for their care: I say, for their care; for if they may intervene in secular affairs, they may sometimes be absent, and then they must delegate their power, or leave the church without a curate. But for this matter the account need not be long. For since I have proved that the whole diocess is in "cura episcopali," and for all of it he is responsive to God Almighty, and yet that instant necessity and the public act of christendom hath ratified it, that bishops have delegated to presbyters so many parts of the bishop's charge, as there are parishes in his diocess, αὐθεντία, which is pretended for delegation of episcopal charge, is no less than the act of all christendom. For it is evident, at first, presbyters had no distinct cure at all, but were, in common, assistant to the bishop, and were his emissaries for the gaining souls in city or suburbs: but when the bishops divided parishes, and fixed the presbyters upon a cure, so many parishes as they distinguished, so many delegations they made; and these we all believe to be good both in law and conscience: for the bishop "per omnes divinos ordines propriæ hierarchiæ exercet mysteria," saith St. Denis;[a] he does not do the offices of his order by himself only, but by others also, for all the inferior orders do so operate, as by them he does his proper offices.

But besides this grand act of the bishops first, and then of all christendom in consent, we have fair precedent in St. Paul; for he made delegation of a power to the church of Corinth to excommunicate the incestuous person. It was a plain delegation, for he commanded them to do it, and gave them his "own spirit," that is, "his own authority;" and indeed, without it, I scarce find how the delinquent should have been delivered over to Satan in the sense of the apostolic church; that is, "to be buffeted," for that was a miraculous appendix of power apostolic.

When St. Paul sent for Timothy from Ephesus, he sent Tychicus to be his vicar. "Do thy diligence to come unto me shortly, for Demas hath forsaken me, &c. and Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus."[b] Here was an express delegation of the power of jurisdiction to Tychicus, who for the time was curate to St. Timothy. Epaphroditus for a while attended on St. Paul, although he was then bishop of Philippi; and either St. Paul or Epaphroditus appointed one in substitution, or the church was relinquished, for he was most certainly non-resident.[c]

Thus also we find that St. Ignatius did delegate his power to the presbyters, in his voyage to his martyrdom: "Presbyteri, pascite gregem qui inter vos est, donec Deus designaverit eum, qui principatum in vobis habiturus est:" "Ye presbyters, do you feed the flock till God shall design you a bishop."[d] Till then, therefore, it was but a delegate power; it could not else have expired in the presence of a superior. To this purpose is that of the Laodicean council: "Non oportet presbyteros ante ingressum episcopi ingredi, et sedere in tribunalibus, nisi fortè aut ægrotet episcopus, aut in peregrinis eum esse constiterit:" "Presbyters must not sit in consistory without the bishop, unless the bishop be sick or absent."[e] So that it seems, what the bishop does when he is in his church, that may be committed to others in his absence. And to this purpose St. Cyprian sent a plain commission to his presbyters: "Fretus ergo dilectione et religione vestrâ, his literis hortor et mando, ut vos, vice meâ, fungamini circa gerenda, ea, quæ administratio religiosa deposcit:" "I entreat and command you, that you do my office in the administration of the affairs of the church."[f] And another time he put Herculanus and Caldonius, two of his suffragans, together with Rogatianus and Numidicus, two priests, in substitution for the excommunicating Fœlicissimus and four more, "cùm ego vos pro me vicarios miserim."[g] So it was just in the case of Hierocles, bishop of Alexandria, and Melitius his surrogate, in Epiphanius; "Videbatur autem et Melitius præminere, &c. ut qui secundum locum habebat post Petrum in archiepiscopatu, velut adjuvandi ejus gratiâ sub ipso existens, et sub ipso ecclesiastica curans:" "He did church offices under and for Hierocles."[h] And I could never find any canon or personal declamatory clause, in any council or primitive father, against a bishop's giving more or less of his jurisdiction by way of delegation.

Hitherto also may be referred, that when the goods of all the church, which then were of a perplexed and busy dispensation, were all in the bishop's hand, as part of the episcopal function, yet that part of the bishop's office, the bishop, by order of the council of Chalcedon, might delegate to a steward, provided he were a clergyman. And upon this intimation and decree of Chalcedon, the fathers in the council of Seville forbade any laymen to be stewards for the church: "Elegimus ut unusquisque nostrûm, secundum Chalcedonensium patrum decreta, ex proprio clero œconomum sibi constituat."[i] But the reason extends the canon further: "Indecorum est enim laicum vicarium esse episcopi, et sæculares in ecclesiâ judicare." Vicars of bishops the canon allows, only forbids laymen to be vicars. "In uno enim eodemque officio non decet dispar professio, quod etiam in divinâ lege prohibetur," &c. "In one and the same office, the law of God forbids to join men of disparate capacities." Then this would be considered. For the canon pretends Scripture, precepts of fathers, and tradition of antiquity, for its sanction.

SECTION LI.

But they were ever Clergymen, for there never were any Lay-Elders in any Church-office heard of in the Church.

For although antiquity approves of episcopal delegations of their power to their vicars, yet these vicars and delegates must be priests, at least. Melitius was a bishop, and yet the chancellor of Hierocles, patriarch of Alexandria; so were Herculanus and Caldonius to St. Cyprian. But they never delegated to any layman any part of their episcopal power precisely. Of their lay power, or the cognizance of secular causes of the people, I find one delegation made to some gentleman of the laity, by Sylvanus, bishop of Troas:[a] when his clerks grew covetous, he cured their itch of gold by trusting men of another profession, so to shame them into justice and contempt of money. "Si quis autem episcopus posthâc ecclesiasticam rem laicali procuratione administrandam elegerit, non solùm à Christo de rebus pauperum judicatur reus, sed etiam et concilio manebit obnoxius:" "If any bishop shall hereafter concredit any church affairs to lay administration, he shall be responsible to Christ, and in danger of the council."[b] But the thing was of more ancient constitution; for in that epistle which goes under the name of St. Clement, which is most certainly very ancient, whoever was the author of it, it is decreed, "Si qui ex fatribus negotia habent inter se, apud cognitores sæculi non judicentur, sed apud presbyteros ecclesiæ, quicquid illud est, dirimatur:" "If christian people have causes of difference and judicial contestation, let it be ended before the priests." For so St. Clement expounds "presbyteros" in the same epistle, reckoning it as a part of the sacred hierarchy.[c] To this or some parallel constitution St. Jerome relates, saying, that "priests from the beginning were appointed judges of causes." He expounds his meaning to be of such priests as were also bishops; and they were judges "ab initio," "from the beginning," saith St. Jerome.[d] So that the saying of the father may no way prejudge the bishop's authority, but it excludes the assistance of laymen from their consistories. "Presbyter" and "episcopus" were instead of one word to St. Jerome, but they are always clergy with him and all men else.

But for the main question, St. Ambrose did represent it to Valentinian, the emperor, with confidence and humility, "In causâ fidei, ecclesiastici alicujus ordinis eum judicare debere, qui nec munere impar sit, nec jure dissimilis."[e] The whole epistle is admirable to this purpose; "Sacerdotes de sacerdotibus judicare," "that clergymen only must judge of clergy causes;" and this St. Ambrose there calls "judicium episcopale," "the bishop's judicature." "Si tractandum est, tractare in ecclesiâ didici, quod majores fecerunt mei. Si conferendum de fide, sacerdotum debet esse ista collatio, sicut factum est sub Constantino, augustæ memoriæ principe." So that both "matters of faith and of ecclesiastical order are to be handled in the church, and that by bishops," and that "sub imperatore," by permission and authority of the prince: for so it was in Nice, under Constantine. Thus far St. Ambrose.

St. Athanasius reports, that Hosius, bishop of Corduba, president in the Nicene council, said it was the abomination of desolation that a layman shall be judge "in ecclesiasticis judiciis," "in church causes."[f] And Leontius calls church affairs, "res alienas à laicis," "things of another court, of a distinct cognizance from the laity."[g] To these add the council of Venice, for it is very considerable in this question: "Clerico, nisi ex permissu episcopi sui, servorum suorum sæcularia judicia adire non liceat. Sed si fortasse episcopi sui judicium cœperit habere suspectum, aut ipsi de proprietate aliquâ adversus ipsum episcopum fuerit nata contentio, aliorum episcoporum audientiam, non sæcularium potestatum debebit ambire. Aliter, à communione habeatur alienus:" "Clergymen, without delegation from their bishop, may not hear the causes of their servants, but the bishop, unless the bishop be appealed from; then other bishops must hear the cause, but no lay judges by any means."[h]

These sanctions of holy church it pleased the emperor to ratify by an imperial edict, for so Justinian commanded, that in causes ecclesiastical, secular judges should have no interest: "Sed sanctissimus episcopus secundum sacras regulas causæ finem imponat:" "The bishop according to the sacred canons must be the sole judge of church matters."[i] I end this with the decretal of St. Gregory, one of the four doctors of the church: "Cavendum est à fraternitate vestrâ, ne sæcularibus viris, atque non sub regulâ nostrâ degentibus, res ecclesiasticæ committantur:" "Heed must be taken, that matters ecclesiastical be not any ways concredited to secular persons."[k] But of this I have twice spoken already.—(Sect 36. and Sect. 41.)

The thing is so evident, that it is next to impudence to say, that, in antiquity, laymen were parties and assessors in the consistory of the church. It was against their faith, it was against their practice; and those few pigmy objections out of Tertullian,[l] St. Ambrose,[m] and St. Austin,[n] using the word "seniores," or elders, sometimes for priests, as being the Latin for the Greek πρεσβύτεροι, sometimes for a secular magistrate or alderman, (for I think St. Austin did so in his third book against Cresconius,) are but like sophisms to prove that two and two are not four; for to pretend such slight, airy imaginations, against the constant, known, open catholic practice and doctrine of the church, and history of all ages, is as if a man should go to fight an imperial army with a single bulrush. They are not worth further considering.

But this is: that in this question of lay elders, the modern Arians and Acephali do wholly mistake their own advantages: for whatsoever they object, out of antiquity, for the white and watery colours of lay-elders, is either a very misprision of their allegations, or else clearly abused in the use of them. For now-a-days they are only used to exclude and drive forth episcopacy; but then they misallege antiquity; for the men with whose heifers they would fain plough in this question, were themselves bishops for the most part, and he that was not, would fain have been; it is known so of Tertullian; and, therefore, most certainly, if they had spoken of lay-judges in church-matters, (which they never dreamed of,) yet meant them not so as to exclude episcopacy, and if not, then the pretended allegations can do no service in the present question.

I am only to clear this pretence from a place of Scripture totally misunderstood, and then it cannot have any colour from any αὐθεντα, either Divine or human, but that lay-judges of causes ecclesiastical, as they are unheard of in antiquity, so they are neither named in Scripture, nor receive from thence any instructions for their deportment in their imaginary office; and, therefore, may be remanded to the place from whence they came, even the lake of Gehenna, and so to the place of the nearest denomination. The objection is from St. Paul, οἱ καλῶς προεστῶτες πρεσβύτεροι, &c. "Let the elders that rule well, be accounted worthy of double honour, especially they that labour in the word and doctrine:" "especially they,"[o]—therefore, all elders do not so. Here are two sorts of elders, preaching ministers, and elders not preachers. Therefore lay-elders, and yet all are governors.

But why, therefore, lay-elders? Why may there not be divers church-officers, and yet but one or two of them the preacher? "Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach," saith St. Paul; and yet the commission of "baptizate" was as large as "prædicate," and why, then, might not another say, "Christ sent me not to preach, but to baptize?" that is, in St. Paul's sense, not so much to do one as to do the other, and if he left the ordinary ministration of baptism, and betook himself to the ordinary office of preaching, then, to be sure, some minister must be the ordinary baptizer, and so not the preacher: for if he might be both ordinarily, why was not St. Paul both? For though their power was common to all of the same order, yet the execution and dispensation of the ministries was according to several gifts, and that of prophecy or preaching was not dispensed to all in so considerable a measure, but that some of them might be destined to the ordinary execution of other offices, and yet because the gift of prophecy was the greatest, so also was the office; and, therefore, the sense of the words is this, "That all presbyters must be honoured, but especially they that prophesy, doing that office with an ordinary execution and ministry." So no lay-elders yet. Add to this, that it is also plain, that all the clergy did not preach. Valerius, bishop of Hippo, could not well skill in the Latin tongue, being a Greek born, and yet a godly bishop; and St. Austin, his presbyter, preached for him. The same case might occur in the apostles' times. For then was a concourse of all nations to the christian synaxes, especially in all great imperial cities and metropolitans, as Rome, Antioch, Jerusalem, Cæsarea, and the like. Now all could not speak with tongues, neither could all prophesy; they were particular gifts, given severally, to several men, appointed to minister in church offices. Some prophesied, some interpreted; and, therefore, it is an ignorant fancy to think that he must needs be a laic, whosoever, in the ages apostolical, was not a preacher.

2. None of the fathers ever expounded this place of lay-elders, so that we have a traditive interpretation of it in prejudice to the pretence of our new office.

3. The word presbyter is never used, in the New Testament, for a lay-man, if a church-officer be intended. If it be said, it is used so here, that is the question, and must not be brought to prove itself.

4. The presbyter that is here spoken of, must be maintained by ecclesiastical revenue, for so St. Paul expounds "honour" in the next verse. "Presbyters that rule well, must be honoured," &c. "For it is written, thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn." But now the patrons of this new devise are not so greedy of their lay-bishops as to be at charges with them, they will rather let them stand alone on their own rotten legs, and so perish, than fix him upon this place with their hands in their purses. But it had been most fitting for them to have kept him, being he is of their own begetting.

5. This place speaks not of divers persons, but divers parts of the pastoral office, προΐστασθαι, and κοπιᾶν ἐν λόγῳ· "To rule and to labour in the word." Just as if the expression had been "in materiâ politicâ." All good counsellors of state are worthy of double honour, especially them that, disregarding their own private, aim at the public good. This implies not two sorts of counsellors, but two parts of a counsellor's worth and quality. Judges that do righteousness are worthy of double honour, especially if they right the cause of orphans and widows; and yet there are no righteous judges that refuse to do both.

6. All ministers of holy church did not preach, at least not frequently. The seven that were ἐπὶ τῶν χήρων τεταγμένοι, "set over the widows," were presbyters, but yet they were forced to leave the constant ministration of the word to attend that employment, as I showed formerly;[p] and thus it was in descent too, for ὁ πρεσβύτερος ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ, οὐ προσομιλεῖ, said Socrates;[q] "A presbyter does not preach in Alexandria, the bishop only did it." And then the allegation is easily understood. For "labouring in the word" does not signify only making homilies or exhortations to the people, but whether it be by word, or writing, or travelling from place to place, still, the greater the sedulity of the person is, and difficulty of the labour, the greater increment of honour is to be given him. So that here are no lay-elders; for all the presbyters St. Paul speaks of, are to be honoured, but especially those who take extraordinary pains in propagating the gospel. For though all preach, (suppose that,) yet all do not κοπιᾷν, take such great pains in it as is intimated in κοπιῶντες. For κοπιᾶν is "to take bodily labour and travel, 'usque ad lassitudinem,'" so Budæus renders it. And so, it is likely, St. Paul here means. Honour the good presbyters, but especially them that travel for disseminating the gospel. And the word is often so used in Scripture. St. Paul, ἀλλὰ περισσότερον πάντων ἐκοπίασα· "I have travelled in the word more than they all." Not that St. Paul preached more than all the apostles, for, most certainly, they made it their business as well as he. But he travelled further and more than they all, for the spreading it. And thus it is said of the good women that travelled with the apostles, for supply of the necessities of their diet and household offices, "they laboured much in the Lord."[r] Κοπιᾷν is the word for them too. So it is said of Persis, of Mary, of Tryphæna, of Tryphosa. And since those women were κοπιώσαι ἐν Κυρίῳ, that travelled with the apostolical men and evangelists, the men also travelled too, and preached, and, therefore, were κοπιῶντες ἐν λόγῳ, that is, "travellers in the word." "We ought, therefore, to receive such," saith St. John,[s] intimating a particular reception of them, as being towards us of a peculiar merit. So that the sense of St. Paul may be this also, all the rulers of the church, that is, all bishops, apostles, and apostolic men, are to be honoured, but especially them, who, besides the former ruling, are also "travellers in the word," or evangelists.

[o] 1 Tim. v. 17.

7. We are furnished with answer enough to infatuate this pretence for lay-elders, from the common draught of the new discipline. For they have some that preach only, and some that rule and preach too, and yet neither of them the lay-elders, viz. their pastors and doctors.

8. Since it is pretended by themselves, in the question of episcopacy, that "presbyter" and "episcopus" is all one, and this very thing confidently obtruded, in defiance of episcopacy, why may not "presbyteri," in this place, signify "bishops?" And then either this must be lay-bishops, as well as lay-presbyters, or else this place is to none of their purposes.

9. If both these offices of ruling and preaching may be conjunct in one person, then there is no necessity of distinguishing the officers by the several employments, since one man may do both. But if these offices cannot be conjunct, then no bishops must preach, nor no preachers be of the consistory, (take which government you list,) for if they be, then the officer being united in one person, the inference of the distinct officer, the lay-elder, is impertinent. For the meaning of St. Paul would be nothing but this:—All church-rulers must be honoured, especially for their preaching.—For if the offices may be united in one person, (as it is evident they may,) then this may be comprehended within the other, and only be a vital part, and of peculiar excellency. And, indeed, so it is, according to the exposition of St. Chrysostom and Primasius: Τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ καλῶς προεστάναι μηδενὸς φειδεσθαι τῆς τῶν προβάτων κηδεμονίας ἕνεκεν· "They rule well, that spare nothing for the care of the flock." So that this is the general charge, and preaching is the particular. For the work, in general, they are to receive double honour, but this of preaching, as then preaching was, had a particular excellency, and a plastic power to form men into christianity, especially it being then attested with miracles.

But the new office of a lay-elder, I confess, I cannot comprehend in any reasonable proportion, his person, his quality, his office, his authority, his subordination, his commission, hath made so many divisions and new emergent questions; and they none of them all, asserted, either by Scripture or antiquity, that if I had a mind to leave the way of God, and of the catholic church, and run in pursuit of this meteor, I might quickly be amused; but should find nothing certain, but a certainty of being misguided. Therefore, if not for conscience' sake, yet for prudence, "bonum est esse hîc," it is good to remain in the fold of Christ, under the guard and supravision of those shepherds Christ hath appointed, and which his sheep have always followed.

For I consider this one thing to be enough to determine the question. "My sheep," saith our blessed Saviour, "hear my voice; if a stranger or a thief come, him they will not hear." Clearly thus. That Christ's sheep hear not the voice of a stranger, nor will they follow him, and, therefore, those shepherds whom the church hath followed in all ages, are no strangers, but shepherds or pastors of Christ's appointing, or else Christ hath had no sheep; for if he hath, then bishops are the shepherds, for them they have ever followed. I end with that golden rule of Vincentius Lirinensis: "Magnoperè curandum est ut id teneamus, quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est. Hoc est enim verè, proprièque catholicum."[t] For, certainly, the catholic belief of the church against Arius, Eunomius, Macedonius, Apollinaris, and, the worst of heretics, the Cataphrygians, was never more truly received "of all and always, and every where," than is the government of the church by bishops. "Annunciare ergo christianis catholicis, præter id quod acceperunt, nunquam licuit, nunquam licet, nunquam licebit:" "It never was, is, nor ever shall be, lawful to teach christian people any new thing than what they have received" from a primitive fountain, and is descended in the stream of catholic uninterrupted succession.[u]

I only add, that the church hath insinuated it to be the duty of all good catholic christians to pray for bishops, and as the case now stands, for episcopacy itself: for there was never any church-liturgy but said litanies for their king, and for their bishop.

AN APOLOGY

FOR

AUTHORIZED AND SET FORMS OF LITURGY,

AGAINST

THE PRETENCE OF THE SPIRIT.

1. FOR EXTEMPORE PRAYER,

AND

2. FORMS OF PRIVATE COMPOSITION.

TO HIS MOST SACRED MAJESTY.

It is now two years, since part of these ensuing papers, like the public issue of the people, imperfect and undressed, were exposed, without a parent to protect them, or any hand to nourish them. But since your most sacred Majesty was pleased graciously to look upon them, they are grown into a tract, and have an ambition (like the gourd of Jonas) to dwell in the eye of the sun, from whence they received life and increment. And although because some violence hath been done to the profession of the doctrine of this treatise, it may seem to be "verbum in tempore non suo," and like the offering cypress to a conqueror, or palms to a broken army; yet I hope I shall the less need an apology, because it is certain, he does really disserve no just and noble interest, that serves that of the Spirit, and religion. And because the sufferings of a king and a confessor are the great demonstration to all the world, that truth is as dear to your Majesty, as the jewels of your diadem, and that your conscience is tender as a pricked eye; I shall pretend this only to alleviate the inconvenience of an unseasonable address, that I present your Majesty with a humble persecuted truth, of the same constitution with that condition whereby you are become most dear to God, as having upon you the characterism of the sons of God, bearing in your sacred person the marks of the Lord Jesus, who is your elder Brother, the King of sufferings, and the Prince of the catholic church. But I consider that kings, and their great councils, and rulers ecclesiastical, have a special obligation for the defence of liturgies; because they having the greatest offices, have the greatest needs of auxiliaries from heaven, which are best procured by the public spirit, the spirit of government and supplication. And since the first, the best, and most solemn liturgies and set forms of prayer, were made by the best and greatest princes, by Moses, by David, and the son of David; your Majesty may be pleased to observe such a proportion of circumstances in my laying this "Apology for Liturgy" at your feet, that possibly I may the easier obtain a pardon for my great boldness; which if I shall hope for, in all other contingencies I shall represent myself a person indifferent whether I live or die, so I may by either, serve God, and God's church, and God's vicegerent, in the capacity of,

Great Sir,

Your Majesty's most humble,

And most obedient subject and servant,

JER. TAYLOR.

THE

TO

FOR

AUTHORIZED AND SET FORMS OF LITURGY.

When judges were instead of kings, and Hophni and Phinehas were among the priests, every man did what was right in his own eyes, but few did what was pleasing in the eyes of the Lord; and the event was this, God put on his fierce anger against them, and stirred up and armed the enemies of their country and religion, and they prevailed very far, against the expectation and confidence of them, who thought the goodness of their cause would have borne out the iniquity of their persons, and that the impiety of their adversaries would have disabled them even from being made God's scourges and instruments of punishing his own people: the sadness of the event proved the vanity of their hopes; for that which was the instrument of their worship, the determination of their religious addresses, the place where God did meet his people, from which the priests spake to God, and God gave his oracles, that they dishonourably and miserably lost; the ark of the Lord was taken, the impious priests, who made the sacrifice of the Lord to become an abomination to the people, were slain with the sword of the Philistines; old Eli lost his life, and the wife of Phinehas died with sorrow and the miscarriages of childbirth, crying out, "That the glory was departed from Israel, because the ark of God was taken."

2. In these things we also have been but too like the sons of Israel; for when we sinned as greatly, we also have groaned under as great and sad a calamity. For we have not only felt the evils of an intestine war, but God hath smitten us in our spirit, and laid the scene of his judgments especially in religion; he hath snuffed our lamp so near, that it is almost extinguished, and the sacred fire was put into a hole of the earth, even then when we were forced to light those tapers that stood upon our altars, that by this sad truth better than by the old ceremony, we might prove our succession to those holy men, who were constrained to sing hymns to Christ, in dark places and retirements.

3. But I delight not to observe the correspondencies of such sad accidents, which as they may happen upon divers causes, or may be forced violently upon the strength of fancy, or driven on by jealousy, and the too fond openings of troubled hearts and afflicted spirits; so they do but help to vex the offending part, and relieve the afflicted but with a fantastic and groundless comfort: I will, therefore, deny leave to my own affections to ease themselves by complaining of others; I shall only crave leave that I may remember Jerusalem, and call to mind the pleasures of the temple, the order of her services, the beauty of her buildings, the sweetness of her songs, the decency of her ministrations, the assiduity and economy of her priests and Levites, the daily sacrifice, and that eternal fire of devotion that went not out by day nor by night; these were the pleasures of our peace, and there is a remanent felicity in the very memory of those spiritual delights which we then enjoyed, as antepasts of heaven, and consignations to an immortality of joys. And it may be so again, when it shall please God, who hath the hearts of all princes in his hand, and turneth them as the rivers of waters; and when men will consider the invaluable loss that is consequent, and the danger of sin that is appendant to the destroying such forms of discipline and devotion in which God was purely worshipped, and the church was edified, and the people instructed to great degrees of piety, knowledge, and devotion.

4. And such is the liturgy of the church of England. I shall not need to enumerate the advantages of liturgy in general, though it be certain that some liturgy or other is most necessary in public addresses, that so we may imitate the perpetual practice of all settled churches since christianity, or ever since Moses's law or the Jewish church came to have a settled foot, and any rest in the land of Canaan. 2. That we may follow the example and obey the precept of our blessed Saviour, who appointed a set form of devotion; and certainly they that profess enmity against all liturgy, can in no sense obey the precept given by him, who gave command, "When ye pray, say, Our Father." 3. That all that come may know the condition of public communion, their religion, and manner of address to God Almighty. 4. That the truth of the proposition, the piety of the desires, and the honesty of the petitions, the simplicity of our purposes, and the justice of our designs may be secured beforehand; because whatsoever is not of faith, is sin, and it is impossible that we should pray to God in the extempore prayers of the priest, by any faith, but unreasonable, unwarranted, insecure, and implicit. 5. That there may be union of hearts, and spirits, and tongues. 6. That there may be a public symbol of communion in our prayers, which are the best instruments of endearing us to God, and to one another; Καὶ αὐτὴ ἡ προσευχὴ μὴ ἔχουσα τοὺς συμφωνοῦντας ἀνενδεεστέρα πολλῷ ἑαυτῆς. "Private prayer, not assisted with the concord and unity of a public spirit, is weaker and less effectual," saith St. Basil. 7. That the ministers less learned, may have provisions of devotions made for them. 8. That the more learned may have no occasion of ostentation ministered to them, lest their best actions, their prayers, be turned into sin. 9. That extravagant levities, and secret impieties, be prevented. 10. That the offices ecclesiastical may the better secure the articles of religion. 11. That they may edify the people, by being repositories of holy and necessary truths ready formed out of their needs, and described in their books of daily use; for that was one of the advices of the apostle,[a] "teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs." 12. That men by the intervening of authority, may be engaged to certain devotions. 13. That not only the duty, but the very form of its ministration may be honoured by the countenance of authority, and not be exposed to contempt, by reason of the insufficiency of its external warrant. 14. That the assignation of such offices, and appropriating them to the ministry of certain persons, may be a cancel to secure the enclosures of the clerical orders from the usurpings and invasions of pretending and unhallowed spirits. 15. That indetermination of the office may not introduce indifferency, nor indifferency lead in a freer liberty, or liberty degenerate into licentiousness, or licentiousness into folly and vanity; and these come sometimes attended with secular designs, lest these be cursed with the immission of a peevish spirit upon our priests, and that spirit be a teacher of lies, and these lies become the basis of impious theorems, which are certainly attended with ungodly lives; and then either atheism or antichristianism may come, according as shall happen in the conjunction of time and other circumstances; for this would be a sad climax, a ladder upon which are no angels ascending or descending, because the degrees lead to darkness and misery.

5. But that which is of special concernment is this, that the liturgy of the church of England hath advantages so many and so considerable, as not only to raise itself above the devotions of other churches, but to endear the affections of good people to be in love with liturgy in general.

6. For to the churches of the Roman communion we can say, that ours is reformed; to the reformed churches we can say, that ours is orderly and decent; for we were freed from the impositions and lasting errors of a tyrannical spirit, and yet from the extravagancies of a popular spirit too: our reformation was done without tumult, and yet we saw it necessary to reform; we were zealous to cast away the old errors, but our zeal was balanced with consideration and the results of authority: not like women or children when they are affrighted with fire in their clothes; we shaked off the coal, indeed, but not our garments, lest we should have exposed our churches to that nakedness, which the excellent men of our sister-churches complained to be among themselves.

7. And, indeed, it is no small advantage to our liturgy, that it was the offspring of all that authority which was to prescribe in matters of religion. The king and the priest, which are the "antistites religionis," and the preservers of both the tables joined in this work, and the people, as it was represented in parliament, were advised withal, in authorizing the form after much deliberation; for the rule "Quod spectat ad omnes, ab omnibus tractari debet," was here observed with strictness, and then, as it had the advantages of discourse, so also of authorities,—its reason from one, and its sanction from the other, that it might be both reasonable, and sacred, and free, not only from the indiscretions, but (which is very considerable) from the scandal of popularity.

8. And in this, I cannot but observe the great wisdom and mercy of God in directing the contrivers of the liturgy, with the spirit of zeal and prudence, to allay the furies and heats of the first affrightment. For when men are in danger of burning, so they leap from the flames, they consider not whither, but whence: and the first reflections of a crooked tree are not to straightness, but to a contrary incurvation: yet it pleased the Spirit of God so to temper and direct their spirits, that in the first liturgy of King Edward, they did rather retain something that needed further consideration, than reject any thing that was certainly pious and holy; and in the second liturgy, that they might also thoroughly reform, they did rather cast out something that might, with good profit, have remained, than not satisfy the world of their zeal to reform, of their charity in declining every thing that was offensive, and the clearness of their light in discerning every semblance of error or suspicion in the Roman church.

9. The truth is, although they framed the liturgy with the greatest consideration that could be, by all the united wisdom of this church and state; yet, as if prophetically to avoid their being charged in after-ages with a "crepusculum" of religion, a dark, "twilight," imperfect reformation, they joined to their own star all the shining tapers of the other reformed churches, calling for the advice of the most eminently learned and zealous reformers in other kingdoms, that the light of all together might show them a clear path to walk in. And this their care produced some change; for upon the consultation, the first form of King Edward's service book was approved with the exception of a very few clauses, which upon that occasion were reviewed and expunged, till it came to that second form and modest beauty it was in the edition of MDLII. and which Gilbertus, a German, approved of as a transcript of the ancient and primitive forms.

10. It was necessary for them to stay somewhere. Christendom was not only reformed, but divided too, and every division would, to all ages, have called for some alteration, or else have disliked it publicly: and since all that cast off the Roman yoke thought they had title enough to be called reformed, it was hard to have pleased all the private interests and peevishness of men that called themselves friends, and therefore that only in which the church of Rome had prevaricated against the word of God, or innovated against apostolical tradition, all that was pared away. But at last she fixed, and strove no further to please the people, who never could be satisfied.

11. The painter that exposed his work to the censure of the common passengers, resolving to mend it as long as any man could find fault, at last had brought the eyes to the ears, and the ears to the neck, and for his excuse subscribed, "Hanc populus fecit:" but his "hanc ego," that which he made by the rules of art, and the advice of men skilled in the same mystery, was the better piece. The church of England should have pared away all the canon of the communion, if she had mended her piece at the prescription of the Zuinglians; and all her office of baptism, if she had mended by the rules of the Anabaptists; and kept up altars still by the example of the Lutherans; and not have retained decency by the good will of the Calvinists; and now another new light is sprung up, she should have no liturgy at all, but the worship of God be left to the managing of chance, and indeliberation, and a petulant fancy.

12. It began early to discover its inconvenience; for when certain zealous persons fled to Frankfort, to avoid the funeral piles kindled by the Roman bishops in Queen Mary's time, as if they had not enemies enough abroad, they fell foul with one another, and the quarrel was about the common prayer-book; and some of them made their appeal to the judgment of Mr. Calvin, whom they prepossessed with strange representments, and troubled phantasms concerning it: and yet the worst he said upon the provocation of those prejudices was, that even its vanities were tolerable. "Tolerabiles ineptias" was the unhandsome epithet he gave to some things, which he was forced to dislike by his over earnest complying with the brethren of Frankfort.

13. Well! upon this, the wisdom of this church and state saw it necessary to fix, where with advice she had begun,—and with counsel she had once mended. And to have altered in things inconsiderable, upon a new design or sullen mislike, had been extreme levity, and apt to have made the men contemptible, their authority slighted, and the thing ridiculous, especially before adversaries, that watched all opportunity and appearances to have disgraced the reformation. Here, therefore, it became a law, was established by an act of parliament, was made solemn by an appendant penalty against all, that, on either hand, did prevaricate a sanction of so long and so prudent consideration.

14. But the common prayer-book had the fate of St. Paul; for when it had scaped the storms of the Roman sea, yet a viper sprung out of Queen Mary's fires, which at Frankfort first leaped upon the hand of the church; but since that time, it hath gnawn the bowels of its own mother, and given itself life by the death of its parent and nurse.

15. For as for the adversaries from the Roman party, they were so convinced by the piety and innocence of the common prayer-book, that they could accuse it of no deformity; but of imperfection, of a want of some things which they judged convenient, because the error had a wrinkle on it, and the face of antiquity. And, therefore, for ten or eleven years they came to our churches, joined in our devotions, and communicated without scruple, till a temporal interest of the church of Rome rent the schism wider, and made it gape like the jaws of the grave.

And let me say, it adds no small degree to my confidence and opinion of the English common prayer-book, that, amongst the numerous armies sent from the Roman seminaries, (who were curious enough to inquire, able enough to find out, and wanted no anger to have made them charge home any error in our liturgy, if the matter had not been unblamable, and the composition excellent,) there was never any impiety or heresy charged upon the liturgy of the church: for I reckon not the calumnies of Harding, for they were only in general, calling it "darkness," &c. from which aspersion it was worthily vindicated by M. Deering. The truth of it is, the compilers took that course which was sufficient to have secured it against the malice of a Spanish inquisitor, or the scrutiny of a more inquisitive presbytery; for they put nothing of controversy into their prayers, nothing that was then matter of question; only because they could not prophesy, they put in some things which, since then, have been called to question by persons, whose interest was highly concerned to find fault with something. But that also hath been the fate of the penmen of Holy Scripture, some of which could prophesy, and yet could not prevent this. But I do not remember that any man was ever put to it to justify the common prayer against any positive, public, and professed charge by a Roman adversary: nay, it is transmitted to us by the testimony of persons greater than all exceptions, that Paulus Quartus, in his private intercourses and letters to Queen Elizabeth, did offer to confirm the English common prayer-book, if she would acknowledge his primacy and authority, and the reformation derivative from him.[b] And this lenity was pursued by his successor, Pius Quartus,[c] with an "omnia de nobis tibi polliceare:" he assured her she should have any thing from him, not only things pertaining to her soul, but what might conduce to the establishment and confirmation of her royal dignity; amongst which, that the liturgy, new established by her authority, should not be rescinded by the pope's power, was not the least considerable.

16. And possibly this hath cast a cloud upon it in the eyes of such persons who never will keep charity, or so much as civility, but with those, with whom they have made a league offensive and defensive against all the world. This hath made it to be suspected of too much compliance with that church, and her offices of devotion, and that it is a very cento composed out of the Mass-book, Pontifical, Breviaries, Manuals, and Portuises of the Roman church.

17. I cannot say but many of our prayers are also in the Roman offices. But so they are also in the Scripture, so also is the Lord's prayer; and if they were not, yet the allegation is very inartificial, and the charge peevish and unreasonable, unless there were nothing good in the Roman books, or that it were unlawful to pray a good prayer, which they had once stained with red letters. The objection hath not sense enough to procure an answer upon its own stock, but by reflection from a direct truth, which uses to be like light, manifesting itself and discovering darkness.

18. It was first perfected in King Edward VI.'s time, but it was, by and by, impugned, through the obstinate and dissembling malice of many; they are the words of Mr. Fox, in his Book of Martyrs. Then it was reviewed and published with so much approbation, that it was accounted the work of God; but yet, not long after, there were some persons, "qui divisionis occasionem arripiebant," saith Alseius, "vocabula et pene syllabas expendendo;" "they tried it by points and syllables, and weighed every word," and sought occasions to quarrel: which being observed by Archbishop Cranmer, he caused it to be translated into Latin, and sent it to Bucer, requiring his judgment of it, who returned this answer; "That although there are in it some things 'quæ rapi possunt ab inquietis ad materiam contentionis,' 'which, by peevish men, may be cavilled at,' yet there was nothing in it but what was taken out of the Scriptures, or agreeable to it, if rightly understood; that is, if handled and read by wise and good men." The zeal which Archbishop Grindal, Bishop Ridley, Dr. Taylor, and other the holy martyrs and confessors in Queen Mary's time, expressed for his excellent liturgy, before and at the time of their death, defending it by their disputations, adorning it by their practice, and sealing it with their bloods, are arguments which ought to recommend it to all the sons of the church of England for ever, infinitely to be valued beyond all the little whispers and murmurs of argument pretended against it: and when it came out of the flame, and was purified in the martyrs' fires, it became a vessel of honour, and used in the house of God in all the days of that long peace, which was the effect of God's blessing, and the reward, as we humbly hope, of a holy religion; and when it was laid aside, in the days of Queen Mary, it was "to the great decay of the due honour of God, and discomfort to the professors of th truth of Christ's religion:" they are the words o Queen Elizabeth, and her grave and wise parlia ment.

19. Archbishop Cranmer, in his purgation, A. D 1553, made an offer, if the queen would give hin leave, to prove all that is contained in the commo prayer-book to be conformable to that order whic our blessed Saviour, Christ, did both observe an command to be observed. And a little after, h offers to join issue upon this point that the order o the church of England, set out by authority of th innocent and godly prince Edward VI., in his hig court of parliament, is the same that was used in th church fifteen hundred years past.

20. And I shall go near to make his words good For very much of our liturgy is the very words o Scripture. The psalms and lessons, and all th hymns, save one, are nothing else but Scripture, an owe nothing to the Roman breviaries for their pro duction or authority. So that the matter of them is, out of question, holy and true: as for the form none ever disliked it, but they that will admit n form; for all admit this that admit any. But tha these should be parts of liturgy, needs not to be question, when we remember, that Hezekiah an the princes made it a law to their church, to sing praises to the Lord "with the words of David, an of Asaph, the seer,"[d] and that Christ himself di so, and his apostles, after the manner of the Jews in the feast of Passover, sung their hymns and por tions of the great Allelujah in the words of David and Asaph, the seer,[e] too, and that there was a song in heaven made up of the words of Moses, an David, and Jeremy, the seer, and that the apostle and the church of God always chose to do so, ac cording to the commandment of the apostle, tha we sing psalms and hymns to God. I know no where we can have better than the Psalms of David and Asaph, and these were ready at hand for the use of the church, insomuch, that in the christian synaxes, particularly in the churches of Corinth, St Paul observed that "every man had a psalm;" it was then the common devotion and liturgy of all the faithful, and so for ever; and the fathers of the fourth council of Toledo justified the practice of the church, in recitation of the psalms and hymns, by the example of Christ and his apostles, who, after supper, sung a psalm; and the church did also make hymns of her own, in the honour of Christ, and sung them: such as was the "Te Deum," made by St. Ambrose and St. Austin, and they stood her in great stead, not only as acts of direct worship to Christ, but as conservators of the articles of Christ's divinity, of which the fathers made use against the heretic Artemon, as appears in Eusebius, lib. v. c. 28. Eccles. Hist.

21. That reading the Scripture was part of the liturgy of the apostolical ages, we find it in the tenth canon of the apostles, in Albinus Flaccus, Rabanus Maurus, and in the liturgy attributed to St. James. "Deinde leguntur fusissime oracula sacra veteris Testamenti et prophetarum, e Filii Dei incar-natio demonstratur, passio, resurrectio ex mortuis, ascensus in cœlum, secundus item adventus ejus cum gloriâ. Atque id fit singulis diebus," &c.

22. So that since thus far the matter of our devotions is warranted by God's Spirit, and the form by the precedents of Scripture too, and the ages apostolical, above half of the English liturgy is as Divine as Scripture itself, and the choice of it for practice is no less than apostolical.

23. Of the same consideration is the Lord's prayer, commanded by our blessed Saviour in two evangelists: the "introit" is the Psal. xcv., and the responsories of morning and evening prayer, ejaculations taken from the words of David and Hezekiah; the decalogue recited in the communion is the ten words of Moses, and without peradventure, was not taken into the office in imitation of the Roman; for although it was done upon great reason, and considering the great ignorance of the people they were to inform, yet I think it was never in any church-office before, but in manuals and catechisms only: yet they are made liturgic by the suffrages at the end of every commandment, and need no other warrant from antiquity but the twentieth chapter of Exodus. There are not many parts beside, and they which are, derive themselves from an elder house than the Roman offices; the Gloria Patri was composed by the Nicene council, the latter versicle by St. Jerome, though some eminently learned, and, in particular, Baronius, is of opinion that it was much more ancient. It was, at first, a confession of faith, and used by a newly-baptized convert and the standers by; and then it came to be a hymn, and very early annexed to the antiphones, and afterwards to the Psalms and hymns, all except that of St. Ambrose beginning with "Te Deum," because that of itself is a great doxology. It is seven times used in the Greek office of baptism, and in the recitation of it the priest and people stood all up and turned to the east; and this custom ever continued in the church, and is still retained in the church of England, in conformity to the ancient and primitive custom, save only that in the litany we kneel, which is a more humble posture, but not so ancient,—the litanies having usually been said walking, not kneeling or standing. But in this the variety is an ornament to the church's garment. St. Gregory added this doxology to the responsory at the beginning of prayer, after "O Lord, make haste to help us:" that was the last, and yet above a thousand years old, and much older than the body of popery. And as for the latter part of the doxology, I am clearly of opinion, that though it might, by St. Jerome, be brought into the Latin church, yet it was in the Greek church before him; witness that most ancient hymn or doxology, Καὶ σοι τὴν δόξαν ἀναπέμπομεν, τῷ πατρὶ καὶ τῷ υἱῷ καὶ τῷ ἁγίῳ πνεύματι, νῦν καὶ ἀεὶ καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων. Ἀμήν. However, as to the matter of the doxology, it is no other than the confession of the three most blessed persons of the Trinity, which Christ commanded, and which, with greatest solemnity, we declare in baptism; and certainly we can no ways better, or more solemnly and ritually, give glory to the holy Trinity, than by being baptized into the profession and service of it. The trisagion was taught to the Greek church by angels; but certain it is, it sprang not from a Roman fountain; and that the canon of our communion is the same with the old canon of the church, many hundred years before popery had invaded the simplicity of christian religion, is evident, if we compare the particulars recited by St. Basil,[f] Innocentius's[g] epistle to John, archbishop of Lyons,—Honorius,[h] the priest, Alcuinus,[i] and Walafridus Strabo;[k] and if we will, we may add the liturgy said to be St. James's, and the constitution of St. Clement,[l] (for whoever was the author of these, certainly they were ancient,) Radulphus Tongrensis; and the later ritualists, Cassander, Pamelius, Hittorpius, Jacobus Goar, and the rest.

24. And that we may be yet more particular, the very prayer for Christ's catholic church, in the office of communion, beside that it is nothing but a plain execution of an apostolical precept, set down in the preface of the prayer, it was also used in all times, and in all liturgies of the ancient church. And we find this attested by St. Cyril of Jerusalem;[m] "Deinde postquam confectum est illud spirituale sacrificium, obsecramus Deum pro communi ecclesiarum pace, pro tranquillitate mundi, pro regibus," &c. To the same purpose also there is a testimony in St. Chrysostom,[n] which because it serves not only here, but also to other uses, it will not be amiss here to note it: "Quid autem sibi vult primum omnium? In obsequio scilicet quotidiano, perpetuoque divinæ religionis ritu. Atque id noverunt fideles, quomodo diebus singulis, mane et vespere, orationes fundantur ad Dominum; quomodo pro omni mundo et regibus, et omnibus qui in sublimitate positi sunt, obsecrationes in ecclesiâ fiant. Sed forte quis dixerit, pro omnibus quod ait, tantum fideles intelligi voluisse. At id verum non esse quæ sequuntur, ostendunt. Denique ait, pro regibus; neque enim tunc reges Deum colebant." It is evident by this, that the custom of the church was, not only in the celebration of the holy communion, but in all her other offices, to say this prayer not only for Christ's catholic church, but for all the world.

25. And that the charity of the church might not be misconstrued, he produces his warrant. St. Paul not only expressly commands us to pray "for all men," but adds, by way of instance, "for kings," who then were unchristian, and heathen in all the world. But this form of prayer is almost word for word in St. Ambrose. "Hæc regula ecclesiastica est tradita à magistro gentium, quâ utuntur sacerdotes nostri, ut pro omnibus supplicent —deprecantes pro regibus—orantes pro iis quibus sublimis potestas credita est, ut in justitiâ et veritate gubernent—postulantes pro iis qui in necessitate variâ sunt, ut eruti et liberati Deum collaudent incolumitatis autorem."[o] So far goes our form of prayer. But St. Ambrose adds, "Referentes quoque gratiarum actiones." And so it was with us in the first service-books of King Edward, and the preface to the prayer engages us to a thanksgiving; but I know not how it was stolen out, the preface still remaining, to chide their unwariness that took down that part of the building, and yet left the gate standing. But if the reader please to be satisfied concerning this prayer, which, indeed, is the longest in our service-book, and of greatest consideration, he may see it taken up from the universal custom of the church, and almost in all the words of the old liturgies, if he will observe the liturgies themselves, of St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and the concurrent testimonies of Tertullian,[p] St. Austin,[q] Celestine,[r] Gennadius,[s] Prosper,[t] and Theophylact.[u]

26. I shall not need to make any excuses for the church's reading those portions of Scripture, which we call epistles and gospels, before the communion. They are Scriptures of the choicest and most profitable transaction. And let me observe this thing, that they are not only declarations of all the mysteries of our redemption, and rules of good life, but this choice is of the greatest compliance with the necessities of the christian church that can be imagined. For if we deny to the people a liberty of reading Scriptures, may they not complain, as Isaac did against the inhabitants of the land, that the Philistines had spoiled his well, and the fountains of living water? if a free use to all of them, and of all Scriptures, were permitted, should not the church herself have more cause to complain of the infinite licentiousness and looseness of interpretations, and of the commencement of ten thousand errors, which would certainly be consequent to such permission? Reason and religion will chide us in the first, reason and experience in the latter. And can the wit of man conceive a better temper and expedient, than that such Scriptures only or principally should be laid before them all in daily offices, which contain in them all the mysteries of our redemption, and all the rules of good life? which two things are done by the gospels and epistles respectively: the first being a record of the life and death of our blessed Saviour; the latter, instructions for the edification of the church, in pious and christian conversation; and all this was done with so much choice, that as obscure places are avoided by design, as much as could be, so the very assignation of them to certain festivals, the appropriation of them to solemn and particular days, does entertain the understandings of the people with notions proper to the mystery, and distinct from impertinent and vexatious questions. And were this design made something more minute, and applicable to the various necessities of times, and such choice scriptures permitted indifferently, which might be matter of necessity and great edification, the people of the church would have no reason to complain, that the fountains of our Saviour were stopped from them,—nor the rulers of the church that the mysteriousness of Scripture were abused by the petulancy of the people to consequents harsh, impious, and unreasonable, in despite of government, in exauctoration of the power of superiors, or for the commencement of schisms and heresies. The church, with great wisdom, hath first held this torch out; and, though, for great reasons intervening and hindering, it cannot be reduced to practice, yet the church hath shown her desire to avoid the evil that is on both hands, and she hath shown the way also, if it could have been insisted in. But, however this choice of the more remarkable portions of Scripture is so reasonable and proportionable to the nature of the thing, that, because the gospels and epistles bear their several shares of the design, (the gospels representing the foundation, and prime necessities of christianity, and the mysterious parts of our redemption, the sum, the faith, and the hopes of christianity,) therefore it is attested by a ceremony of standing up, it being a part of the confession of faith: but the epistles containing superstructures upon that foundation, are read with religious care but not made formal or solemn by any other circumstance. The matter contains in it sufficient of reason and of proportion, but nothing of necessity except it be by accident, and as authority does intervene by way of sanction.

27. But that this reading of epistles and gospels before the communion, was one of the earliest customs of the church, I find it affirmed by Rabanus Maurus.[x] "Sed enim initio mos iste cantandi non erat, qui nunc in ecclesiâ ante sacrificium celebratur: sed tamen epistolæ Pauli recitabantur, et sanctum evangelium:" "The custom of reading St. Paul's epistles, and the holy gospel before the sacrament, was from the beginning." Some other portions of Scripture were read, upon emergent occasions, instead of the epistle, which still retain the name of epistle; but it is so seldom, that it happens upon two Sundays only in the year: upon Trinity Sunday, and the twenty-fifth Sunday after: upon Saints' days it happens oftener, because the story requires a particular rememoration, and, therefore, is very often taken out of the Acts of the Apostles; but being in substitution only of the ordinary portion of the epistle of St. Paul, or other the apostles, it keeps the name of the first design, though the change be upon good reason, and much propriety.

28. There remains now nothing but the litany and collects to be accounted for: for the matter of which, I shall need to say nothing, because the objections whatsoever have been against them, are extremely low, and rather like the intemperate talk of an angry child, than pressures of reason or probability, excepting where they are charged with their virtues, for their charity in praying for all men, for their humility in acknowledging such a worthlessness in ourselves, as not to dare to ask our petitions upon our own confidences. These things fall like water against a rock, or like the accusations against our blessed Saviour; the unreasonableness of them splits themselves.

29. But for the form, I think themselves will make answer, when they consider that they are nothing but a pursuit of that apostolical precept, which, next to the Lord's prayer, was the first Scripture pattern, whence the church framed her liturgies. "First of all, let there be made intercessions, and prayers, and supplications, and giving of thanks, for all men."[y] In which words, if there be not an impertinent repetition of divers words to the same sense, then needs must δεήσεις, προσευχαὶ, ἐντεύξεις, be as much distinct from each other in their form, as they are all from Εὐχαριστίαι.

30. St. Austin expounds προσευχὰς, "prayers made in and about the blessed eucharist." "Ideo in hujus sanctificatione et distributionis præparatione existimo apostolum jussisse proprie fieri προσευχὰς, id est, orationes. Interpellationes autem vel postulationes fiunt, cum populus benedicitur."[z]

31. But St. Austin, if he were not deceived in his criticism, says, that besides the general name of prayer, which is signified by all those words, εὐχὴ in Scripture signifies "votum" or desire, such surely as we express by sudden and short emissions, and then προσευχὴ is but a prayer, πρὸς εὐχὴν, that is, but an expression of short and ejaculatory desires, and may be better applied to such forms of prayer as are our collects, rather than the longer and more solemn parts of the canon of communion. Ἐντεύξεις, though it signifies an address to God, yet it may with propriety enough be applied to our interlocutory prayers where the people bear a share; for ἐντεύξεις signifies "congressum" or "colloquium," τὰς ἐντεύξεις μὴ πυκνὰς ποιοῦ τοῖς αὐτοῖς, Isocrates: "Make no frequent societies or confederations with them." However, although grammarians may differ in assigning these several words to their proper, minute, and incommunicable signification, yet it is most clear, that they mean not prayers distinct, and made several by the variety of matter, but several addresses differing only in "modo orandi," and, therefore, by these are intended the several forms of prayer and supplication: and the church hath at all times used prayers of all variety, long and short, ejaculatory, determined, and solemn. And the church of England understood it in this variety, calling the short ejaculatory prayers and responsories by the names of litanies, or suffrages, which I should render in the phrase of St. Austin to be "postulationes," or δεήσεις; but the longer collects he calls "prayers," which is the true rendering of προσευχὰς, I suppose, and therefore twice in the litany, after the short responsories, the priest says, "let us pray," by that, minding the people of the apostles' precept, that "prayer" as well as "supplications" be made. For the litanies it is certain, the form is of great antiquity; Mamercus, bishop of Vienna, made solemn litanies, four hundred years after Christ, and he and all his diocess repeated them together: and, therefore, I know not what matter of doubt there can be reasonable in the form, since, besides that we have the wisdom of so many ages, and holy and prudent persons to confirm them, the form is made with design to represent all the needs of the catholic church, and to make the prayer itself fitted for an active and an intense devotion; and that it co-operates rarely well to these ends, is so true, that of the first, every man is judge,—of the second, every man may be judge, that will, without prejudice, and with pious predispositions, use the form; for if they help my devotion infinitely, they may do as much to another, if he be disposed as I am; and he that says they do no advantage, or singular relish to my spirit, may as well tell me the meat I eat does not please me, because he loves it not; but the exceptions which are against it, are so fantastic, and by chance, that, unless it be against a single adversary, and by personal engagement, they cannot be noted in a series of a positive discourse. Sometimes they are too long, and sometimes they are too short, and yet the objectors will make longer and shorter when they please; and, because no law of God hath prescribed to us in such circumstances, if the church leaves the same liberty to their private devotions, it is not reasonable they should prescribe to her in public, and in such minutes, in which the ordinary prudence of one wise man is abundantly sufficient to give him laws and directions, and in matters of greater difficulty.

32. Of the same consideration is the form of our church collects, which are made pleasant by their variety of matter,—are made energetical and potent by that great endearment of "per Jesum Christum Dominum nostrum,"—are cleared from a neighbourhood of tediousness by their so quick intercision and breakings off,—and have for their precedent the forms of prayer used by the religious of Palestine mentioned by Cassian; "Et hæ fuerunt monachorum jaculatoriæ orationes, ut frequentius Dominum deprecantes jugiter eidem cohærere possimus, et ut insidiantis diaboli jacula, quæ infligere nobis tum præcipue insistit cum oramus, succinctâ vitemus brevitate."[a] In all these forms of prayer there is no difference but what is circumstantial; and therefore, although these circumstances be of great efficacy for the procuring of accidental advantages to our spirits, which are often swayed, moved, and determined by a manner, as much as by an essence, yet there is in it nothing of duty and obligation; and, therefore, it is the most unreasonable thing in the world to make any of these things to be a question of religion.

33. I shall therefore press these things no further, but note, that since all liturgy is, and ever was, either prose or verse,—or both, and the liturgy of the church of England, as well as most others, is of the last sort,—I consider that whatsoever is in her devotions besides the lessons, epistles, and gospels, (the body of which is no other thing, than was the famous "lectionarium" of St. Jerome,) is a compliance with these two dictates of the apostle for liturgy: the which, one for verse, the other for prose, "in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs," for verse; for prose, "deprecations, and prayers, and intercessions, and giving of thanks,"—will warrant and commend, as so many parts of duty, all the portions of the English liturgy.

34. If it were worth the pains, it were very easy to enumerate the authors, and especially the occasions and time when the most minute passages, such I mean as are known by distinct appellatives, came into the church; that so it may appear, our liturgy is as ancient and primitive in every part, as it is pious and unblamable, and long before the church got such a beam in one of her eyes, which was endeavoured to be cast out at the reformation. But it will not be amiss to observe, that very many of them were inserted as antidotes and deleteries to the worst of heresies, as I have discoursed already: and such was that clause, "Through Jesus Christ our Lord, who liveth and reigneth with thee, in the unity of the Holy Spirit, ever one God:" and some other phrases parallel were put in, in defiance of the Macedonians, and all the species of the Anti-trinitarians, and used by St. Ambrose in Milan, St. Austin in Africa, and Idacius Clarus in Spain; and in imitation of so pious precedents, the church of England hath inserted divers clauses into her offices.

35. There was a great instance in the administration of the blessed sacrament. For upon the change of certain clauses in the liturgy, upon the instance of Martin Bucer, instead of "the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was given for you, preserve your body and soul unto everlasting life," was substituted this, "take and eat this in remembrance," &c. and it was done lest the people, accustomed to the opinion of transubstantiation and the appendant practices, should retain the same doctrine upon intimation of the first clause. But in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, when certain persons of the Zuinglian opinion would have abused the church with sacramentary doctrine, and pretended the church of England had declared for it in the second clause of 1552, the wisdom of the church thought it expedient to join both the clauses; the first, lest the church should be suspected to be of the sacramentary opinion; the latter, lest she should be mistaken as a patroness of transubstantiation; and both these with so much temper and sweetness, that by her care she rather prevented all mistakes, than by any positive declaration in her prayers, engaged herself upon either side, that she might pray to God without strife and contention with her brethren. For the church of England had never known how to follow the names of men, but to call Christ only "her Lord and Master."

36. But from the inserting of these and the like clauses, which hath been done in all ages, according to several opportunities and necessities, I shall observe this advantage, which is in many, but is also very signally in the English liturgy; we are thereby enabled and advantaged in the meditation of those mysteries, "de quibus festivatur in sacris," as the casuists love to speak;—which, upon solemn days, we are bound to meditate, and make to be the matter and occasion of our address to God; for the offices are so ordered, that the most indifferent and careless cannot but be reminded of the mystery in every anniversary, which, if they be summed up, will make an excellent creed; and then let any man consider what a rare advantage it will be to the belief of such propositions, when the very design of the holiday teaches the hard-handed artisan the name and meaning of an article, and yet the most forward and religious cannot be abused with any semblances of superstition. The life and death of the saints, which is very precious in the eyes of God, is so remembered by his humble and afflicted handmaid the church of England, that by giving him thanks and praise, God may be honoured, the church instructed by the proposition of their example, and we give testimony of the honour and love we owe and pay unto religion, by the pious veneration and esteem of those holy and beatified persons.

37. Certain it is that there is no part of religion, as it is a distinct virtue, and is to be exercised by interior acts and forms of worship, but is in the offices of the church of England. For if the soul desires to be humbled, she hath provided forms of confession to God before his church; if she will rejoice and give God thanks for particular blessings, there are forms of thanksgiving described and added, by the king's authority, upon the conference at Hampton-court, which are all the public, solemn, and foreseen occasions, for which, by law and order, provision could be made. If she will commend to God the public and private necessities of the church, and single persons, the whole body of collects and devotions supplies that abundantly; if her devotion be high and pregnant, and prepared to fervency and importunity of congress with God, the litanies are an admirable pattern of devotion, full of circumstances proportionable for a quick and an earnest spirit; when the revolution of the anniversary calls on us to perform our duty of special meditation, and thankfulness to God for the glorious benefits of Christ's incarnation, nativity, passion, resurrection, and ascension, (blessings which do as well deserve a day of thanksgiving as any other temporal advantage, though it be the pleasure of a victory,) then we have the offices of Christmas, the Annunciation, Easter, and Ascension; if we delight to remember those holy persons, whose bodies rest in the bed of peace, and whose souls are deposited in the hands of Christ till the day of restitution of all things, we may, by the collects and days of anniversary-festivity, not only remember, but also imitate them too in our lives, if we will make that use of the proportions of Scripture allotted for the festival which the church intends: to which if we add the advantages of the whole psalter, which is an entire body of devotion by itself, and hath in it forms to exercise all graces by way of internal act and spiritual intention, there is not any ghostly advantage which the most religious can either need or fancy, but the English liturgy in its entire constitution will furnish us withal. And certainly it was a very great wisdom, and a very prudent and religious constitution, so to order that part of the liturgy, which the ancients called the "lectionarium," that the psalter should be read over twelve times in the year, the Old Testament once, and the New Testament thrice, besides the epistles and gospels, which renew with a more frequent repetition, such choice places as represent the entire body of faith and good life. There is a defalcation of some few chapters from the entire body in the order; but that also was part of the wisdom of the church, not to expose to public ears and common judgments some of the secret rites of Moses's law, or the more mysterious prophecies of the New Testament, whose sense and meaning the event will declare, if we, by mistaken and anticipated interpretations, do not obstruct our own capacities, and hinder us from believing the true events, because they answer not those expectations, with which our own mistakes have prepared our understandings; as it happened to the Jews in the case of Antiochus, and to the christians in the person of Antichrist.

38. Well: thus as it was framed in the body of its first constitution and second alteration, those excellent men whom God chose as instruments of his honour and service in the reformation, to whom also he did show what great things they were to suffer for his name's sake, approved of it with high testimony, promoted it by their own use and zeal, and at last sealed it with their blood.

39. That they had a great opinion of the piety and unblamable composure of the common prayer-book, appears, 1. in the challenge made in its behalf by the archbishop Cranmer, to defend it against all the world of enemies; 2. by the daily using it in time of persecution and imprisonment; for so did Bishop Ridley, and Doctor Taylor, who also recommended it to his wife for a legacy; 3. by their preaching in behalf of it, as many did; 4. by Hulliers' hugging it in his flames, with a posture of great love and forwardness of entertainment; 5. besides the direct testimony which the most eminent learned amongst the Queen-Mary martyrs have given of it. Amongst which, that of the learned rector of Hadley, Doctor Rowland Taylor, is most considerable: his words are these in a letter of his to a friend: "But there was after that, by the most innocent king Edward, (for whom God be praised everlastingly!) the whole church-service, with great deliberation, and the advice of the best learned men of the realm, and authorized by the whole parliament, and received and published gladly by the whole realm; which book was never reformed but once, and yet, by that one reformation, it was so fully perfected, according to the rules of our christian religion, in every behalf, that no christian conscience could be offended with any thing therein contained: I mean of that book reformed."[b]

40. I desire the words may be considered and confronted against some other words lately published, which charge these holy and learned men but with a half-faced light, a darkness in the confines of Egypt and the suburbs of Goshen. And because there is no such thing proved of these blessed men and martyrs, and that it is easy to say such words of any man that is not fully of our mind, I suppose the advantage and the out-weighing authority will lie on our part, in behalf of the common prayer-book, especially since this man, and divers others, died with it and for it, according as it happened by the circumstance of their charges and articles, upon which they died; for so it was in the cases of John Rough, John Philpot, Cuthbert Simson, and seven others burnt in Smithfield;[c] upon whom it was charged in their indictments, that they used, allowed, preached for, and maintained respectively, the service-book of King Edward. To which articles they answered affirmatively, and confessed them to be true in every part, and died accordingly.

41. I shall press this argument to issue, in the words of St. Ambrose, cited to the like purpose by Vincentius Lirinensis: "Librum sacerdotalem quis nostrûm resignare audeat, signatum à confessoribus, et multorum jam martyrio consecratum? Quomodo fidem eorum possumus denegare, quorum victoriam prædicamus?"[d] "Who shall dare to violate this priestly book, which so many confessors have consigned, and so many martyrs have hallowed with their blood? How shall we call them martyrs, if we deny their faith? how shall we celebrate their victory, if we dislike their cause? If we believe them to be crowned, why shall we deny but that they "strove lawfully?" So that if they, dying in attestation of this book, were martyrs, why do we condemn the book for which they died? If we will not call them martyrs, it is clear we have changed our religion since then. And then it would be considered whether we are fallen; for the reformers in King Edward's time died for it, in Queen Elizabeth's time they avowed it under the protection of an excellent princess; but, in that sad interval of Queen Mary's reign, it suffered persecution: and if it shall do so again, it is but an unhandsome compliance for reformers to be unlike their brethren, and to be like their enemies, to do as do the papists, and only to speak great words against them; and it will be sad for a zealous protestant to live in an age that should disavow King Edward's and Queen Elizabeth's religion and manner of worshipping God, and in an age that shall do as Queen Mary's bishops, persecute the book of common-prayer, and the religion contained in it. God help the poor protestants in such times: but let it do its worst; if God please to give his grace, the worst that can come is but a crown, and that was never denied to martyrs.

42. In the mean time I can but with joy and eucharist consider with what advantages and blessings the pious protestant is entertained, and blessed, and armed against all his needs, by the constant and religious usage of the common prayer-book: for besides the direct advantages of the prayers and devotions, some whereof are already instanced,—and the experience of holy persons will furnish them with more,—there are also forms of solemn benediction and absolution in the offices; and if they be not highly considerable, there is nothing sacred in the evangelical ministry, but all is a vast plain, and the altars themselves are made of unhallowed turf.

43. Concerning benediction (of which there are four more solemn forms in the whole office, two in the canon of the communion, one in confirmation, one in the office of marriage) I shall give this short account, that "without all question, the less is blessed of the greater," and it being an issue spiritual, is rather to be verified in spiritual relation than in natural or political. And, therefore, if there be any such thing as "regeneration" by the ministry of the word, and "begetting in Christ," and fathers, and sons after the common faith, (as the expressions of the apostle make us to believe,) certain it is, the blessings of religion do descend most properly from our spiritual fathers, and with most plentiful emanation. And this hath been the religion of all the world, to derive very much of their blessings by the priest's particular and signal ministration: Melchisedeck blessed Abraham, Isaac blessed Jacob, and Moses and Aaron blessed the people. So that here is benediction from a prince, from a father, from the Aaronical priest, from Melchisedeck, of whose order is the christian, in whose law it is a sanction, that, in great needs especially, "the elders of the church be sent for, and let them pray over him that is distressed." That is the "great remedy" for the "great necessity." And it was ever much valued in the church, insomuch that Nectarius would, by no means, take investiture of his patriarchal see, until he had obtained the benediction of Diodorus, the bishop of Cilicia. Eudoxia, the empress, brought her son Theodosius to St. Chrysostom, for his blessing; and St. Austin and all his company received it of Innocentius, bishop of Carthage. It was so solemn in all marriages, that the marrying of persons was called "benediction." So it was in the fourth council of Carthage; "Sponsus et sponsa cum benedicendi sunt à sacerdote," &c. benedicendi for married. And in all church offices it was so solemn, that, by a decree of the council of Agatho, A. D. 380, it was decreed, "Ante benedictionem sacerdotis populus egredi non præsumat." By the way only, here is αὐθεντία for two parts of the English liturgy: for the benediction in the office of marriage, by the authority of the council of Carthage; and for concluding the office of communion with the priest's or bishop's benediction, by warrant of the council of Agatho; which decrees, having been derived into the practice of the universal church for very many ages, is in no hand to be undervalued, lest we become like Esau, and we miss it when we most need it. For my own particular, I shall still press on to receive the benediction of holy church, till at last I shall hear a "Venite, benedicti," and that I be reckoned amongst those blessed souls, who come to God by the ministries of his own appointment, and will not venture upon that neglect, against which the piety and wisdom of all religions in the world infinitely do prescribe.

44. Now the advantages of confidence, which I have upon the forms of benediction in the common prayer-book, are therefore considerable, because God himself prescribed a set form of blessing the people, appointing it to be done, not in the priest's extempore, but in an established form of words; and because, as the authority of a prescript form is from God, so that this form may be also highly warranted, the solemn blessing, at the end of the communion, is in the very words of St. Paul.

45. For the forms of absolution in the liturgy, though I shall not enter into consideration of the question concerning the quality of the priest's power, which is certainly a very great ministry, yet I shall observe the rare temper and proportion which the church of England uses in commensurating the forms of absolution to the degrees of preparation and necessity. At the beginning of the morning and evening prayer, after a general confession, usually recited before the devotion is high and pregnant, whose parts like fire enkindle one another,—there is a form of absolution in general, declarative, and by way of proposition. In the office of the communion, because there are more acts of piety and repentance previous and pre-supposed, there the church's form of absolution is optative and by way of intercession. But in the visitation of the sick, when it is supposed and enjoined that the penitent shall disburden himself of all the clamorous loads upon his conscience, the church prescribes a medicinal form by way of delegate authority, that the parts of justification may answer to the parts of good life. For as the penitent proceeds, so does the church; pardon and repentance being terms of relation, they grow up together till they be complete: this the church, with the greatest wisdom, supposes to be at the end of our life, grace by that time having all its growth that it will have here; and, therefore, then also the pardon of sins is of another nature than it ever was before, it being now more actual and complete; whereas, before, it was "in fieri," in the beginnings and smaller increases, and upon more accidents apt to be made imperfect and revocable. So that the church of England, in these manners of dispensing the power of the keys, does cut off all disputings and impertinent wranglings, whether the priest's power were judicial or declarative; for possibly it is both, and it is optative too; and something else yet, for it is an emanation from all the parts of his ministry, and he never absolves, but he preaches or prays, or administers a sacrament; for this power of remission is a transcendant, passing through all the parts of the priestly offices; for the keys of the kingdom of heaven are the promises and the threatenings of the Scripture, and the prayers of the church, and the word, and the sacraments, and all these are to be dispensed by the priest, and these keys are committed to his ministry,—and by the operation of them all, he opens and shuts heaven's gates ministerially; and, therefore, St. Paul calls it "verbum reconciliationis," and says it is dispensed by ministers, as by "ambassadors" or delegates: and, therefore, it is an excellent temper of the church, so to prescribe her forms of absolution, as to show them to be results of the whole priestly office, of preaching, of dispensing sacraments, of spiritual cure, and authoritative deprecation. And the benefit which pious and well disposed persons receive by these public ministries, as it lies ready formed in our blessed Saviour's promise "erit solutum in cœlis," so men will then truly understand, when they are taught to value, every instrument of grace or comfort by the exigence of a present need, as in a sadness of spirit, in an unquiet conscience, in the arrest of death.

46. I shall not need to procure advantages to the reputation of the common-prayer, by considering the imperfections of whatsoever hath been offered in its stead: but yet,[f] 1. A form of worship, composed to the dishonour of the reformation, accusing it of darkness, and intolerable inconvenience: 2. A direction without a rule: 3. A rule without restraint: 4. A prescription leaving an indifferency to a possibility of licentiousness: 5. An office without any injunction of external acts of worship, not prescribing so much as kneeling: 6. An office that only once names reverence, but forbids it in the ordinary instance, and enjoins it in no particular: 7. An office that leaves the form of ministration of sacraments so indifferently, that if there be any form of words essential, the sacrament is in much danger to become invalid, for want of provision of due forms of ministration: 8. An office that complies with no precedent of Scripture, nor of any ancient church: 9. That must of necessity either want authority, or it must prefer novelty before antiquity: 10. That accuses all the primitive church of indiscretion, at the least: 11. That may be abused by the indiscretion, or ignorance, or malice of any man that uses it: 12. Into which, heresy or blasphemy may creep without possibility of prevention: 13. That hath no external forms to entertain the fancy of the more common spirits: 14. Nor any allurement to persuade and entice its adversaries: 15. Nor any means of adunation and uniformity amongst its confidents: 16. An office that still permits children, in many cases of necessity, to be unbaptized, making no provision for them in sudden cases: 17. That will not suffer them to be confirmed at all, "Ut utroque sacramento renascantur," as St. Cyprian's phrase is, "that they may be advantaged by a double rite:" 18. That joins in marriage as Cacus did his oxen, in rude, inform, and unhallowed yokes: 19. That will not do piety to the dead, nor comfort to the living, by solemn and honorary offices of funeral: 20. That hath no forms of blessing the people, any more 21. than described forms of blessing God, which are just none at all: 22. An office that never thinks of absolving penitents, or exercising the power of the keys, after the custom and rites of priests: 23. A liturgy that recites no creed, no confession of faith, so, not declaring, either to angels or man, according to what religion they worship God; but entertaining, though indeed without a symbol, Arians, Macedonians, Nestorians, Manichees, or any other sect, for ought there appears to the contrary: 24. That consigns no public canon of communion, but leaves that as casual and fantastic as any of the lesser offices: 25. An office that takes no more care than chance does, for the reading the Holy Scriptures: 26. That never commemorates a departed saint: 27. That hath no communion with the church triumphant, any more than with the other parts of the militant: 28. That never thanks God for the redemption of the world by the nativity, and passion, resurrection, and ascension, of our blessed Saviour Jesus; but condemns the memorial even of the Scripture-saints, and the memorial of the miraculous blessings of redemption of mankind by Christ himself; with the same accusation it condemns the legends and portentous stories of the most suspected part of the Roman calendar: 29. An office that, out of zeal against Judaism, condemns all distinction of days, unless they themselves distinguish them: that leaves no signature of piety upon the Lord's day, and yet the compilers do enjoin it to a Judaical superstition: 30. An office that does by implication undervalue the Lord's prayer, for it never enjoins it, and does but once permit it: 31. An office that is new without authority, and never made up into a sanction by an act of parliament: an order or directory of devotion, that hath all these ingredients and capacities, (and such a one there is in the world,) I suppose is no equal match to contest with and be put in balance against the liturgy of the church of England, which was with so great deliberation compiled out of Scriptures, the most of it; all the rest agreeing with Scriptures, and drawn from the liturgies of the ancient church, and made by men famous in their generations, whose reputation and glory of martyrdom hath made it immodest for the best of men now to compare themselves with them; and after its composition, considered by advices from abroad, and so trimmed and adorned, that no excrescency did remain; the rubrics of which book was writ in the blood of many of the compilers, which hath had a testimony from God's blessing in the daily use of it, accompanying it with the peace of an age, established and confirmed by six acts of parliament directly and collaterally, and is of so admirable a composure, that the most industrious wits of its enemies could never find out an objection of value enough to make a doubt, or scarce a scruple, in a wise spirit. But that I shall not need to set a night-piece by so excellent a beauty, to set it off the better,—its own excellencies are orators prevalent enough, that it shall not need any advantages accidental.

47. And yet this excellent book hath had the fate to be cut in pieces with a pen-knife, and thrown into the fire, but it is not consumed; at first it was sown in tears, and is now watered with tears, yet never was any holy thing drowned and extinguished with tears. It began with the martyrdom of the compilers, and the church hath been vexed ever since by angry spirits, and she was forced to defend it with much trouble and unquietness; but it is to be hoped, that all these storms are sent but to increase the zeal and confidence of the pious sons of the church of England: Indeed, the greatest danger that ever the common prayer-book had, was the indifferency and indevotion of them that used it but as a common blessing; and they who thought it fit for the meanest of the clergy to read prayers, and for themselves only to preach,—though they might innocently intend it, yet did not, in that action, consult the honour of our liturgy, except where charity or necessity did interpose. But when excellent things go away, and then look back upon us, as our blessed Saviour did upon St. Peter, we are more moved than by the nearer embraces of a full and an actual possession. I pray God it may prove so in our case, and that we may not be too willing to be discouraged; at least, that we may not cease to love and to desire what is not publicly permitted to our practice and profession.

*48. But because things are otherwise in this affair than we had hoped, and that, in very many churches, instead of the common-prayer which they use not, every man uses what he pleases, and all men do not choose well; and where there are so many choosers, there is nothing regular, and the sacraments themselves are not so solemnly ministered as the sacredness and solemnity of the mysteries do require, and in very many places, where the old excellent forms are not permitted, there is scarce any thing at all, but something to show there was a shipwreck, a plank or a cable, a chapter or a psalm: some who were troubled to see it so, and fain would see it otherwise, did think it might not be amiss that some of the ancient forms of other churches, and of the prayers of Scripture, should be drawn together, and laid before them that need; as supposing that these or the like materials would make better fuel for the fires of devotion, than the straw and the stubble which some men did suddenly or weakly rake together, whenever they were to dress their sacrifice. Now, although these prayers have no authority to give them power, yet they are humbly and charitably intended, and that may get them love, and they have been (as to the matter of them) approved by persons of great learning and great piety; and that may sufficiently recommend them to the use of those who have no other, or no better, and they no way do violence to authority, and therefore the use of them cannot be insecure; and they contain in them no matter of question or dispute, and therefore cannot be justly suspected of interest or partiality: and they are (especially in the chiefest offices) collected out of the devotions of the Greek church, with some mixture of the Mozarabic and Æthiopic, and other liturgies, and perfected out of the fountains of Scripture, and therefore, for the material part, have great warrant and great authority; and therefore if they be used with submission to authority, it is hoped they may do good; and if they be not used, no man will be offended.

49. I hope there will be no need of an apology, or an excuse for doing an act of charity; if no man will confess that he needs any of these, they can be let alone, for they are intended only for them that do; but if there be a need, these prayers may help to obtain of God to take that need away, and to supply it in the mean while. But there is nothing else intended in this design, but that we may see what excellent forms of prayer were used in the ancient church, what a rare repository of devotion the Scripture is; how it was the same spirit of prayer that assisted the church of England, and other churches of God; how much better the curates of souls may help themselves with these or the like offices, than with their own extempore; how their present needs may be supplied, and their devotion enlarged, and a day of religion entirely spent, and a provision made for some necessities, in which our calamities and our experience of late have too well instructed us. For which and for other great reasons, all churches have admitted variety of offices. In the Greek church, it is notorious, they have three public books, and very many added afterwards by their patriarchs, their bishops, and their priests; some are said often, and others sometimes: and in Spain, the Mozarabic office was used until the time of Alphonso VI. and to this very day, in six parishes in Toledo, and in the cathedral church itself, in the chapel of Friar Francis Ximenes; and at Salamanca, upon certain days, in the chapel of Doctor Talabricensis. And after all, these may be admitted into the use and ministry of families, for all the necessities of which, here is something provided.

JER. TAYLOR.

* This Preface being in every respect the same as that which is prefixed to the "Collection of Offices," with the exception of this and the following paragraph, they have been added here, to supersede the necessity of reprinting the whole with the "Collection of Offices."

A LETTER FROM JEREMY TAYLOR, D. D.

ADDRESSED TO BISHOP LESLIE;

AND PREFIXED BY HIM TO HIS DISCOURSE ON PRAYING WITH THE SPIRIT AND UNDERSTANDING.

My Lord,

I am well pleased your Lordship hath consented to publish your excellent sermons concerning "extempore prayer." You preached them in a family, in which the public liturgy of the church is greatly valued, and diligently used; but in a country, where most of the inhabitants are strangers to the thing, and enemies to the name; for so they are taught to be, having no other reason for that enmity, than because their preachers have blasted it with the breath of their displeasure. But, instead of this, they are fed with indeliberate, unstudied, sudden conceptions, begotten and born in the same minute, and, therefore, not likely to be better than all those other productions of the world, which, by being sudden and hasty, have an inevitable fate to be useless and good for nothing.

My Lord, I have often considered concerning the pretensions of those persons, who think no prayer is good if it be studied, and none spiritual unless it be "ex tempore," and that only such are made by the Spirit: and perceiving them to rely upon the expression of St. Paul, "I will pray with the Spirit," I have thought that they as little study what they teach to men, as what they say to God; for if they did not understand with the Spirit, in the same sense as they pray with the Spirit, that is, without all study and consideration, I am verily persuaded they would not have fallen upon this new and unheard-of practice: I say, "unheard-of;" for it is a new thing, both to heathens, to Jews, and to christians; and indeed must be so, since, in the very nature of the thing itself, it appears to be infinitely unreasonable.

For what greater disparagement in the world can there be to him that speaks, or the thing spoken, than to say it was spoken rashly and inconsiderately? And, therefore, it was an excellent saying of one: "Oratio viri philosophi, sicut vita, debet esse composita:" "every wise man's words should be composed and orderly as his life:" μετὰ πολλοῦ σκέψεως καὶ πόνου, "with labour and consideration." And certain it is, if any man intends to speak well and wisely, he does not vomit out his answers, as a fool does secrets; he is sick till they are out, and when they are, they are loathsome. Of this I need say no more; but it is evident all such extempore prayers are likely to be less wise; and to use such ways of prayer, is against reason.

2. To do so is against the virtue of religion: it is doing the work of the Lord negligently, and, therefore, unpleasantly; and to this is to be imputed all those unhandsome issues of a sudden tongue, which so ill become religion, that they very often minister offence to wise and godly persons of all persuasions.

3. Hasty and unstudied prayers are against Scripture; expressly, I say, against the word of God, whose Spirit hath commanded thus: "Be not rash with thy mouth, and be not hasty to utter any thing before God."[a] Now this commandment is plain and easy, and, therefore, not to be evacuated by any obscure and difficult pretences, from which no certain argument can arise. To which if we add, that St. Paul amongst the characters of these of whom he prophesies evil things, reckons προπετεῖς, "the hasty and heady people;"[b] I humbly conceive that these are the persons, in the New Testament, who break the commandment in the Old, and that they must have something else to defend them, than what hath yet appeared.

But, therefore, these our brethren pretend that the Spirit of God supplies all this; and what is wanting in nature is supplied by grace. To this I need to make no new replies, but only consider, that where there is an unavoidable necessity, we have reason to suppose we shall be helped: but we have no such need; we are taught in Scripture, by the Holy Spirit, what to pray, and how to pray, and beyond this assistance we need nothing, save only that he be pleased to stir us up to pray; and for that also we have arguments and invitations sufficient in the divine Scripture; and I humbly conceive, it is one sort of tempting God, to call for extraordinary aids, when we are sufficiently provided for in ordinary; and I appeal to the piety and consciences of all christian ministers, whether the Spirit of God hath not sufficiently enabled us in all the parts and necessities of prayer, by the treasures of Holy Scripture? and, 2. whether, by reading and meditating in the Scriptures, we cannot obtain all the aid we need? and, 3. whether or no, do not those ministers that are supposed to pray best amongst them, most of all use the phrases and expressions of Scripture? and, 4. whether or no, are not such prayers undeniably the best which are taken thence?

4. But, that I need no further argument in this question, I appeal to the experience of this last age, in which extempore prayers have been born and bred, whether it can be reasonable to allow such sudden prayers to be productions of the Spirit, when we have heard many spiritual crimes expressed and promoted by such prayers, and by those that pretended to such gifts? the consequence of which is certainly this; that to prove a man to pray with the Spirit, something else is required besides speaking extempore; and that this is not, therefore, it; because many do this, who do like Ananias and Sapphira, ψεύσασθαι τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα, "belie, or falsely pretend the Spirit," who cannot dictate false, heretical, rebellious, blasphemous, or ignorant propositions: and yet it is certain, if these men who pray extempore, did pray with the Spirit; that is, if the Spirit of God did dictate those words; those prayers would be as good canonical Scripture, when they are written by the short-hand writers, as any of the psalms of David, or the words of the apostles: which because it is intolerable to affirm, it follows, that praying with the Spirit means not extempore prayers.

5. I add but one thing more, and that is, that Dideclavius, the great patron of our dissenting brethren, said, in his "Altare Damasceno," that the master of a family could not, without indecency, pray with such sudden conception before a family; and as wise a man as he, said, "Nihil ordinatum est quod præcipitatur; properari sine indecoro non potest;"[c] "There can be no order in sudden conception." Since, therefore, it is indecent and unorderly, let it be considered how such persons can observe the precept of the apostle: "Let all things," in the church, "be done decently and in order."

If it be asked by any man, Whether it be unfit to use, in private, forms of our own composing? I answer, "it may be very fit;" but this is because this rule of the apostle, which wholly relates to the public, is not a provision for the private, for decency is a relative term, and so is order; and in private we may deliberate upon our knees, but, in public, we cannot; and although we must, neither in public nor in private, speak hastily, rashly, or without sufficient deliberation, yet we may do that in private which, in public, we may not; and there we are only to avoid rashness and hastiness; but in public we must take care of order also, and of decency, and of edification of others, all which by extempore prayers cannot be well provided for: but, my Lord, I forget the purpose of my letter, which is to pay to your Lordship that just acknowledgment of your care of the church's good, and the instruction of souls, which you have expressed in this material, plain, easy, and religious discourse, which I pray God may prove as profitable as it is rational, as useful as it is pious.

My Lord, I am
Your Lordship's
Most affectionate brother and servant,

AN APOLOGY

FOR

AUTHORIZED AND SET FORMS OF LITURGY.

Χωρεῖν γὰρ ἀνάγκη τὸ ὅμοιον· ὅθεν καὶ μόνος ἱερεὺς ὁ σόφος λέγεται, μόνος θεοφιλὴς, ΜΟΝΟΣ ΕΙΔΩΣ ΕΥΞΑΣΘΑΙ· μόνος γὰρ οἶδε τιμᾶν, ὁ τὴν ἀξίαν μὴ συγχεὼν τῶν τιμωμένων, καὶ ὁ προηγουμένως ἱερεῖον ἑαυτὸν προσάγων.—HIEROCL. in Pythag.

I HAVE read over this book which the assembly of divines is pleased to call, "The Directory for Prayer." I confess I came to it with much expectation, and was in some measure confident I should have found it an exact and unblamable model of devotion, free from all those objections which men of their own persuasion had obtruded against the public liturgy of the church of England; or, at least, it should have been composed with so much artifice and fineness, that it might have been to all the world an argument of their learning and excellency of spirit, if not of the goodness and integrity of their religion and purposes. I shall give no other character of the whole, but that the public disrelish which I find amongst persons of great piety, of all qualities, not only of great, but even of ordinary understandings, is to me some argument that it lies so open to the objections even of common spirits, that the compilers of it did intend more to prevail by the success of their armies, than the strength of reason, and the proper grounds of persuasion, which yet most wise and good men believe to be the more christian way of the two. But because the judgment I made of it from an argument so extrinsical to the nature of the thing, could not reasonably enable me to satisfy those many persons, who, in their behalf, desired me to consider it, I resolved to look upon it nearer, and to take its account from something that was ingredient to its constitution,

"that I might be able both to exhort and convince the gainsayers," who refuse to hold fast πιστὸν λόγον κατὰ τὴν διδαχὴν, that "faithful word which they had been taught" by their mother, the church of England.

2. I shall decline to speak of the efficient cause of this directory, and not quarrel at it, that it was composed against the laws both of England and all christendom. If the thing were good and pious, and did not, directly or accidentally, invade the rights of a just superior, I would learn to submit to the imposition, and never quarrel at the incompetency of his authority, that engaged me to do pious and holy things. And it may be, when I am a little more used to it, I shall not wonder at a synod, in which not one bishop sits, in the capacity of a bishop, though I am most certain, this is the first example in England, since it was first christened. But, for the present, it seems something hard to digest it, because I know so well that all assemblies of the church have admitted priests to consultation and dispute, but never to authority and decision, till the pope enlarging the phylacteries of the archimandrites and abbots, did sometimes, by way of privilege and dispensation, give to some of them decisive voices in public councils; but this was one of the things in which he did innovate and invade against the public resolutions of christendom, though he durst not do it often, and yet when he did it, it was in very small and inconsiderable numbers.

3. I said, I would not meddle with the efficient, and I cannot meddle with the final cause, nor guess at any other ends and purposes of theirs, than at what they publicly profess, which is the abolition and destruction of the book of common-prayer; which great change, because they are pleased to call reformation, I am content, in charity, to believe they think it so, and that they have "zelum Dei," but whether "secundum scientiam," "according to knowledge," or no, must be judged by them who consider the matter and the form.

4. But because the matter is of so great variety and minute consideration, every part whereof would require as much scrutiny as I purpose to bestow upon the whole, I have, for the present, chosen to consider only the form of it; concerning which, I shall give my judgment without any sharpness or bitterness of spirit; for I am resolved not to be angry with any men of another persuasion, as knowing that I differ just as much from them as they do from me.

5. The directory takes away that form of prayer which, by the authority and consent of all the obliging power of the kingdom, hath been used and enjoined ever since the reformation. But this was done by men of differing spirits, and of disagreeing interests; some of them consented to it, that they might take away all set forms of prayer, and give way to every man's spirit; the other, that they might take away this form, and give way and countenance to their own. The first is an enemy to all deliberation: the second, to all authority. They will have no man to deliberate; these would have none but themselves. The former are unwise and rash; the latter are pleased with themselves, and are full of opinion. They must be considered apart, for they have rent the question in pieces, and with the fragment in his hand, every man hath run his own way.

QUESTION I.

6. First, of them that deny all set forms, though in the subject matter they were confessed innocent and blameless.

7. And here I consider that the true state of the question is only this, Whether it is better to pray to God with consideration, or without? Whether is the wiser man of the two, he who thinks and deliberates what to say, or he that utters his mind as fast as it comes? Whether is the better man, he who, out of reverence to God, is most careful and curious that he offend not in his tongue, and, therefore, he himself deliberates, and takes the best guides he can; or he who, out of the confidence of his own abilities, or other exterior assistances, ὅμοιος εἶη τοῖς εἰκῇ, καὶ φορτικῶς, καὶ χύδην,—ὅ, τι ἂν ἐπελθῇ, λέγουσι;[a] speaks whatever comes uppermost.

8. And here I wave the advice and counsel of a very wise man, no less than Solomon, "Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thy heart be hasty to utter any thing before God; for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth; therefore, let thy words be few."[b] The consideration of the vast distance between God and us, heaven and earth, should create such apprehensions in us, that the very best and choicest of our offertories are not acceptable but by God's gracious vouchsafing and condescension: and, therefore, since we are so much indebted to God for accepting our best, it is not safe ventured to present him with a dough-baked sacrifice, and put him off with that, which in nature and human consideration is absolutely the worst; for such is all the crude and imperfect utterance of our more imperfect conceptions: "Hoc non probo in philosopho, cujus oratio, sicut vita, debet esse composita," said Seneca; "A wise man's speech should be like his life and actions, composed, studied, and considered." And if ever inconsideration be the cause of sin and vanity, it is in our words, and therefore is, with greatest care, to be avoided in our prayers, we being most of all concerned that God may have no quarrel against them, for folly or impiety.

9. But, abstracting from the reason, let us consider who keeps the precept best, he that deliberates, or he that considers not when he speaks? What man in the world is hasty to offer any thing unto God, if he be not, who prays extempore? And then add to it but the weight of Solomon's reason, and let any man answer me, if he thinks it can well stand with that reverence we owe to the immense, the infinite, and to the eternal God, the God of wisdom, to offer him a sacrifice, which we durst not present to a prince or a prudent governor, "in re seriâ," such as our prayers ought to be.

10. And that this may not be dashed with a pretence it is carnal reasoning, I desire it may be remembered, that it is the argument God himself uses against lame, maimed, and imperfect sacrifices, "Go and offer this to thy prince," see if he will accept it; implying, that the best person is to have the best present; and what the prince will slight as truly unworthy of him, much more is it unfit for God. For God accepts not of any thing we give or do, as if he were bettered by it; for, therefore, its estimate is not taken by its relation or natural complacency to him, for, in itself, it is to him as nothing: but God accepts it by its proportion and commensuration to us. That which we call our best, and is truly so in human estimate, that pleases God; for it declares, that if we had better we would give it him. But to reserve the best, says too plainly, that we think any thing is good enough for him. As therefore God, in the law, would not be served by that which was imperfect "in genere naturæ:" so neither now, nor ever, will that please him which is imperfect "in genere morum," or "materiâ intellectuali," when we can give a better.

11. And, therefore, the wisest nations, and the most sober persons, prepared their verses and prayers in set forms with as much religion as they dressed their sacrifices, and observed the rites of festivals and burials. Amongst the Romans, it belonged to the care of the priests to worship in prescribed and determined words. "In omni precatione qui vota effundit sacerdos, Vestam et Janum aliosque deos præscriptis verbis et composito carmine advocare solet."[c] The Greeks did so too, receiving their prayers by dictate, word for word. "Itaque sua carmina suæque precationes singulis diis institutæ sunt; quas plerumque, nequid præposterè dicatur, aliquis ex præscripto præire et ad verbum referre solebat:"[d] "Their hymns and prayers were ordained peculiar to every god, which, lest any thing should be said preposterously, were usually pronounced, word for word, after the priest, and out of written copies; and the magi among the Persians were as considerate in their devotions; "Magos et Persas primo semper diluculo canere diis hymnos et laudes, meditato et solenni precationis carmine;"[e] "The Persians sang hymns to their gods by the morning twilight, in a premeditate, solemn, and metrical form of prayer," saith the same author. For, since in all the actions and discourses of men, that which is the least considered is likely to be the worst, and is certainly of the greatest disreputation, it were a strange cheapness of opinion, towards God and religion, to be the most incurious of what we say to him; and in our religious offices, it is strange that every thing should be considered but our prayers. It is spoken by Eunapius, to the honour of Proæresius's scholars, that when the proconsul asked their judgments in a question of philosophy, they were προσενεγκόντες τὰ Ἀριστείδου μετὰ πολλῆς σκέψεως καὶ πόνου, ὡς οὐκ εἰσὶ τῶν ἐμούντων, ἀλλὰ τῶνὰ κριβούντων,[f] "they, with much consideration and care, gave, in answer, those words of Aristides, 'that they were not of the number of those that used to vomit out answers, but of those that considered every word they were to speak.'" "Nihil enim ordinatum est quod præcipitatur et properat," said Seneca; "Nothing can be regular and orderly that is hasty and precipitate;" and, therefore, unless religion be the most imprudent, trifling and inconsiderable thing, and that the work of the Lord is done well enough when it is done negligently, or that the sanctuary hath the greatest beauty when it hath the least order, it will concern us highly to think our prayers and religious offices are actions fit for wise men, and, therefore, to be done as the actions of wise men use to be, that is, deliberately, prudently, and with greatest consideration.

12. Well then, in the nature of the thing, extempore forms have much the worse of it. But it is pretended that there is such a thing as the gift of prayer, a praying with the Spirit; "Et nescit tarda molimina Spiritus sancti gratia," God's Spirit, if he pleases, can do his work as well in an instant as in long premeditation. And to this purpose are pretended those places of Scripture, which speak of assistance of God's Spirit in our prayers: "And I will pour upon the house of David, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the Spirit of grace and supplication."[g] But especially Rom. viii. 26. "Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities, for we know not what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered," &c. From whence the conclusion that is inferred is, in the words of St Paul, "that we must pray with the Spirit," therefore, not with set forms, therefore extempore.

13. The collection is somewhat wild, for there is great independency in the several parts; and much more is in the conclusion than was virtually in the premises. But such as it is, the authors of it, I suppose, will own it. And, therefore, we will examine the main design of it, and then consider the particular means of its persuasion, quoted in the objection.

14. It is one of the privileges of the gospel, and the benefit of Christ's ascension, that the Holy Ghost is given unto the church, and is become to us the fountain of gifts and graces. But these gifts and graces are improvements and helps of our natural faculties, of our art and industry, not extraordinary, miraculous, and immediate infusions of habits and gifts. That without God's Spirit we cannot pray aright, that our infirmities need his help, that we know not what to ask of ourselves, is most true; and if ever any heretic was more confident of his own naturals, or did ever more undervalue God's grace, than the Pelagian did, yet he denies not this: but what then? therefore without study, without art, without premeditation, without learning, the Spirit gives the gift of prayer, and is it his grace that, without any natural or artificial help, makes us pray extempore? No such thing: the objection proves nothing of this.

15. Here, therefore, we will join issue, whether the gifts and helps of the Spirit be immediate infusions of the faculties, and powers, and perfect abilities? Or that he doth assist us only by his aids, external and internal, in the use of such means which God and nature had given to man, to ennoble his soul, better his faculties, and to improve his understanding? That the aids of the Holy Ghost are only assistances to us, in the use of natural and artificial means, I will undertake to prove; and from thence it will evidently follow, that labour, and hard study, and premeditation, will soonest purchase the gift of prayer, and ascertain us of the assistance of the Spirit; and, therefore, set forms of prayer, studied and considered of, are in a true and proper sense, and without enthusiasm, the fruits of the Spirit.

16. First; God's Spirit did assist the apostles by ways extraordinary, and fit for the first institution of christianity; but doth assist us now by the expresses of those first assistances which he gave to them immediately.

17. Thus the Holy Ghost brought to their memory all things which Jesus spake and did, and, by that means, we come to know all that the Spirit knew to be necessary for us, the Holy Ghost being author of our knowledge, by being the fountain of the revelation; and we are, therefore, θεοδίδακτοι, "taught by God," because the Spirit of God revealed the articles of our religion, that they might be known to all ages of the church; and this is testified by St. Paul: "He gave some apostles, and some prophets," &c. "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man," &c. This was the effect of Christ's ascension, when he "gave gifts unto men," that is, when he sent the Spirit, the verification of the promise of the Father. The effect of this immission of the Holy Ghost was to fill all things, and that for ever; to build up the church of God until the day of consummation; so that the Holy Ghost abides with the church for ever, by transmitting those revelations, which he taught the apostles, to all christians in succession. Now as the Holy Ghost taught the apostles, and, by them, still teaches us what to believe; so it is certain he taught the apostles how and what to pray; and because it is certain that all the rules concerning our duty in prayer, and all those graces which we are to pray for, are transmitted to us by derivation from the apostles, whom the Holy Ghost did teach even to that very purpose also, that they should teach us: it follows evidently, that the gift of prayer is a gift of the Holy Ghost; and yet to verify this proposition, we need no other immediate inspiration or extraordinary assistance, than that we derive from the Holy Ghost, by the conveyance of the apostolical sermons and writings.

18. The reason is the same in faith and prayer; and if there were any difference in the acquisition or reception, faith certainly needs a more immediate infusion, as being of greatest necessity, and yet a grace to which we least co-operate, it being the first of graces, and less of the will in it than any other. But yet the Holy Ghost is the author of our faith, and "we believe with the Spirit" (it is St. Paul's expression); and yet our "belief comes by hearing and reading" the Holy Scriptures, and their interpretations. Now reconcile these two together, "Faith comes by hearing," and yet "is the gift of the Spirit;"[h] and it says that the gifts of the Spirit are not ecstasies and immediate infusions of habits, but helps from God, to enable us, upon the use of the means of his own appointment, to believe, to speak, to understand, to prophesy, and to pray.

19. But whosoever shall look for any other gifts of the Spirit, besides the parts of nature helped by industry and God's blessing upon it, and the revelations or the supplies of matter in Holy Scripture, will be very far to seek, having neither reason, promise, nor experience of his side. For why should the spirit of prayer be any other than as the gift and "spirit of faith," as St. Paul calls it,[i] acquired by human means, using Divine aids? that is, by our endeavours in hearing, reading, catechizing, desires to obey, and all this blessed and promoted by God, this produces faith. Nay, it is true of us what Christ told his apostles, "sine me nihil potestis facere;" not "nihil magnum aut difficile," but "omninò nihil," as St. Austin observes. "Without me ye can do nothing:" and yet we were not capable of a law, or of reward or punishment, if neither with him, nor without him, we were able to do any thing. And, therefore, although in the midst of all our cooperation we may say to God, in the words of the prophet, "Domine, omnia opera operatus es in nobis," "O Lord, thou hast wrought all our works in us," yet they are "opera nostra" still; God works, and we work: first is the χάρις φερομένη, God's grace is brought to us, he helps and gives us abilities, and then expects our duty. And if the spirit of prayer be of greater consequence than all the works God hath wrought in us besides, and hath the promise of a special prerogative, let the first be proved, and the second be shown in any good record, and then I will confess the difference.

20. The parallel of this argument I the rather urge, because I find praying in the Holy Ghost joined with graces, which are as much God's gifts and productions of the Spirit, as any thing in the world, and yet which the apostle presses upon us as duties, and things put into our power, to be improved by our industry, and those are faith (in which I before instanced) and charity. "But ye, beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, keep yourselves in the love of God."[k] All of the same consideration, faith, and prayer, and charity, all gifts of the Spirit, and yet "build up yourselves in faith, and keep yourselves in love," and therefore, by a parity of reason, improve yourselves in the spirit of prayer; that is, God, by his Spirit, having supplied us with matter, let our industry and co-operations, "per modum naturæ," improve these gifts, and build upon this foundation.

21. Thus the Spirit of God is called "the Spirit of adoption, the Spirit of counsel, the Spirit of grace, the Spirit of meekness, the Spirit of wisdom." And, without doubt, he is the Fountain of all these to us all, and that for ever, and yet it cannot reasonably be supposed, but that we must stir up the graces of God in us, co-operate with his assistances, study in order to counsel, labour and consider in order to wisdom, give all diligence to make our calling and election sure, in order to our adoption, in which we are sealed by the Spirit. Now these instances are of gifts, as well as graces; and since the days of wonder and need of miracles is expired, there is no more reason to expect inspiration of gifts, than of graces, without our endeavours. It concerns the church rather to have these secured than those, and yet the Spirit of God puts it upon the condition of our co-operation; for, according to the proverb of the old moralists, "Deus habet sinum facilem, non perforatum," "God's bosom is apt and easy" to the emission of graces and assistances, but it is not loose and ungirt; something must be done on our part, we must improve the talents and swell the bank; for if either we lay them up in a napkin or spend them, suppress the Spirit or extinguish it, we shall dearly account for it.

[h] Rom. x. 17. Ephes. ii. 8.

[i] 2 Cor. iv. 13. [k] Epist. Jude, ver. 20.

22. In the mean time, if we may lose the gifts by our own fault, we may purchase them by our diligence; if we may lessen them by our incuriousness, we may increase them by study; if we may quench the Spirit, then also we may re-enkindle it: all which are evident probation that the Holy Ghost gives us assistances to improve our natural powers, and to promote our acquisite, and his aids are not inspirations of the habit, or infusions of a perfect gift, but a subliming of what God gave us in the stock of nature and art, to make it in a sufficient order to an end supernatural and divine.

23. The same doctrine we are taught by St. Paul's exhortation to Timothy: "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery."[l] And again, "Stir up the gift of God which is in thee by the laying on of my hands."[m] If there be any gifts of the Holy Ghost and spiritual influences, dispensed without our co-operation, and by inspiration of the entire power, it is in ordination; and the persons so ordained are most likely to receive the gift of prayer, if any such thing be for the edification of the church, they being the men appointed to intercede, and to stand between God and the people; and yet this gift of God, even in those times when they were dispensed with miracle, and assistances extraordinary, were given, as all things now are given, by the means also of our endeavour, and was capable of improvement by industry, and of defailance by neglect; and therefore much rather is it so now, in the days of ordinary ministration and common assistances.

24. And indeed this argument, beside the efficacy of its persuasion, must needs conclude against the men to whom these "adversaria" are addressed, because themselves call upon their disciples to exercise the gift of prayer,[n] and offer it to consideration, that such exercising it is the way to better it; and if natural endowments and artificial endeavours are the way to purchase new degrees of it, it were not amiss they did consider a little before they begin, and did improve their first and smallest capacities before they ventured any thing in public, by way of address to almighty God. For the first beginnings are certainly as improvable as the next degrees, and it is certain they have more need of it, as being more imperfect and rude. Therefore, whenever God's Spirit hath given us any capacities or assistances, any documents, motions, desires, or any aids whatsoever, they are, therefore, given us with a purpose we should, by our industry, skill, and labour, improve them, because without such co-operation, the intention is made void, and the work imperfect.

25. And this is exactly the doctrine I plainly gather from the objected words of St. Paul. "The Spirit helpeth our infirmities," συναντιλαμβάνεται, it is, in the Greek, "collaborantem adjuvat." It is an ingeminate expression of our labours. And that supposes us to have faculties capable of improvement and an obligation to labour, and that the effect of having the gift of prayer depends upon the mutual course, that is, upon God blessing our powers and our endeavours. And if this way the Spirit performs his promise sufficiently, and does all that we need, and all that he ties himself to; he that will multiply his hopes further than what is sufficient, or what is promised, may possibly deceive himself, but never deceive God, and make him multiply and continue miracles to justify his fancy.

26. Better it is to follow the Scriptures for our guide, as in all things else, so in this particular. "Take the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God; praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit."[o] "The word of God" is "the sword of the Spirit;" "praying in the Spirit," is one way of using it, indeed the only way that he here specifies. "Praying in the Spirit," then, being the using of this sword, and this sword being the word of God, it follows evidently, that praying in the Spirit is praying in, or according to, the word of God, that is, in the directions, rules, and expresses of the word of God, that is, of the Holy Scriptures. For we have many infirmities, and we need the Spirit to help; as doubting, coldness, weariness, disrelish of heavenly things, indifferency; and these are enough to interpret the place quoted in the objection, without tying him to make words for us, to no great religious purposes, when God hath done that for us, in other manner than what we dream of.

27. So that, in effect, praying in the Holy Ghost, or with the Spirit, is nothing but prayer for such things, and in such manner, which God, by his Spirit, hath taught us in Holy Scripture. Holy prayers, "spiritual songs," so the apostle calls one part of prayer, viz. "eucharistical or thanksgiving," that is, prayers or songs which are spiritual "in materiâ." And if they be called spiritual for the efficient cause too, the Holy Ghost being the author of them, it comes all to one; for therefore he is the cause and giver of them, because he hath, in his word, revealed what things we are to pray for, and there, also, hath taught us the manner.

[l] 1 Tim. iv. 14. [m] 2 Tim. i. 6.

[n] "So as that hereby they become not slothful and negligent in stirring up the gifts of Christ in them. But that each one, by meditation, by taking heed, &c. may be careful to furnish his heart and tongue with further or other materials," &c.—Preface to the Directory.

28. And this I plainly prove from the words of St. Paul before quoted, "The Spirit helpeth our infirmities, for we know not what we should pray for as we ought."[p] In this we are infirm, that we know not our own needs, nor our own advantages: when the Holy Ghost hath taught us what to ask, and to ask that as we ought, then he hath healed our infirmities, and our ignorances in the matter and the manner; then we know what to pray for as we ought, then we have the grace of prayer, and the spirit of supplication. And, therefore, in the instance before mentioned, concerning spiritual songs, when the apostle had twice enjoined the use of them in order to prayer and preaching, to instruction and to eucharist, and those to be done by the aid of Christ, and Christ's Spirit; what in one place he calls, "being filled with the Spirit,"[q] in the other he calls, "the dwelling of the word of Christ in us richly;"[r] plainly intimating to us that when we are mighty in the Scriptures, full of the word of Christ, then we are filled with the Spirit, because the Spirit is the great dictator of them to us, and the remembrancer; and when, by such helps of Scripture, we sing hymns to God's honour, and our mutual comfort, then we sing and give thanks in the Spirit. And this is evident, if you consult the places, and compare them.

29. And that this is for this reason called a "gift and grace," or issue of the Spirit, is so evident and notorious, that the speaking of an ordinary revealed truth, is called in Scripture, "a speaking by the Spirit."[s] "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost."[t] For, though the world could not acknowledge Jesus for the Lord, without a revelation, yet now that we are taught this truth by Scripture, and by the preaching of the apostles to which they were enabled by the Holy Ghost, we need no revelation or enthusiasm to confess this truth, which we are taught in our creeds and catechisms; and as this light sprang first from the emission of a ray from God's Spirit, we must for ever acknowledge him the fountain of our light. Though we cool our thirst at the mouth of the river, yet we owe for our draughts to the springs and fountains from whence the waters first came, though derived to us by the succession of a long current. If the Holy Ghost supplies us with materials and fundamentals for our building, it is then enough to denominate the whole edifice to be of him, although the labour and the workmanship be ours upon another stock. And this is it which the apostle speaks, "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual."[u] "The Holy Ghost teaches," yet it is upon our co-operation, our study and endeavour; "while we compare spiritual things with spiritual," the Holy Ghost is said to teach us, because these spirituals were of his suggestion and revelation.

30. For it is a rule of the school, and there is much reason in it, "Habitus infusi infunduntur per modum acquisitorum," "whatsoever is infused into us is in the same manner infused as other things are acquired," that is, step by step, by human means and co-operation; and grace does not give us new faculties, and create another nature, but meliorates and improves our own. And therefore, what the Greeks called ἕξεις, "habits," the christians used to call δόσεις and δωρήματα, "gifts," because we derive assistances from above to heighten the habits, and facilitate the actions, in order to a more noble and supernatural end. And what St. Paul said in the resurrection, is also true in this question, "that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural,—and then that which is spiritual." The graces and gifts of the Spirit are postnate, and are additions to art and nature. God directs our counsels, opens our understandings, regulates our will, orders our affections, supplies us with objects, and arguments, and opportunities, and revelations, "in scriptis," and then most when we most employ our own endeavours, God loving to bless all the means and instruments of his service, whether they be natural or acquisite.

31. So that now I demand, whether, since the expiration of the age of miracles, God's Spirit does not most assist us when we most endeavour and most use the means? He that says "no," discourages all men from reading the Scriptures, from industry, from meditation, from conference, from human arts and sciences, and from whatsoever else God and good laws provoke us to by proposition of rewards. But if "yea," (as most certainly God will best crown the best endeavours,) then the spirit of prayer is greatest in him, who (supposing the like capacities and opportunities) studies hardest, reads most, practises most religiously, deliberates most prudently; and then, by how much want of means is worse than the use of means, by so much extempore prayers are worse than deliberate and studied. Excellent, therefore, is the counsel of St. Peter. "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God:" not lightly, then, and inconsiderately. "If any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth:"[x] great reason then to put all his abilities and faculties to it: and whether of the two does most likely do that, he that takes pains, and considers and discusses, and so approves and practises a form,—or he that never considers what he says, till he says it,—needs not much deliberation to pass a sentence. Only, methinks it is most unreasonable, that we should be bound to prepare ourselves with due requisites, to hear what they shall speak in public, and that they should not prepare what to speak; as if to speak were of easier or of less consideration, than to hear what is spoken; or if they do prepare what to speak to the people, it were also very fit they prepared their prayers, and considered beforehand of the fitness of the offertory they present to God.

32. Lastly; did not the penmen of the Scripture write the epistles and gospels respectively all by the Spirit? Most certainly, "holy men of God spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," saith St. Peter. And certainly they were moved by a more immediate motion, and a motion nearer to an enthusiasm, than now-a-days in "the gift and spirit of prayer." And yet, in the midst of those great assistances and motions they did use study, art, industry, and human abilities.[y] This is more than probable in the different styles of the several books, some being of admirable art, others lower and plain. The words were their own; at least, sometimes, not the Holy Ghost's. And if Origen, St. Jerome, and especially the Greek fathers, scholiasts and grammarians, were not deceived by false copies, but that they truly did observe, sometimes to be impropriety of an expression in the language, sometimes not true Greek, who will think those errors or imperfections in grammar were (in respect of the words, I say, precisely) immediate inspirations and dictates of the Holy Ghost, and not rather their own productions of industry and humanity? But clearly, some of their words were the words of Aratus, some of Epimenides: some of Menander, some of St. Paul, "This speak I, not the Lord."[z] Some were the words of Moses, even all that part of the Levitical law which concerned divorces, and concerning which our blessed Saviour affirms, that "Moses permitted it, because of the hardness of their hearts, but from the beginning it was not so:" and divers others of the same nature, collected and observed to this purpose, by Origen,[a] St. Basil,[b] St. Ambrose;[c] and particularly that promise which St. Paul made "of calling upon the Corinthians as he passed into Macedonia," which certainly, in all reason, is to be presumed to have been spoken "humanitùs," and not by immediate inspiration and infusion, because St. Paul was so hindered that he could not be as good as his word, and yet the Holy Ghost could have foreseen it, and might better have excused it, if St. Paul had laid it upon his score; but he did not, and it is reasonable enough to believe there was no cause he should; and yet, because the Holy Ghost renewed their memory, improved their understanding, supplied to some their want of human learning, and so assisted them, that they should not commit an error in fact or opinion, neither in the narrative nor dogmatical parts, therefore they wrote "by the Spirit." Since that, we cannot pretend, upon any grounds of probability, to an inspiration so immediate as theirs, and yet their assistances which they had from the Spirit, did not exclude human arts and industry, but that the ablest scholar did write the best, much rathe is this true in the gifts and assistances we receiv and particularly in "the gift of prayer;" it is n an extempore and an inspired faculty, but the facu ties of nature, and the abilities of art and industr are improved and ennobled by the supervening a sistances of the Spirit. And if these who pray ex tempore, say that the assistance they receive fro the Spirit, is the inspiration of words and powe without the operations of art and natural abilitie and human industry, then, besides that it is mo than the penmen of Scripture sometimes had, (b cause they needed no extraordinary assistance to what they could, of themselves, do upo the stock of other abilities,) besides this, I say, must follow that such prayers, so inspired, if the were committed to writing, would prove as goo canonical Scripture as any is in St Paul's epistles the impudence of which pretension is sufficient t prove the extreme vanity of the challenge.

33. The sum is this: Whatsoever this gift is, o this spirit of prayer, it is to be acquired by huma industry, by learning of the Scriptures, by reading by conference, and by whatsoever else faculties ar improved, and habits enlarged. God's Spirit hath done his work sufficiently this way, and he love not, either in nature or grace, which are his tw great sanctions, to multiply miracles when there i no need.

34. And now let us take a man that pretends h hath the "gift of prayer," and loves to pray extem pore,—I suppose his thoughts go a little before his tongue; I demand, then, whether cannot this man when it is once come into his head, hold his tongue and write down what he hath conceived? If his first conceptions were of God, and God's Spirit, ther they are so still, even when they are written. O is the Spirit departed from him, upon the sight of a pen and ink-horn? It did use to be otherwis among the old and new prophets, whether they were prophets of prediction, or of ordinary ministry. But if his conception may be written, and being written, is still a production of the Spirit; then i follows, that "set forms of prayer," deliberate, and described, may as well be a praying with the Spirit, as sudden forms and extempore outlets.

35. Now the case being thus put, I would fain know what the difference is between deliberate and extempore prayers, save only that in these there is less consideration and prudence; for that the other are (at least as much as these) the productions of the Spirit, is evident in the very case put in this argument: and whether to consider and to weigh them be any disadvantage to our devotions, I leave it to all wise men to determine; so that in effect, since, after the pretended assistance of the Spirit in our prayers, we may write them down, consider them, try the spirits, and ponder the matter, the reason, and the religion of the address; let the world judge whether this sudden utterance and extempore forms, be any thing else but a direct resolution not to consider beforehand what we speak. "Sic itaque habe, ut istam vim dicendi rapidam aptiorem esse circulanti judices, quàm agenti rem magnam et seriam, docentique." They are the words of Seneca, and express what naturally flows from the premises. The pretence of the spirit, and the gift of prayer, is not sufficient to justify the dishonour they do to religion, in serving it in the lowest and most indeliberate manner, nor quit such men from unreasonableness and folly, who will dare to speak to God in the presence of the people, and in their behalf, without deliberation, or learning, or study. Nothing is a greater disreputation to the prudence of a discourse, than to say it was a thing made up in haste, that is, without due considering.

36. But here I consider, and I wish they whom it concerns most would do so too: that to pretend the Spirit, in so unreasonable a manner, to so ill purposes, and without reason, or promise, or probability for doing it, is a very great crime, and of dangerous consequence. It was the greatest aggravation of the sin of Ananias and Sapphira, ψεύσασθαι τὸ ἅγιον τὸ πνεῦμα, that they did falsely pretend and "belie the Holy Spirit;" which crime, besides that it dishonours the Holy Ghost, to make him the president of imperfect and illiterate rites, the author of confusion, and indeliberate discourses, and the parent of such productions, which a wise person would blush to own: it also entitles him to all those doctrines which either chance or design shall expose to the people, in such prayers to which they entitle the Holy Spirit as the author and immediate dictator. So that if they please, he must not only own their follies, but their impieties too; and how great disreputation this is to the Spirit of wisdom, of counsel, and of holiness, I wish they may rather understand by discourse than by experiment.

37. But let us look a little further into the mystery, and see what is meant in Scripture by "praying with the spirit." In what sense the Holy Ghost is called the "Spirit of prayer," I have already shown; viz. by the same reason as he is the "Spirit of faith, of prudence, of knowledge, of understanding," and the like, because he gives us assistances for the acquiring of these graces, and furnishes us with revelations by way of object and instruction. But "praying with the spirit" hath besides this other senses also in Scripture. I find in one place, that we then pray with the spirit, when the Holy Ghost does actually excite us to desires and earnest tendencies to the obtaining our holy purpose, when he prepares our hearts to pray, when he enkindles our desires, gives us zeal and devotion, charity and fervour, spiritual violence and holy importunity. This sense is also in the latter part of the objected words of St. Paul,[d] "The Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings." And, indeed, this is truly a praying with the Spirit; but this will do our reverend brethren of the assembly little advantage as to the present question. For this Spirit is not a spirit of utterance, not at all clamorous in the ears of the people; but cries aloud in the ears of God, with "groans unutterable," so it follows, and only "he that searcheth the heart, he understandeth the meaning of the Spirit."[e] This is the Spirit of the Son, which "God hath sent into our hearts," (not into our tongues,) "whereby we cry, Abba Father."[f] And this is the great αὐθεντία for mental prayer, which is properly and truly praying by the Spirit.

38. Another praying with the spirit I find in that place of St. Paul, from whence this expression is taken, and commonly used, "I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also." It is generally supposed that St. Paul relates here to a special and extraordinary gift of prayer, which was indulged to the primitive bishops and priests, the apostles and rulers of churches, and to some other persons extraordinarily, of being able to compose prayers, pious in the matter, prudent in the composure, devout in the forms, expressive in the language; and, in short, useful to the church, and very apt for devotion, and serving to her religion and necessities. I believe that such a gift there was, and this indulged, as other issues of the Spirit, to some persons upon special necessities, by singular dispensation, as the Spirit knew to be most expedient for the present need, and the future instruction. This I believe, not because I find sufficient testimony that it was so, or any evidence from the words now alleged; but because it was reasonable it should be so, and agreeable to the other proceedings of the Holy Ghost. For although we account it an easy matter to make prayers, and we have great reason to give thanks to the Holy Ghost for it, who hath descended so plentifully upon the church, hath made plentiful revelation of all the public and private necessities of the world, hath taught us how to pray, given rules for the manner of address, taught us how to distinguish spiritual from carnal things, hath represented the vanity of worldly desires, the unsatisfyingness of earthly possessions, the blessing of being denied our impertinent, secular, and indiscreet requests, and hath done all this at the beginning of christianity, and hath actually stirred up the apostles and apostolical men to make so many excellent forms of prayer, which their successors did in part retain, and in part imitate, till the conjunct wisdom of the church saw her offices complete, regular, and sufficient. So that now every man is able to make something of forms of prayer, (for which ability they should do well to pay their eucharist to the Holy Ghost, and not abuse the gift to vanity or schism;) yet at the first beginning of christianity, till the Holy Spirit did fill all things, they found no such plenty of forms of prayer; and it was accounted a matter of so great consideration to make a form of prayer, that it was thought a fit work for a prophet, or the founder of an institution. And, therefore, the disciples of John asked of him, "to teach them how to pray;" and the disciples of Christ did so too. For the law of Moses had no rules to instruct the synagogue how to pray; and but that Moses, and David, and Asaph, and some few of the prophets more, left "forms of prayer" which the Spirit of God inspired them withal, upon great necessities, and great mercy to that people, they had not known how to have composed an office for the daily service of the temple, without danger of asking things needless, vain, or impious; such as were the prayers in the Roman closets, that he was a good man that would not own them:

> Et nihil arcano qui roget ore Deos.—MART.
>
> ———Pulchra Laverna
> Da mihi fallere, da justum, sanctumque videri;
> Noctem peccatis, et fraudibus objice nubem. HOR.

But when the Holy Ghost came down in a full breath and a mighty wind, he filled the breasts and tongues of men, and furnished the first christians, not only with abilities enough to frame excellent devotions for their present offices, but also to become precedents for liturgy to all ages of the church, the first being imitated by the second, and the second by the third, till the church being settled in peace, and the records transmitted with greater care, and preserved with less hazard, the church chose such forms, whose copies we retain at this day.

39. Now since it was certain that all ages of the church would look upon the first fathers in Christ, and founders of churches, as precedents, or tutors, and guides, in all the parts of their religion, and that "prayer," with its several parts and instances, is a great portion of the religion, (the sacraments themselves being instruments of grace, and effectual in "genere orationis,") it is very reasonable to think that the apostolical men had not only the "first-fruits," but the "elder brother's share," a double portion of the Spirit; because they were not only to serve their own needs, to which a single and an ordinary portion would have been then, as now, abundantly sufficient, but also to serve the necessity of the succession, and to instruct the church for ever after.

40. But then, that this assistance was an ability to pray extempore, I find it no where affirmed by sufficient authentic testimony; and if they could have done it, it is very likely they would have been wary and restrained in the public use of it. I doubt not but there might then be some sudden necessities of the church, for which the church, being in her infancy, had not as yet provided any public forms; concerning which cases I may say, as Quintilian of an orator in the great and sudden needs of the commonwealth: "Quarum si qua, non dico cuicunque innocentium civium, sed amicorum ac propinquorum alicui evenerit, stabitne mutus, et salutarem petentibus vocem, statim, si non succurratur, perituris, moras et secessum et silentium quæret, dum illa verba fabricentur, et memoriæ insidant, et vox ac latus præparetur?"[g] I do not think that they were "oratores imparati ad casus," but that an ability of praying on a sudden was indulged to them by a special aid of the Spirit, to contest against sudden dangers, and the violence of new accidents; to which also possibly a new inspiration was but for a very little while necessary, even till they understood the mysteries of christianity, and the revelations of the Spirit by proportion and analogy to which they were sufficiently instructed, to make their sudden prayers when sudden occasions did require.

41. This I speak by way of concession and probability: for no man can prove thus much, as I am willing (relying upon the reasonableness of the conjecture) to suppose: but that praying with the Spirit, in this place, is praying without study, art or deliberation, is not so much as intimated.

42. For, first, it is here implied that they did prepare some of those devotions to which they were helped by the Spirit: ὅταν συνέρχεσθε, ἕκαστος ὑμῶν ψαλμὸν ἔχει: "when you come together each of you, peradventure, hath a psalm:" ἔχει, not ποιεῖ, not every one makes, but when you meet, every one hath, viz. already, which supposes they had it prepared against the meeting. For the Spirit could help as well at home in their meditation, as in the public upon a sudden; and though it is certain the Holy Spirit loves to bless the public meetings, the communion of saints, with special benedictions, yet I suppose my adversaries are not willing to acknowledge any thing that should do much reputation to the church, and the public authorized conventions; at least not to confine the Spirit to such holy and blessed meetings: they will, I suppose, rather grant the words do probably intimate, "they came prepared with a hymn;" and, therefore, there is nothing in the nature of the thing, but that so also might their other forms of prayer; the assistance of the Spirit (which is the thing in question) hinders not, but that they also might have made them by premeditation.

43. Secondly, in this place, praying with the Spirit signifies no other extraordinary assistance, but that the Spirit helped them to speak their prayer in an unknown tongue: ἐὰν γὰρ προσεύχωμαι γλώσσῃ, τὸ πνεῦμα προσεύχεται, "If I pray in a tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is without fruit:" what then? "I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also." Plainly here, praying in the spirit, which is opposed to praying in understanding, is praying in an unknown tongue; where, by the way, observe, that praying with the spirit, even in the sense of Scripture, is not always most to edification of the people; not always with understanding. And when these two are separated, St. Paul prefers five words with understanding, before ten thousand in the spirit. For this praying with the spirit was indeed then a gift extraordinary and miraculous, like as prophesying with the spirit, and expired with it. But while it did last, it was the lowest of gifts, "inter dona linguarum," it was but a gift of the tongue, and not to the benefit of the church directly or immediately.

44. This also observe in passing by: if St. Paul did so undervalue the praying with the spirit, that he preferred edifying the church a thousand degrees beyond it; I suppose he would have been of the same mind, if the question had been between praying with the spirit and obeying our superiors, as he was when it was between praying with the spirit and edification of the church; because, if I be not mistaken, it is matter of great concernment towards the edification of the church, to obey our superiors, not to innovate in public forms of worship, especially with the scandal and offence of very wise and learned men, and to the disgrace of the dead martyrs, who sealed our liturgy with their blood.

45. But to return. In this place, praying with the spirit, beside the assistance given by the Holy Ghost to speak in a strange tongue, is no more than "my spirit praying;" that is, it implies my co-operation with the assistance of the Spirit of God, insomuch that the whole action may truly be denominated mine, and is called "of the spirit," only by reason of that collateral assistance. For so St. Paul joins them, as terms identical, and expressive one of another's meaning, as you may please to read 1 Cor. xiv. 14, 15. "I will pray with the spirit, and my spirit truly prayeth." It is the act of our inner man, praying holy and spiritual prayers. But then, indeed, at that time, there was something extraordinary adjoined, for it was in an unknown tongue, the practice of which St. Paul there dislikes. This also will be to none of their purposes: for whether it were extempore, or by premeditation, is not here expressed; or if it had, yet that assistance extraordinary in prayer, if there was any beside the "gift of tongues," which is not here or any where else expressed, is no more transmitted to us, than the speaking tongues in the spirit, or prophesying extempore and by the spirit.

46. But I would add also one experiment, which St. Paul also there adds, by way of instance. If praying with the spirit, in this place, be praying extempore, then so is singing too; for they are expressed in the same place, in the same manner, to the same end, and I know no reason why there should be differing senses put upon them to serve purposes. And now let us have some church music too, though the organs be pulled down; and let any the best psalmist of them all compose a hymn in metrical form, (as Antipater Sidonius in Quintilian, and Licinius Archias in Cicero, could do in their verses,) and sing it to a new tune with perfect and true music, and all this extempore; for all this the Holy Ghost can do if he pleases. But if it be said, that the Corinthian christians composed their songs and hymns according to art and rules of music, by study and industry, and that to this they were assisted by the Spirit; and that this, together with the devotion of their spirit, was singing with the Spirit: then say I, so composing set forms of liturgy by skill, and prudence, and human industry, may be as much praying with the Spirit, as the other is singing with the Spirit; plainly enough. In all the senses of praying with the Spirit, and in all its acceptations in Scripture, to pray or sing with the Spirit, neither of them of necessity implies extempore.

47. The sum or collecta of the premises is this: praying with the Spirit is either, first, when the Spirit stirs up our desires to pray, "per motionem actualis auxilii;" or, secondly, when the Spirit teaches us what or how to pray, telling us the matter and manner of our prayers: thirdly, or lastly, dictating the very words of our prayers. There is no other way in the world to pray with the Spirit, or in the Holy Ghost, that is pertinent to this question. And of this last manner the Scripture determines nothing nor speaks any thing expressly of it; and yet suppose it had, we are certain the Holy Ghost hath supplied us with all these; and yet in set forms of prayer, best of all, I mean there where a difference can be; for, 1. as for the desires and actual motions or incitements to pray, they are indifferent to one or the other, to set forms or to extempore.

48. Secondly: but as to the matter or manner of prayer, it is clearly contained in the expresses and set forms of Scriptures, and there it is supplied to us by the Spirit, for he is the great dictator of it.

49. Thirdly. Now then for the very words. No man can assure me that the words of his "extempore" prayer are the words of the Holy Spirit. It is neither reason nor modesty to expect such immediate assistances to so little purpose, he having supplied us with abilities more than enough to express our desires "aliundè," otherwise than by immediate dictate. But if we will take David's psalter, or the other Hymns of holy Scripture, or any of the prayers which are respersed over the Bible, we are sure enough that they are the words of God's Spirit, mediately or immediately, by way of infusion or ecstasy, by vision, or at least by ordinary assistance. And now, then, what greater confidence can any man have for the excellency of his prayers, and the probability of their being accepted, than when he prays his psalter, or the Lord's prayer, or any other office which he finds consigned in Scripture? When God's Spirit stirs us up to an actual devotion, and then we use the matter he hath described and taught, and the very words which Christ, and Christ's Spirit, and the apostles, and other persons full of the Holy Ghost, did use; if in the world there be any praying with the spirit, I mean, in vocal prayer, this is it.

50. And thus I have examined the entire and full scope of this first question, and rifled their objection, which was the only colour to hide the appearance of its natural deformity at the first sight. The result is this: "Scribendum, ergo,, quoties licebit: si id non dabitur, cogitandum: ab utroque exclusi, debent tamen adniti, ut neque deprehensus orator, neque litigator destitutus esse videatur:"[h] "in making our orations and public advocations, we must write what we mean to speak, as often as we can; when we cannot, yet we must deliberate and study; and when the suddenness of the accident prevents both these, we must use all the powers of art and care, that we have a present mind, and call in all our first provisions, that we be not destitute of matter and words apt for the employment." This was Quintilian's rule for the matter of prudence, and in secular occasions; but when the instance is in religion, and especially in our prayers, it will concern us nearer to be curious and deliberate what we speak in the audience of the eternal God, when our lives, and our souls, and the honour of God, and the reputation of religion, are concerned, and whatsoever is greatest in itself, or dearest to us.

QUESTION II.

51. The second question hath in it something more of difficulty; for the men that own it will give leave that "set forms" may be used, so you give leave to them to make them; but if authority shall interpose, and prescribe a liturgy, every word shall breed a quarrel; and if the matter be innocent, yet the very injunction is tyranny, a restraining of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, it leaves the spirit of a man steril and unprofitable, it is not for edification of the church, and is as destitute of comfort as it is of profit. For God hath not restrained his Spirit to those few that rule the church in prelation above others, but if he hath given to them the spirit of government, he hath given to others the spirit of prayer, and the spirit of prophecy. "Now the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal; for to one is given, by the Spirit, the word of wisdom; to another, the word of knowledge, by the same Spirit." And these, and many other gifts, are given to several members, that they may supply one another, and all join to the edification of the body. And, therefore, that must needs be an imprudent sanction, that so determines the offices of the church, that she cannot be edified by that variety of gifts which the Holy Spirit hath given to several men to that purpose; just as if there should be a canon, that but one sermon should be preached in all churches for ever. Besides, it must needs be, that the devotion of the suppliants must be much retarded by the perpetuity and unalterable reiteration of the same form; for since our affections will certainly vary, and suffer great alteration of degrees and inclinations, it is easier to frame words apt to comply with our affections, than to conform our affections, in all varieties, to the same words. When the forms are daily changed, it is more probable that every man shall find something proportionable to his fancy, which is the great instrument of devotion, than to suppose that any one form should be like manna, fitted to every taste; and, therefore, in prayers, as the affections must be natural, sweet, and proper, so also should the words expressing the affections, issue forth by way of natural emanation. "Sed extemporalis audaciæ atque ipsius temeritatis vel præcipua jucunditas est. Nam ingenio quoque, sicut in agro, quanquam alia diu serantur atque elaborentur, gratiora tamen, quæ suâ sponte nascuntur."[i] And a garment may as well be made to fit the moon, as that one form of prayer should be made apt and proportionable to all men or to any man at all times.

52. This discourse relies wholly upon these two grounds: a liberty to use variety of forms for prayer is more for the edification of the church. Secondly it is part of that liberty which the church hath, and part of the duty of the church, to preserve the liberty of the Spirit in various forms.

53. Before I descend to consideration of the particulars, I must premise this, that the gift or ability of prayer, given to the church, is used either in public or in private, and that which is fit enough for one, is inconvenient in the other; and although a liberty in private may be for edification of good people, when it is piously and discreetly used, yet in the public, if it were indifferently permitted, it would bring infinite inconvenience, and become intolerable, as a sad experience doth too much verify.

54. But now then, this distinction evacuates all the former discourse, and since it is permitted that every man, in private, use what forms he please, the Spirit hath all that liberty that is necessary, and as much as can be convenient; the church may be edified by every man's gift, the affections of all men may be complied withal, words may be fitted to their fancies, their devotions quickened, their weariness helped and supported, and whatsoever benefit may be fancied by variety and liberty, all that may be enjoyed, and every reasonable desire, or weake fancy, be fully satisfied.

55. But since these advantages to devotion are accidental, and do consult with weakness and infirmity, and depend upon irregular variety, for which no antecedent rule can make particular provision it is not to be expected, the public constitution and prescribed forms, which are regular, orderly, and determined, can make provision for particulars, for chances, and for infinite varieties. And if this were any objection against public forms, it would also conclude against all human laws, that they did not make provision for all particular accidents and circumstances that might possibly occur. All public sanctions must be of a public spirit and design, and secure all those excellent things which have influence upon societies and communities of men, and public obligations.

56. Thus, if public forms of prayer be described whose matter is pious and holy, whose design is of universal extent, and provisionary for all public probable, feared, or foreseen events, whose frame and composure is prudent, and by authority competent and high, and whose use and exercise is instrumental to peace and public charity, and all these hallowed by intention, and care of doing glory to God, and advantages to religion, expressed in observation of all such rules and precedents, as are most likely to teach us best, and guide us surest such as are Scriptures, apostolical tradition, primitive practice, and precedents of saints and holy persons, the public can do no more; all the duty is performed, and all the care is taken.

[i] Quintil. Dial. de Oratorib.

57. Now, after all this there are personal necessities and private conveniences or inconveniences, which, if men are not so wise as themselves to provide for, by casting off all prejudice, and endeavouring to grow strong in christianity, men in Christ, and not for ever to be babes in religion, but frame themselves to a capacity of receiving the benefit of the public, without needing other provisions, than what will fit the church in her public capacity; the Spirit of God, and the church taught by him, hath permitted us to comply with our own infirmities, while they are innocent, and to pray, in private, in any form of words which shall be most instrumental to our devotion in the present capacity. "Neque hoc ego ago ut ex tempore dicere malit, sed ut possit." [k]

58. And, indeed, sometimes an exuberant and an active affection, and overflowing of devotion, may descend like anointing from above, and our cup run over, and is not to be contained within the margent of prescribed forms; and though this be not of so great consideration as if it should happen to a man in public, that it is then fit for him, or to be permitted to express it in forms unlimited and undetermined. For there was a case in the days of the inundation of the Spirit, when a man, full of the Spirit, was commanded "to keep silence in the church, and to speak to himself and to God;" [l] yet when this grace is given him in private, he may compose his own liturgy; "Pectus est enim, quod disertos facit, et vis mentis. Ideoque imperitis quoque, si modò sint aliquo affectu concitati, verba non desunt." [m] Only when, in private devotion, we use forms of our own making or choosing, we are concerned to see, that the matter be pious, apt for edification and the present necessity, and without contempt of public prescriptions, or irreverence to God, and in all the rest we are at liberty; [n] only in the Lord, that is, according to the rule of faith, and the analogy of christian religion. For supposing that our devotion be fervent, our intention pious, and the petition καθ' ὁ δεῖ, "according to the will of God." Whatsoever our expressions are, God reads the petition in the character of the spirit, though the words be "brevia, concisa, et singultantium modo ejecta." But then these accidental advantages and circumstances of profit, which may be provided for in private; as they cannot be taken care of in public, so neither is it necessary they should; for those pleasures of sensible devotion are so far from being necessary to the acceptation of prayer, that they are but compliances with our infirmities, and suppose a great weakness in him that needs them, say the masters of spiritual life; and in the strongest prayers and most effectual devotions, are seldomest found; such as was Moses's prayer when he spake nothing,—and Hannah's,—and our blessed Saviour's, when he called upon his Father κραυγαῖς ἰσχυραῖς, "with strong cries," in that great desertion of spirit when he prayed in the garden; in these prayers, the spirit was bound up with the strictness and violence of intention, but could not ease itself with a flood of language and various expression. A great devotion is like a great grief, not so expressive as a moderate passion; tears spend the grief, and variety of language breathes out the devotion; and, therefore, Christ went thrice, and said the same words; he could just speak his sense in a plain expression, but the greatness of his agony was too big for the pleasure of a sweet and sensible expression of devotion.

59. So that, let the devotion be ever so great, set forms of prayer will be expressive enough of any desire, though importunate as extremity itself; but when the spirit is weak, and the devotion imperfect, and the affections dry, though in respect of the precise duty on our part, and the acceptation on God's part, no advantage is got by a liberty of an indifferent, unlimited, and chosen form; and, therefore, in all cases, the whole duty of prayer is secured by public forms; yet other circumstantial and accidental advantages may be obtained by it, and, therefore, let such persons feast themselves in private with sweetmeats, and less nourishing delicacies, weak stomachs must be cared for; yet they must be confessed to have stronger stomachs, and better health, that can feed upon the wholesome food prepared in the common refectories.

60. So that public forms, it is true, cannot be fitted to every man's fancy and affections, especially in an age wherein all public constitutions are protested against; but yet they may be fitted to all necessities, and to every man's duty; and for the pleasing the affections and fancies of men, that may be sometimes convenient, but it is never necessary; and God that suffers dryness of affections many times in his dearest servants, and in their greatest troubles and most excellent devotions, hath, by that sufferance of his given demonstration, that it is not necessary such affections should be complied withal; for then he would never suffer those sterilities, but himself, by a cup of sensible devotion, would water and refresh those drynesses; and if God himself does not, it is not to be expected the church should.

61. And this also is the case of Scripture, for the many discourses of excellent orators and preachers have all those advantages of meeting with the various affections and dispositions of the hearers, and may cause a tear, when all St. Paul's epistles would not; and yet certainly there is no comparison between them, but one chapter of St. Paul is more excellent, and of better use to the substantial part of religion, than all the sermons of St. Chrysostom; and yet there are some circumstances of advantage which human eloquence may have, which are not observed to be in those other more excellent emanations of the Holy Spirit. And, therefore, if the objection should be true, and that conceived forms of prayer, in their great variety, might do some accidental advantages to weaker persons, and stronger fancies, and more imperfect judgments, yet, this instance of Scripture is a demonstration that set and composed devotions may be better; and this reason does not prove the contrary, because the sermons in scripture are infinitely to be preferred before those discourses and orations, which do more comply with the fancies of the people. Nay, we see by experience, that the change of our prayers, or our books, or our company, is so delightful to most persons, that though the change be for the worse, it more complies with their affections than the peremptory and unaltered retaining of the better; but yet this is no good argument to prove that change to be for the better.

[n] Quale est illud apud Tertul. de privatis christianorum precibus, non quidem ab alio dictatis, sed à Scripturarum fontibus derivatis. Illuc suscipientes christiani, manibus expansis, quia innocui; capite nudo, quia non erubescimus; denique, sine monitore, quia de pectore oramus pro omnibus imperatoribus; vitam illis prolixam, imperium securum, domum tutam, exercitus fortes, senatum fidelem, populum probum, orbem quietum, et quæcunque hominis et Cæsaris vota sunt.

62. But yet if such compliance with fancies and affections were necessary, what are we the nearer if every minister were permitted to pray his own forms? How can his form comply with the great variety of affections which are amongst his auditors, any more than the public forms described by authority? It may hit casually, and, by accident, be commensurate to the present fancy of some of his congregation, with which, at that time, possibly the public form would not: this may be thus, and it may be otherwise, and at the same time, in which some feel a gust and relish in his prayer, others might feel a greater sweetness in recitation of the public forms. This thing is so by chance, so irregular and uncertain, that no wise man, nor no providence less than Divine, can make any provisions for it.

63. And, after all, it is nothing but the fantastic and imaginative part that is pleased, which, for aught appears, may be disturbed with curiosity, peevishness, pride, spirit of novelty, lightness, and impertinency; and that to satisfy such spirits, and fantastic persons, may be as dangerous and useless to them, as it is troublesome in itself. But then, for the matter of edification, that is considerable upon another stock; for, now-a-days, men are never edified, unless they be pleased, and if they dislike the person, or have taken up a quarrel against any form or institution, presently they cry out, "they are not edified," that is, they are displeased; and the ground of their displeasure is nothing from the thing itself, but from themselves only: they are wanton with their meat, and long for variety, and then they cry out that manna will not nourish them, but prefer the onions of Egypt before the food of angels: the way to cure this inconvenience is to alter the men, not to change the institution; for it is very certain that wholesome meat is of itself nutritive, if the body be disposed to its reception and entertainment. But it is not certain that what a sick man fancies out of the weakness of his spirit, the distemper of his appetite, and wildness of his fancy, that it will become to him either good, or good physic. Now, in the entertainments of religion and spiritual repasts, that is wholesome, nutritive, and apt to edify, which is pious in itself, of advantage to the honour of God, whatsoever is good doctrine, or good prayers, especially when it is prepared by a public hand, and designed for public use, by all the wisdom of those men, who, in all reason, are to be supposed to have received from God all those assistances, which are effects of the spirit of government; and, therefore, it is but weakness of spirit, or strength of passion, impotency in some sense or other, certainly, that first dislikes the public provisions, and then say they are not wholesome.

64. For I demand concerning the public liturgies of a church, whose constitution is principally of the parts and choicest extracts of scripture, lessons and the psalms, and some few hymns and symbols, made by the most excellent persons in the primitive church, and all this in nothing disagreeing from the rules of liturgy given in Scripture, but that the same things are desired, and the same persons prayed for, and to the same end, and by the same great instrument of address and acceptation, "by Jesus Christ," and which gives all the glory that is due to God, and gives nothing of this to a creature, and hath in it many admirable documents; whether there be any thing wanting in such a liturgy towards edification? What is there in prayers that can edify, that is not in such a liturgy, so constituted? or what can there be more in the private forms of any minister, than is in such a public composition?

65. By this time, I suppose, the objection, with all its parts, is disbanded so far as it relates to edification, profit, and compliance with the auditors: as for the matter of liberty, and restraint of the spirit, I shall consider that part. In the mean time, I shall set down those grounds of religion and reason upon which public liturgy relies, and by the strength of which it is to be justified against all opposition and pretences.

66. 1. The church hath a power given to her by the Spirit of God, and a command to describe public forms of liturgy. For I consider that the church is a family, Jesus Christ is the Master of the family, the Holy Spirit is the great dispensator of all such graces the family needs, and are, in order to the performance of their duty; the apostles and their successors, the rulers of the church, are "stewards of the manifold graces of God," whose office is to provide every man's portion, and to dispense the graces and issues evangelical, by way of ministry. "Who is that faithful and wise steward, whom his Lord shall make ruler of his household?" It was our blessed Saviour's question, and St. Paul answered it: "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God."[o] Now the greatest ministry of the gospel is by way of prayer, most of the graces of the Spirit being obtained by prayer, and such offices which operate by way of impetration, and benediction, and consecration, which are but the several instances of prayer; prayer, certainly, is the most effectual and mysterious ministry; and, therefore, since the Holy Ghost hath made the rulers of the church "stewards of the mysteries," they are, by virtue of their stewardship, presidents of prayer and public offices.

67. 2. Which also is certain, because the priest is to stand between God and the people, and to represent all their needs to the throne of grace: "He is a prophet and shall pray for thee," said God, concerning Abraham, to Abimelech. And, therefore, the apostles appointed inferior officers in the church, that they might not be hindered in their great work: "but we will give ourselves to the word of God and to prayer;" and therefore, in our greatest need, in our sickness and last scene of our lives, we are directed to "send for the elders of the church, that they may pray over us;" and God hath promised to hear them: and if prayer be of any concernment towards the final condition of our souls, certainly it is to be ordered, guided, and disposed, by them who "watch for our souls," ὡς λόγον ἀποδώσοντες, "as they that must give account to God for them."

68. 3. Now, if the rulers of the church are presidents of the rites of religion, and, by consequence of prayer, either they are to order public prayers, or private. For private, I suppose, most men will be so desirous of their liberty, as to preserve that in private, where they have no concernments but their own, for matter of order or scandal: but for public, if there be any such thing as government, and that prayers may be spoiled by disorder, or made ineffectual by confusion, or, by any accident, may become occasion of a scandal, it is certain that they must be ordered as all other things are, in which the public is certainly concerned, that is, by the rulers of the church, who are answerable if there be any miscarriage in the public. Thus far, I suppose, there will not be much question with those who allow set forms, but would have themselves be the composers: they would have the ministers pray for the people, but the ministers shall not be prescribed to; the rulers of the church shall be the presidents of religious rites, but then they will be the rulers; therefore, we must proceed further; and because I will not now enter into the question, who are left by Christ to govern his church, I will proceed upon such grounds which, I hope, may be sufficient to determine this question, and yet decline the other. Therefore,

69. Since the Spirit of God is the Spirit of supplication, they to whom the greatest portion of the Spirit is promised, are most competent persons to pray for the people, and to prescribe forms of prayer. But the promise of the Spirit is made to the church in general, to her in her united capacity, to the whole church first, then to particular churches, then in the lowest seat of the category to single persons; and we have title to the promises by being members of the church, and in the communion of saints; which beside the "stylus curiæ," the form of all the great promises, being in general and comprehensive terms, appears in this, that when any single person is out of this communion, he hath also no title to the promises; which yet he might, if he had any upon his own stock, not derivative from the church. Now, then, I infer, if any single persons will have us to believe without possibility of proof, (for so it must be,) that they pray with the Spirit; (for how shall they be able to prove the Spirit actually to abide in those single persons?) then much rather must we believe it of the church, which, by how much the more general it is, so much the more of the Spirit she is likely to have; and then, if there be no errors in the matter, the church hath the advantage and probability on her side; and if there be an error in matter in either of them, neither of them have the Spirit, or they make not the true use of it. But the public Spirit, in all reason, is to be trusted before the private, when there is a contestation, the church being "prior et potior in promissis," she hath a greater and prior title to the Spirit. And why the church hath not the spirit of prayer in her compositions as well as any of her children, I desire, once for all, to be satisfied upon true grounds either of reason or revelation. And if she have, whether she have not as much as any single person? if she have but as much, then there is as much reason in respect of the Divine assistance, that the church should make the forms, as that any single minister should, and more reason in respect of order and public influence, and care, and charge of souls: but if she have a greater portion of the Spirit than a single person, that is, if the whole be greater than the part, or the public better than the private, then it is evident, that the Spirit of the church in respect of the Divine assistance, is chiefly, and, in respect of order, is only to be relied upon for public provisions and forms of prayer.

70. But now if the church, in her united capacity, makes prayers for the people, they cannot be supposed to be other than limited and determined forms; for it is not practicable, or, indeed, imaginable, that a synod of church governors, be they who they will, so they be of Christ's appointment, should meet in every church, and pray as every man lists; their counsels are united, and their results are conclusions and final determinations, which, like general propositions, are applicable to particular instances: so that, first, since the Spirit being the great dictator of holy prayers: and, secondly, the Spirit is promised to the church in her united capacity; and, thirdly, in proportion to the assembled, "cæteris paribus," so are measures of the Spirit poured out: and, fourthly, when the church is assembled, the prayers which they teach the people, are limited and prescribed forms: it follows, that limited and prescribed forms are, in all reason, emanations from the greatest portion of the Spirit, warranted by special promises, which are made to every man there present, that does his duty as a private member of the christian church, and are due to him as a ruler of the church, and yet more especially, and in a further degree, to all them met together: where, if ever, the Holy Spirit gives such helps and graces which relate to the public government, and have influence upon the communities of christians, that is, will bless their meeting, and give them such assistances as will enable them to do the work for which they convene.

71. But yet if any man shall say, "what need the church meet in public synods, to make forms of prayer, when private ministers are able to do it in their several parishes?" I answer, "it is true, many can, but they cannot do it better than a council;" and I think no man is so impudent as to say he can do it so well; however, "quod spectat ad omnes, ab omnibus tractari debet," "the matter is of public concernment, and therefore should be of public consultation," and the advantages of publicly described forms I shall afterwards specify. In the mean time,

72. Fifthly, And the church, I mean the rulers of the church, are appointed presidents of religious rites, and as the rulers, in conjunction, are enabled to do it best by the advantages of special promises, and double portions of the Spirit; so she always did practise this, either in conjunction or by single dictate, by public persons or united authority; but in all times, as necessity required, they prescribed set forms of prayer.

73. If I should descend to minutes and particulars, I could instance, in the behalf of set forms, that, First, God prescribed to Moses a set form of prayer and benediction to be used when he did bless the people. Secondly, That Moses composed a song or hymn, for the children of Israel to use, to all their generations. Thirdly, That David composed many for the service of the tabernacle, and every company of singers was tied to certain psalms, as the very titles intimate; and the psalms were such limited and determinate prescriptions, that in some, God's Spirit did bind them to the very number of the letters and order of the alphabet. Fourthly, That Solomon, and the holy kings of Judah, brought them in and continued them, in the ministration of the temple. Fifthly, That in the reformation by Hezekiah, the priests and Levites were commanded to praise the Lord, "in the words of David and Asaph."[p] Sixthly, That "all Scripture is written for our learning;" and since all these, and many more set forms of prayer, are left there upon record, it is more than probable, that they were left there for our use and devotion; and certainly it is as lawful, and as prudent, to pray Scriptures, as to read Scriptures; and it were well, if we would use ourselves to the expression of Scripture, and that the language of God were familiar to us, that we spake the words of Canaan, not the speech of Ashdod; and time was, when it was thought the greatest ornament of a spiritual person, and instrument of a religious conversation; but then the consequents would be, that these prayers were the best forms which were in the words of Scripture, and those psalms and prayers there recorded were the best devotions, but these are set forms. 7. To this purpose, I could instance, in the example of St. John the Baptist, who taught his disciples a form of prayer; and that Christ's disciples begged the same favour, and it was granted as they desired it.

74. And here I mean to fix a little, for this ground cannot fail us. I say, Christ prescribed a set form of prayer to be used by all his disciples, as a breviary of prayer, as a rule of their devotions, as a repository of their needs, and as a direct address to God. For in this prayer God did not only command us to make our prayers, as Moses was bid to make the tabernacle, after the pattern which God showed him in the mount, and Christ showed his apostles;[q] but he hath given us the very tables written with his own hand, that we should use them as they are so delivered; this prayer was not only a precedent and pattern, but an instance of address, a perfect form for our practice, as well as imitation. For,

75. First, When Christ was upon the mount, he gave it for a pattern οὕτως οὖν προσεύχεσθε ὑμεῖς· "So pray ye," or after this manner; which if we expound only to the sense of becoming a pattern, or a directory, it is observable, that it is not only directory for the matter, but for the manner too; and if we must pray with that matter, and in that manner, what does that differ from praying with that form? however, it is well enough, that it becomes a precedent to us, in any sense, and the church may vary her forms according as she judges best for edification.

76. Secondly, When the apostles, upon occasion of the form which the Baptist taught his disciples, begged of their Master to teach them one, he again taught them this, and added a precept to use these very words;[r] ὅταν προσεύχεσθε, λέγετε, "when ye pray, say, Our Father," ἔδει γὰρ μηδὲν ἴδιον αὐτοὺς λέγειν: when they spake to God, it was fit they should speak in his words, in whose name also their prayers only could be acceptable.[s]

77. Thirdly, For if we must speak this sense, why also are not the very words to be retained? Is there any error or imperfection in the words? Was not Christ master of his language? And were not his words sufficiently expressive of his sense? Will not the prayer do well also in our tongues, which as a duty we are obliged to deposit in our hearts, and preserve in our memories, without which it is in all senses useless, whether it be only a pattern, or a repository of matter?

78. Fourthly, And it is observable, that our blessed Saviour doth not say, "Pray that the name of your heavenly Father may be sanctified, or that your sins may be forgiven," but say, "Hallowed be thy name," &c., so that he prescribes this prayer, not in "massa materiæ," but in "forma verborum," not "in a confused heap of matter," but in "an exact composure of words," it makes it evident he intended it not only "pro regulâ petendorum," "for a direction of what things we are to ask," but also "pro formâ orationis," "for a set form of prayer." Now it is considerable that no man ever had the fulness of the Spirit, but only the holy Jesus, and, therefore, it is also certain, that no man had the Spirit of prayer like to him; and then, if we pray this prayer devoutly, and with pious and actual intention, do we not pray in the Spirit of Christ, as much as if we prayed any other form of words pretended to be taught us by the Spirit? We are sure that Christ and Christ's Spirit taught us this prayer; they only gather by conjectures and opinions, that in their extempore or conceived forms, the Spirit of Christ teacheth them. So much then as certainties are better than uncertainties, and God's word better than man's, so much is this set form, besides the infinite advantages in the matter, better than their extempore and conceived forms, in the form itself. And if ever any prayer was, or could be, a part of that "doctrine of faith" by which "we received the Spirit,"[t] it must needs be this prayer, which was the only form our blessed Master taught the christian church immediately, was a part of his great and glorious sermon in the mount, in which all the needs of the world are sealed up as in a treasure-house, and intimated by several petitions, as diseases are, by their proper and proportioned remedies, and which Christ published, as the first emanation of his Spirit, the first perfume of that heavenly anointing, which descended on his sacred head, when he went down into the waters of baptism.

[p] 2 Chron. xxix. 30. [q] Matt. v. 1. and vi. 9.

79. This we are certain of, that there is nothing wanting, nothing superfluous and impertinent, nothing carnal or imperfect in this prayer, but as it supplies all needs, so it serves all persons, is fitted for all estates, it meets with all accidents, and no necessity can surprise any man, but if God hears him praying that prayer, he is provided for in that necessity: and yet, if any single person paraphrases it, it is not certain but the whole sense of a petition may be altered by the intervention of one improper word, and there can be no security given against this, but qualified and limited, and just in such a proportion as we can be assured of the wisdom and honesty of the person, and the actual assistance of the Holy Spirit.

80. Now then I demand, whether the prayer of Manasses be so good a prayer as the Lord's prayer? or is the prayer of Judith, or of Tobias, or of Judas Maccabeus, or of the son of Sirach, is any of these so good? Certainly no man will say they are; and the reason is, because we are not sure they are inspired by the Holy Spirit of God; prudent, and pious, and conformable to religion they may be, but not penned by so excellent a Spirit as this prayer. And what assurance can be given, that any minister's prayer is better than the prayers of the son of Sirach, who was a very wise and a very good man, as all the world acknowledges; I know not any one of them that has so large a testimony, or is of so great reputation. But suppose they can make as good prayers, yet surely they are apocryphal at least, and for the same reason that the apocryphal prayers are not so excellent as the Lord's prayer, by the same reason must the best they can be imagined to compose, fall short of this excellent pattern, by how much they partake of a smaller portion of the Spirit, as a drop of water is less than all the waters under or above the firmament.

81. Secondly, I would also willingly know, whether if any man uses the form which Christ taught, supposing he did not tie us to the very prescript words, can there be any hurt in it? Is it imaginable, that any commandment should be broken, or any affront done to the honour of God, or any act of imprudence, or irreligion in it, or any negligence of any insinuation of the Divine pleasure; I cannot yet think of any thing to frame for answer, so much as by way of an antinomy or objection. But then supposing Christ did tie us to use this prayer, "pro loco et tempore," according to the nature and obligation of all affirmative precepts, as it is certain he did, in the preceptive words recorded by St. Luke, "When ye pray, say, Our Father," then it is to be considered that a Divine commandment is broken by its rejection; and therefore, if there were any doubt remaining, whether it be a command or no; yet since, on one side, there is danger of a negligence, and a contempt, and that on the other side the observation and conformity cannot be criminal or imprudent; it will follow, that the retaining of this prayer in practice, and suffering it to do all its intentions, and particularly becoming the great αὐθεντία, or "authority" for set forms of prayer, is the safest, most prudent, most christian understanding of those words of Christ, propounding the Lord's prayer to the christian church. And because it is impossible that all particulars should be expressed in any form of prayer, because particulars are not only casual and accidental, but also infinite; Christ, according to that wisdom he had without measure, framed a prayer, which, by a general comprehension, should include all particulars, eminently and virtually; so that there should be no defect in it,—and yet so short, that the most imperfect memories might retain, and use it.

82. And it is not amiss to observe, that our blessed Saviour first taught this prayer to be as a remedy, and a reproof of the vain repetition of the Pharisees; and besides that it was so "à priori," we also, in the event, see the excellent spirit and wisdom in the constitution; for those persons who have laid aside the Lord's prayer, have been noted by common observation, to be very long in their forms, and troublesome and vain enough in their repetitions; they have laid aside the medicine, and the old wound bleeds afresh; the Pharisees did so of old.

83. And after all this, it is strange employment, that any man should be put to justify the wisdom and prudence of any of Christ's institutions; as if any of his servants, who are wise upon his stock, instructed by his wisdom, made knowing by his revelations, and whose all that is good is but a weak ray of the glorious light of the Sun of righteousness, should dare to think that the derivative should be before the primitive, the current above the fountain; and that we should derive all our excellency from him, and yet have some beyond him, that is, some which he never had, or which he was not pleased to manifest; or that we should have a spirit of prayer, able to make productions beyond his prayer, who received the Spirit without measure. But this is not the first time man hath disputed against God.

84. And now let us consider, with sobriety, not only of this excellent prayer, but of all that are deposited in the primitive records of our religion. Are not those prayers and hymns in Holy Scripture excellent compositions, admirable instruments of devotion, full of piety, rare and incomparable addresses to God? Dare any man with his gift of prayer, pretend that he can extempore, or by study, make better? Who dares pretend, that he hath a better spirit than David had? or than the apostles and prophets, and other holy persons in Scripture, whose prayers and psalms are, by God's Spirit, consigned to the use of the church for ever? Or will it be denied, but that they also are excellent directories and patterns for prayer? And if patterns, the nearer we draw to our example, are not the imitations and representments the better? And what then, if we took the samplers themselves? Is there any imperfection in them, and can we mend them, and correct "the Magnificat?" The very matter of these, and the author, no less than Divine, cannot but justify the forms, though set, determined, and prescribed.

85. In a just proportion and commensuration, I argue so concerning the primitive and ancient forms of church-service, which are composed according to those so excellent patterns, which if they had remained pure, as in the first institution, or had always been as they had been reformed by the church of England, they would, against all defiance, put in for the next place to those forms of liturgy, which, "mutatis mutandis," are nothing but the words of Scripture. But I am resolved, at this present, not to enter into question concerning the matter of prayers.

86. Next, we must inquire what the apostles did in obedience to the precept of Christ, and what the church did, in imitation of the apostles. That the apostles did use the prayer their Lord taught them, I think need not much be questioned; they could have no other end of their desire, and it had been a strange boldness to ask for a form which they intended not to use, or a strange levity not to do what they intended. But I consider they had a double capacity, they were of the Jewish religion by education, and now christians by a new institution; in the first capacity, they used those set forms of prayer, which their nation used in their devotions. Christ and his apostles sang a hymn, part of the great Allelujah,[u] which was usually sung at the end of the paschal supper: "After the supper they sang a hymn," says the evangelist. The Jews also used, every sabbath, to sing the 92d psalm, which is therefore entitled, "A song or Psalm for the sabbath;" and they who observed the hours of prayer, and vows, according to the rites of the temple, need not be suspected to have omitted the Jewish forms of prayer. And as they complied with the religious customs of the nation, worshipping according to the Jewish manner, it is also in reason to be presumed, they were worshippers according to the new christian institution, and used that form their Lord taught them.

87. Now, that they tied themselves to recitation of the very words of Christ's prayer "pro loco et tempore," I am therefore easy to believe, because I find they were strict, to a scruple, in retaining th sacramental words which Christ spake, when h instituted the blessed sacrament, insomuch that n only three evangelists, but St. Paul also, not onl making a narrative of the institution, but teachin the Corinthians the manner of its celebration, to tittle, he recites the words of Christ. Now the a tion of the consecrator is not a theatrical represen ment of the action of Christ, but a sacred, solem and sacramental prayer,[x] in which, since the apo tles at first, and the church ever after did, wit reverence, and fear, retain the very words, it is n only a probation of the question in general, in b half of set forms; but also a high probability tha they retained the Lord's prayer, and used it to a ἰῶτα, in the very form of words.

88. And I the rather make this inference from th preceding argument, because of the cognation on hath with the other; for the apostles did also, in th consecration of the eucharist, use the Lord's prayer and that, together with the words of institutio was the only form of consecration, saith St. Gre gory;[y] and St. Jerome affirms, that the apostles, b the command of their Lord, used this prayer[z] in th benediction of the elements.

89. But besides this, when the apostles had re ceived great measures of the Spirit, and, by thei gift of prayer, composed more forms for the hel and comfort of the church, and contrary to th order in the first creation, the light which was in th body of the sun was now diffused over the face o the new heavens and the new earth; it became precept evangelical, that we should praise "God i hymns, and psalms, and spiritual songs,[a] which i so certain that they were compositions of industr and deliberation, and yet were sung in the spirit that he, who denies the last, speaks against Scrip tures,—he who denies the first, speaks agains reason, and would best confute himself, if in th highest of his pretence of the Spirit, he would ven ture at some extempore hymns. And of this, w have the express testimony of St. Austin; "d hymnis et psalmis canendis haberi Domini et apos tolorum documenta, et utilia præcepta."[b] And th church obeyed them; for as an ancient author, unde the name of Dionysius Areopagita, relates, the chie of the clerical and ministering order offer bread upon the altar, "Cum ecclesiastici omnes laudem hymnumque generalem Deo tribuerunt, cum quibus pontifex sacras preces ritè perficit," &c. "They all sing one hymn to God, and the bishop prays 'ritè,' according to the ritual or constitution,"— which in no sense of the church, or of grammar, can be understood without a solemn and determined form; ὑμνεῖν, says Casaubon, is, "cantare, idem sæpiùs dicere, apud Græcos παλιλλογία;[c] they were forms of praising God, used constantly, periodically, and in the daily offices. And the fathers of the council of Antioch complain against Paulus Samosatenus, "Quod psalmos et cantus, qui ad Domini nostri Jesu Christi honorem decantari solent, tanquam recentiores, et à viris recentioris memoriæ editos exploserit:" "The quarrel was, that he said the church had used to say hymns which were made by new men, and not derived from the ancients;"[d] which, if we consider that the council of Antioch was in the twelfth year of Gallienus, the emperor, one hundred and thirty-three years after Christ's ascension, will fairly prove, that the use of prescribed forms of prayer, hymns, and forms of worshipping, were very early in the church; and it is unimaginable it should be otherwise, when we remember the apostolical precept before mentioned. And if we fancy a higher precedent, than what was manifested upon earth, we may please to see one observed to have been made in heaven; for a set form of worship, and address to God, was recorded by St. John,[e] and sung in heaven; and it was composed out of the songs of Moses,[f] of David,[g] and of Jeremy,[h] which certainly is a very good precedent for us to imitate, although but revealed by St. John, by way of vision and ecstasy, that we may see, if we would speak with the tongue of men and angels, we could not praise God in better forms than what are recorded in Holy Scripture.

90. But besides the metrical part, the apostle hath described other parts of liturgy in Scripture, whose composition, though it be in determined forms of words, yet not so bound up with numbers, as hymns: and these St. Paul calls "supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks," which are several manners of address distinguished by their subject matter, by their form and manner of address. As appears plainly by "intercessions and giving of thanks;" the other are also by all men distinguished, though in the particular assignment they differ; but the distinction of the words implies the distinction of offices, which together with the τὰ ἀπομνημόνευματα τῶν προφήτων, the "lectionarium" of the church, the books of the apostles and prophets, spoken of by Justin Martyr, and said to be used in the christian congregations, are the constituent parts of liturgy; and the exposition of the words we best learn from the practice of the church, who in all ages, of whose public offices any record is left to us, took their pattern from these places of Scripture, the one for prose, the other for verse; and if we take liturgy into its several parts, or members, we cannot want something to apply to every one of the words of St. Paul, in these present allegations.[i]

91. For the offices of prose we find but small mention of them in the very first time, save only in general terms, and that such there were, and that St. James, St. Mark, St. Peter, and others of the apostles and apostolical men, made liturgies; and if these which we have at this day were not theirs, yet they make probation that these apostles left others, or else they were impudent people that prefixed their names so early, and the churches were very incurious to swallow such a bole, if no pretension could have been reasonably made for their justification. But concerning church hymns, we have clearer testimony in particular, both because there were many of them, and because they were dispersed more, soon got by heart, passed also among the people, and were pious arts of the Spirit, whereby holy things were instilled into their souls by the help of fancy, and a more easy memory. The first civilizing of people used to be by poetry, and their divinity was conveyed by songs and verses;[k] and the apostle exhorted the christians, "To exhort one another in psalms and hymns," for he knew the excellent advantages were likely to accrue to religion by such an insinuation of the mysteries. Thus St. Hilary and St. Ambrose composed hymns for the use of the church, and St. Austin made a hymn against the schism of Donatus; which hymns, when they were publicly allowed of, were used in public offices; not till then; for Paulus Samosatenus had brought women into the church to sing vain and trifling songs, and some bishops took to themselves too great and incurious a license, and brought hymns into the church, whose gravity and piety was not very remarkable; upon occasion of which, the fathers of the council of Laodicea ordained, ὅτι οὐ δεῖ ἰδιωτικοὺς ψαλμοὺς λέγεσθαι ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ, "No psalms of private composition must be brought into the church;" so Gentian Harvet renders it; Isidore translates it "Psalmos ab idiotis compositos," "Psalms made by common persons." "Psalms usually sung abroad:" so Dionysius Exiguus calls them, "Psalmos plebeios:" but I suppose by the following words is meant, that none but Scripture psalms shall be read there; for so the canon adds, ἀλλὰ μόνα τὰ κανονικὰ τῆς παλαιᾶς καὶ καινῆς διαθήκης, "Nothing to be read in the church but books of the Old and New Testament."—And this interpretation agrees well enough with the occasion of the canon which I now mentioned.

92. This only by the way, the reddition of ψαλμοὺς ἰδιωτικοὺς by Isidore, to be "psalms made by common persons," whom the Scripture calls ἰδιώτας, "ignorant or unlearned," is agreeable enough with that of St. Paul, who intimates, that prayers, and forms of liturgies, are to be composed "for them, not by them;" they were never thought of to be persons competent to make forms of prayers themselves; for St. Paul[l] speaks of such an one as of a person coming into the church to hear the prophets pray, and sing, and interpret, and prophesy, and ἐλέγχεται ὑπὸ πάντων, ἀνακρίνεται ὑπὸ πάντων, "He is reproved of all, and judged of all;" and, therefore, the most unfit person in the world to bring any thing that requires great ability, and great authority, to obtrude it upon the church, his rulers, and his judges. And this was not unhandsomely intimated by the word sometimes used by the Εὐχολόγιον of the Greek church, calling the public liturgy κοντάκιον, which signifies "prayers, made for the use of the 'idiotæ,' or private persons," as the word is contradistinguished from the rulers of the church. Κοντὸς signifies "contum," and κοντῷ πλεῖν, is as much as προσηκόντως ζῆν, "to live in the condition of a private person," and in the vulgar Greek, says Arcadius, κοντος and κονταικῆνος ἄνθρωπος signify "a little man, of a low stature," from which two significations κοντάκιον may well enough design "a short form of prayer, made for the use of private persons." And this was reasonable, and part of the religion even of the heathen, as well as christians; the presidents of their religion were to find prayers for the people, and teach them forms of address to their gods.

But this by the way.

93. But, because I am casually fallen upon mention of the Laodicean council, and that it was very ancient, before the Nicene, and of very great reputation, both in the east, and in the west, it will not be a contemptible addition to the reputation of set forms of liturgy, that we find them, so early in the church, reduced to a very regular and composed manner. The fifteenth canon suffers none to sing in the church, but the ἀπὸ διφθέρας ψάλλοντες, καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν ἀμβῶνα ἀναβαίνοντες, "they that sing by book, and go up into the pulpit;" they were the same persons, and the manner of doing their office was their appellative, which shows plainly, that the known custom of the church was for them who were in the ἀμβὼν, "in the pulpit," to read their offices and devotions. They read them ἀπὸ διφθέρας, that is the word in the canon. Those things which signify the greatest, or first antiquity, are said to be ἐν διφθέρᾳ γραφόμενα. Ἀρχαιότερα διφθέρας λαλεῖς, was spoken proverbially, to signify "ancient things:" and Ζεὺς κατεῖδε Κρόνιος εἰς τὰς διφθέρας: so that if these fathers chose these words as grammarians, "the singers ἀπὸ διφθέρας," were "such as sung ancient hymns of primitive antiquity;" which also is the more credible, because the persons were noted and distinguished by their employment, as a thing known by so long a use, till it came to be their appellative. The seventeenth and eighteenth canons command, that lessons and psalms should be said interchangeably καὶ τὴν αὐτὴν λειτουργίαν τῶν εὐχῶν πάντοτε, καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἑσπέραις ὀφείλειν γίνεσθαι, "and the same liturgy (that is the word) or office of prayers, to be said always at nones and vespers."—This shows the manner of executing their office of psalmists, and readers; they did not sing or say extempore, but they read prayers and psalms, and sung them out of a book; neither were they brought in fresh and new at every meeting, but it was αὐτὴ λειτουργία πάντοτε, "still the same form of prayers," without variation.

94. But then if we remember how ancient this office was in the church, and that the ἀναγνώσται and ψάλται, "the readers and singers," were clerical offices, deputed for public ministry about prayers and devotions in the church; for so we are told by Simeon Thessalonicensis, in particular, concerning the ἀναγνώστης, καὶ τοὺς θείους προλέγει τοῖς ψάλλουσιν ὕμνους, ἤτοι κανοναρχεῖ, "He does dictate the hymns to the singers;" (and then of the singers there is no question;)—and that these two offices were so ancient in the church, that they were mentioned by St. Ignatius,[n] who was contemporary with the latter times of the apostles; we may well believe that set and described forms of liturgy were as early as the days of the apostles, and continued in the continuation of those and the like offices, in all descending ages. Of the same design and intimation were those known offices in the Greek church, of the Κανονάρχης and the Ὑποβολεὺς, which Socrates speaks of, as of an office in the church of Alexandria, ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ δὲ Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ ἀναγνώσται καὶ ὑποβολεῖς διάφοροι, εἴτε κατηχούμενοί εἰσιν εἴτε πιστοὶ, &c. Their office was the same with the reader; they did "ex præscripto præire, et ad verbum referre," the same which ab Alexandro notes to have been done in the religious rites of heathen Greece; the first read out of a book the appointed prayers, and the others rehearse them after. Now it is unimaginable that constant officers should be appointed to say an office, and no public office be described.

95. I shall add but this one thing more, and pass on "ad alia." And that is, that I never yet saw any instance, example, or pretence of precedent of any bishop, priest, or lay-person, that ever prayed extempore in the church; and although in some places, single bishops, or peradventure, other persons of less authority, did oftentimes bring prayers of their own[o] into the church; yet ever they were compositions, and premeditations, and were brought thither, there to be repeated often, and added to the liturgy; and although the liturgies, while they were less full than since they have been, were apt to receive the additions of pious and excellent persons, yet the inconvenience grew so great, by permitting any forms but what were approved by a public spirit, that the church, as she always had forms of public prescription, so she resolved to permit no mixture of any thing but what was warranted by an equal power, that the spirits of the prophets might be subject to the prophets, and such spirits, when they are once tried, whether they be of God or no, tried by a lawful superior, and a competent judge, may then venture into the open air. And it were a strange imprudence, choosingly to entertain those inconveniences which our wiser forefathers felt, and declared, and remedied. For why should we be in love with that evil, against which they so carefully armed their churches, by the provision and defence of laws? For this produced that canon of the council of Milevis, in Africa; "Placuit ut preces quæ probatæ fuerint in concilio, ab omnibus celebrentur, nec aliæ omnino dicantur in ecclesiâ, nisi quæ à prudentioribus factæ fuerint in Synodo." That is the restraint and prohibition; "public prayers must be such as are publicly appointed and prescribed by our superiors, and no private forms of our conceiving must be used in the church." The reason follows: "Ne fortè aliquid contra fidem, vel per ignorantiam, vel per minus studium sit compositum:" "Lest through ignorance, or want of deliberation, any thing be spoken in our prayers against faith" and good manners. Their reason is good, and they are witnesses of it, who hear the variety of prayers, before and after sermons, there, where the Directory is practised,—where, to speak most modestly, not only their private opinions, but also human interests, and their own personal concernments, and wild fancies, born perhaps not two days before, are made the objects of the people's hopes, of their desires and their prayers; and all in the mean time pretend to the Holy Spirit.

96. Thus far we are gone. The church hath, 1. power and authority; and, 2. command; 3. and ability, or promise of assistances, to make public forms of liturgy; and 4. the church always did so, in all descents from Moses to Christ, from Christ to the apostles, from them all to all descending ages; for I have instanced till St. Austin's time; and since, there is no question, the people were ἀντίγραφα ἔχοντες τῶν συνηθῶν ἁγιῶν εὐχῶν ἀπαραλλακτὰ μεταγραφέντα ἐκ κοντακίων, as Balsamon says of those of the Greek communion; "they used unalterable forms of prayers, described out of the books of public liturgy." It remains only, that I consider upon what reason, and grounds of prudence and religion, the church did so; and whether she did well or no. In order to which, I consider,—

97. First, every man hath personal needs of his own, and he that understands his own condition, and hath studied the state of his soul, in order to eternity,—his temporal estate, in order to justice and charity,—and the constitution and necessities of his body, in order to health,—and his health, in order to the service of God, as every wise and good man does, will find that no man can make such provision for his necessities as he can do for his own; "cæteris paribus," no man "knows the things of a man but the spirit of the man;" and, therefore, if he have proportionable abilities, it is allowed to him, and it is necessary for him, to represent his own conditions to God; and he can best express his own sense, or at least best sigh forth his own meaning; and if he be a good man, the spirit will make intercession for him with those "unutterable groans." Besides this, every family hath needs proper to it, in the capacity of a family, and those are to be represented by the master of the family; whom men of the other persuasion are apt to confess to be a priest in his own family, and a king; and "sacrorum omnium potestas sub regibus esto," they are willing in this sense to acknowledge; and they call upon him to perform family duties, that is, all the public devotions of the family are to be ordered by him.

98. Now, that this is to be done by a set form of words, is acknowledged by Didoclavius: "Nam licet in conclavi pater familiâs verbis exprimere animi affectus, pro arbitrio potest, quia Dominus cor intuetur et affectus, tamen publicè coram totâ familiâ idem absque indecoro non potest."[p] If he prays extempore, without a set form of prayer, he may commit many an indecency; a set and described form of prayer is most convenient in a family, that children and servants may be enabled to remember, and tacitly recite the prayer together with the "major domo." But I rely not upon this, but proceed upon this consideration:—

99. As private persons and as families, so also have churches their special necessities, in a distinct capacity; and, therefore, God hath provided for them "rulers and feeders," priests and presidents of religion, who are to represent all their needs to God, and to make provisions. Now, because the church cannot all meet in one place, but, the harvest being great, it is bound up in several bundles, and divided into many congregations, for all which the rulers and stewards of this great family are to provide, and yet cannot be present in those particular societies, it is necessary that they should have influence upon them by a general provision, and, therefore, that they should take care that their common needs should be represented to God by set forms of prayer, for they only can be provided by rulers, and used by their ministers and deputies; such as must be one in the "principe," and diffused in the execution; and it is a better expression of their care and duty, for the rulers to provide the bread and bless it, and then give it to them, who must minister it in small portions, and to particular companies, (for so Christ did,) than to leave them, —who are not, in the same degree, answerable for the churches as the rulers are,—to provide their food, and break it, and minister it too. The very economy of Christ's family requires, that the dispensations be made according to every man's capacity. The general stewards are to divide to every man his portion of work, and to give them their food in due season, and the under servants are to do that work which is appointed them: so Christ appointed in the gospel, and so the church hath practised in all ages; "Indè enim per temporum et successionum vices, episcoporum ordinatio et ecclesiæ ratio decurrit, ut ecclesia supra episcopos constituatur, et omnis actus ecclesiæ per eosdem præpositos gubernetur."[q] When the rulers are few, (for the ecclesiastical regiment is not democratical,) and the under offices many, and the companies numerous, for all which those few rulers are bound to provide, and prayer and offices of devotion are one of the greatest instances of provision, it is impossible there should be any sufficient care taken, or caution used, by those rulers in the matter of prayers, but for them to make such prescript forms, which may be used by all companies under their charge; that since they are to represent all the needs of all their people, because they cannot be present by their persons in all societies, they may be present by their care and provisions, which is then done best when they make prescript forms of prayer, and provide pious ministers to dispense it.

[p] Altare Damascenum.

[q] S. Cyprian. ep. 27.

100. Secondly, it is in the very nature of public prayer, that it be made by a public spirit, and performed by a public consent. For public and private prayer are certainly two distinct duties; but they are least of all distinguished by the place, but most of all by the spirit that dictates the prayer, and the consent in the recitation; and it is a private prayer, which either one man makes, though spoken in public, as the Laodicean council calls ψαλμοὺς ἰδιωτικοὺς, "private psalms," or which is not attested by public consent of minds; and it is a public prayer which is made by the public spirit, and consented to by a general acceptation, and, therefore, the "Lord's prayer," though spoken in private, is a public form, and, therefore, represented plurally. And the place is very extrinsical to the nature of prayer: "I will that men pray every where, lifting up pure hands;"[r] and retiring into a closet is only advised for the avoiding of hypocrisy, not for the greater excellency of the duty. So that if public prayer have advantages beyond private prayer, or upon its own stock, besides it,—the more public influences it receives, the more excellent it is. And hence I conclude, that set forms of prayer composed and used by the church; I mean by the rulers in conjunction and union, of heads and councils, and used by the church; I mean the people in union and society of hearts and spirits; hath two very great advantages which other prayers have not.

101. For, first, it is more truly public, and hath the benefit of those helps which God, who never is deficient to supply any of our needs, gives to public persons in order to public necessities, by which I mean its emanation from a public, and, therefore, a more excellent spirit. And, secondly, it is the greatest instance of union in the world; for since God hath made faith, hope, and charity, the ligaments of the communion of saints,—and common prayer, which not only all the governors have propounded as most fit, but in which all the people are united, is a great testimony of the same faith, and a common hope, and mutual charity,—because they confess the same God whom they worship, and the same articles which they recite, and labour towards the same hope, "the mighty price of their high calling," and by praying for each other in the same sense, and to the same purpose, doing the same to them that I desire they should do for me, do testify, and preserve, and increase their charity;—it follows, that common and described prayers are the most excellent instrument, and act and ligament of the communion of saints, and the great common term of the church, in its degrees of catholic capacity. And, therefore, saith St. Ignatius, πάντες ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ ἐν τῇ προσευχῇ ἅμα συνέρχεσθε, "All meet together, and join to common prayers:" μία δέησις, εἷς νοῦς ἔστω, "Let there be one mind, and let there be one prayer." That is the true communion of christians.

102. And in pursuance of this, I consider, that if all christian churches had one common liturgy, there were not a greater symbol to testify, nor a greater instrument to preserve, the catholic communion; and whenever a schism was commenced, and that they called one another heretic, they not only forsook to pray with one another, but they also altered their forms, by interposition of new clauses, hymns, and collects, and new rites and ceremonies. Only those parts that combined, kept the same liturgy: and indeed, the same forms of prayer were so much the instrument of union, that it was the only ligament of their society; for their creeds I reckon as part of their liturgy, for so they ever were. So that this may teach us a little to guess (I will not say into how many churches, but into how many innumerable atoms and minutes of churches, those christians must needs be scattered who alter their forms according to the number of persons, and the number of their meetings, every company having a new form of prayer at every convention. And this consideration will not be vain if we remember how great a blessing unity in churches is, and how hard to be kept with all the arts in the world, and how every thing is powerful enough for its dissolution. But that a public form of liturgy was the great instrument of communion in the primitive church, appears in this, that the καθαίρεσις, or "excommunication," was an exclusion, "à communicatione orationis, et conventûs, et omnis sancti commercii," "from the participation of the public meeting and prayers;" and, therefore the more united the prayer is, still it is the greater instrument of union: the authority and consent, the public spirit, and common acceptation, are so many degrees of a more firm and indissoluble communion.

103. Thirdly; to this I add, that without prescribed forms, issues of the public spirit and authority, public communion cannot be regular and certain, as may appear in one or two plain instances. It is a practice prevailing among those of our brethren that are zealous for extempore, or not enjoined prayers, to pray their sermons over, to reduce their doctrine into devotion and liturgy. I mislike it not for the thing itself, if it were regularly for the manner, and the matter always pious and true. But who shall assure me, when the preacher hath disputed, or rather dogmatically decreed, a point of predestination or of prescience of contingency or of liberty, or any of the most mysterious parts of divinity, and then prays his sermon over, that he then prays with the Spirit? Unless I be sure that he also preached with the Spirit, I cannot be sure that he prays with the Spirit, for all he prays extempore. Nay, if I hear a protestant preach in the morning and an anabaptist in the afternoon, to-day a presbyterian, to-morrow an independent, am I not mos sure that when they have preached contradictories, and all of them pray their sermons over, that they do not all pray with the Spirit? More than one in this case cannot pray with the Spirit; possibly all may pray against him.

104. Fourthly; From whence I thus argue in behalf of "set forms of prayer," that in the case above put, how shall I, or any man else, say "amen" to their prayers, that preach and pray contradictories? At least, I am much hindered in my devotion. For besides that it derives our opinions into our devotions, makes every school-point become our religion, and makes God a party, so far as we can, entitling him to our impertinent wranglings; besides this, I say, while we should attend to our addresses towards God, we are to consider whether the point be true, or no; and by that time we have tacitly discoursed it, we are upon another point, which also perhaps is as questionable as the former; and by this time our spirit of devotion is a little discomposed, and something out of countenance, there is so much other employment for "the spirit, the spirit of discerning and judging." All which inconveniences are avoided in set forms of liturgy: for we know beforehand the conditions of our communion, and to what we are to say "amen," to which, if we like it, we may repair; if not, there is no harm done, your devotion shall not be surprised, nor your communion invaded, as it may be often in your "extempore prayers," and unlimited devotions.

105. Fifthly; And this thing hath another collateral inconvenience, which is of great consideration; for upon what confidence can we solicit any recusants to come to our church, where we cannot promise them, that the devotions, there to be used, shall be innocent, nor can we put him into a condition to judge for himself? If he will venture, he may, but we can use no argument to make him choose our churches, though he would quit his own.

106. Sixthly; So that either the people must have an implicit faith in the priest, and then may most easily be abused; or if they have not, they cannot join in the prayer, it cannot become to them an instrument of communion, but by chance, and irregularly; and "ex post facto," when the prayer is approved of, and after the devotion is spent, for till then they cannot judge; and before they do, they cannot say "amen;" and till "amen" be said, there is no benefit of the prayer, nor any union of hearts and desires, and therefore, as yet, no communion.

107. Seventhly; Public forms of prayer are great advantages to convey an article of faith into the most secret retirement of the spirit, and to establish it with a most firm persuasion, and endear it to us with the greatest affection. For, since our prayers are the greatest instruments and conveyances of blessing and mercy to us, that,—which mingles with our hopes, which we owe to God, which is sent of an errand to fetch a mercy for us,—in all reason, will become the dearer to us for all these advantages. And just so is an article of belief inserted into our devotions, and made a part of prayer; it is extremely confirmed by that confidence and πληροφορία, "fulness of persuasion," that must exclude all doubting from our prayers; and it insinuates itself into our affection, by being mingled with our desires; and we grow bold in it, by having offered it to God, and made so often acknowledgment of it to him, who "is not to be mocked."

108. And, certainly, it were a very strange liturgy in which there were no public confession of faith, for as it were deficient in one act of God's worship, which is offering the understanding up to God, bringing it in subjection to Christ, and making public profession of it, it also loses a very great advantage, which might accrue to faith, by making it a part of our liturgic devotions; and this was so apprehended by the ancients in the church, our fathers in Christ, that commonly they used to oppose a hymn, or a collect, or a doxology, in defiance of a new-sprung heresy. The fathers of Nice framed the "Gloria Patri" against the Arians. St. Austin composed a hymn against the Donatists. St. Jerome added the "sicut erat in principio," against the Macedonians. St. Ambrose framed the "Te Deum" upon occasion of St. Austin's baptism, but took care to make the hymn to be of most solemn adoration, and yet of prudent institution and public confession, that, according to the advice of St. Paul, we might "sing with grace in our hearts to the Lord," and, at the same time, "teach and admonish one another" too: now this cannot be done but in set forms of prayer; for, in new devotions and uncertain forms, we may also have an ambulatory faith, and new articles may be offered before every sermon, and at every convention; the church can have no security to the contrary, nor the article any stable foundation of advantageous insinuation either into judgment or memory of the persons to be informed or persuaded; but, like Abraham's sacrifice, as soon as his back is turned, the birds shall eat it up. "Quid, quod hæc oratio, quæ sanandis mentibus adhibetur, descendere in nos debet? Remedia non prosunt, nisi immorentur."[s] A cursory prayer shall have a transient effect; when the hand is off, the impression also is gone.

109. Eighthly; Without the description of public forms of prayer, there can be no security given in the matter of our prayers, but we may burn assafœtida for incense, and the marrow of man's bones instead of the fat of rams; and of all things in the world, we should be most curious that our prayers be not turned into sin; and yet, if they be not prescribed and preconsidered, nothing can secure them antecedently; the people shall go to church, but without confidence that they shall return with a blessing,—for they know not whether God shall have a present made of a holy oblation, or else whether the minister will stand in the gap, or make the gap wider. But this I touched upon before.

110. Ninthly; They preserve the authority and sacredness of government, and, possibly, they are therefore decried, that the reputation of authority may decline together. For as God hath made it the great cancel between the clergy and the people, that they are deputed to speak to God for them, so is it the great distinction of the persons in that order, that the rulers shall judge between the ministers and the people, in relation to God, with what addresses they shall come before God, and intercede for the people; for so St. Paul enjoins, that "the spirits of the prophets should be submitted to the prophets," viz. to be discerned and judged by them; which thing is not practicable in permissions of every minister to pray what forms he pleases every day.

111. Tenthly; Public forms of liturgy are also the great securities and basis to the religion and piety of the people; for circumstances govern them most, and the very determination of a public office, and the appointment of that office at certain times, engages their spirits, the first to an habitual, the latter to an actual devotion. It is all that the οἱ πολλοὶ, "many men" know of their religion; and they cannot, any way, know it better, than by those forms of prayer which publish their faith, and their devotion to God, and all the world, and which, by an admirable expedient, reduces their faith into practice, and places their religion in their understanding and affections. And, therefore, St. Paul, when he was to give an account of his religion, he did it, not by a mere recitation of the articles, but by giving account of his liturgy, and the manner of his worship. "After that way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers."—And the best worship is the best religion, and, therefore, I am not to trust any man to make my manner of worshipping, unless I durst trust him to be the dictator of my religion; and a form of prayer made by a private man, is also my religion made by a private man. So that we must say "after the manner that G., the minister of B., shall conceive and speak, "so worship I the God of my fathers;" and if that be reasonable or pious, let all the world judge.

112. Eleventhly; But when authority shall consider and determine upon a form of liturgy, and this be used and practised in a church, there is an admirable conjunction in the religion, and great cooperation towards the glory of God. The authority of the injunction adds great reputation to the devotion, and takes off the contempt, which, from the no-authority of single and private persons, must be consequent to their conceived prayers; and the public practice of it, and union of spirits in the devotion, satisfies the world in the nature of it, and the religion of the church.

113. Twelfthly; But nothing can answer for the great scandal, which all wise persons, and all good persons in the world, must needs receive, when there is no public testimony consigned, that such a whole nation, or a church, hath any thing that can be called religion, and those little umbrages that are, are casual as chance itself, alterable as time; and shall be good when those infinite numbers of men, that are trusted with it, shall please to be honest, or shall have the good luck not to be mistaken.

114. Thirteenthly; I will not now instance in the vain-glory that is appendant to these new-made, every-day forms of prayer, and that some have been so vain, like the orators Quintilian speaks of, "ut verbum petant quo incipiant," that they have published their extempore faculty upon experimen and scenical bravery, you shall name the instanc and they shall compose the form: amongst whon also, the gift of the man is more than the devotio of the man; nor will I consider that then this gi is esteemed best, when his prayer is longest; an if he takes a complacency in his gift, (as who is n apt to do it?) he will be sure to extend his praye till a suspicious and scrupulous man would be a to say, "his prayer pressed hard upon that whic our blessed Saviour reprehended in the Pharisee 'who thought to be heard for their much babbling.' I know it was observed by a very wise man, tha the vanity of spirit and popular opinion tha grows great, and talks loudly of his abilities tha can speak extempore, may not only be the incentiv but a helper of the faculty, and make a man n only to love it, but to be the more able to do i "Ad dicendum etiam pudor stimulos addit et dicer dorum expectata laus; mirumque videri potes quod, cum stilus secreto gaudeat, atque omnes a bitros reformidet, extemporalis actio auditorum fr quentiâ, ut miles congestu signorum, excitatu Namque et difficiliorem cogitationem exprimit e expellit dicendi necessitas, et secundos impetu auget placendi cupido. Adeò præmium omnia spe tant, ut eloquentia quoque, quanquam plurimu habeat in se voluptatis maximè tamen præsen fructu laudis opinionisque ducatur."[t] It may s happen that the opinion of the people, as it is a to actuate the faculty, so also may encourage th practice, and spoil the devotion. But these thing are accidental to the nature of the thing, and, there fore, though they are too certainly consequent to th person, yet I will not be too severe, but preserv myself on the surer side of a charitable constru tion, which truly I desire to keep, not only to thei persons whom I much reverence, but also to thei actions. But yet I durst not do the same thing even for these last reasons, though I had no other.

115. In the next place, we must consider th next great objection, that is, with much clamou pretended, viz. that in set forms of prayer, we re strain and confine the blessed Spirit,—and in con ceived forms, when every man is left to his liberty then the Spirit is free, unlimited, and unconstrained

116. I answer, either their conceived forms (use their own words, though indeed the expressio is very inartificial) are premeditate and described or they are extempore. If they be premeditate an described, then the Spirit is as much limited in thei conceived forms, as in the church's conceived form For as to this particular, it is all one who describe and limits the form, whether the church or a singl man does it, still the Spirit is in constraint an limit. So that in this case they are not angry a set forms of prayer, but that they do not mak them. And if it be replied, that if a single perso composes a set form, he may alter it if he pleas and so his spirit is at liberty; I answer, so may th church, if she see cause for it; and unless there b cause, the single person will not alter it, unless h do things unreasonable, and without cause. So that it will be an unequal challenge, and a peevish quarrel to allow of set forms of prayer made by private persons, and not of set forms made by the public spirit of the church. It is evident that the Spirit is limited in both alike.

117. But if, by "conceived forms" in this objection, they mean extempore prayers, (for so they would be thought most generally to practise it,) and that in the use of these, the liberty of the Spirit is best preserved; to this I answer, that the being extempore, or premeditate, will be wholly impertinent to this question of limiting the Spirit. For there may be great liberty in set forms, even when there is much variety; and there may be great restraint in extempore prayers, even then when it shall be called unlawful to use set forms. That the Spirit is restrained, or that it is free in either, is accidental to them both; for it may be either free, or not free, in both, as it may happen.

118. But the restraint is this, that every one is not left to his liberty to pray how he list, (with premeditation or without, it makes not much matter,) but that he is prescribed unto by the spirit of another. But if it be a fault thus to restrain the Spirit, I would fain know, is not the Spirit restrained when the whole congregation shall be confined to the form of this one man's composing? Or shall it be unlawful, or at least a disgrace and disparagement, to use any set forms, especially of the church's composition? More plainly thus:

119. Secondly; Doth not the minister confine and restrain the spirit of the Lord's people, when they are tied to his form? It would sound of more liberty to their spirits, that every one might make a prayer of his own, and all pray together, and not be forced or confined to the minister's single dictate and private spirit. It is true, it would breed confusions, and, therefore, they might pray silently till the sermon began, and not for the avoiding one inconvenience run into a greater, and to avoid the disorder of a popular noise restrain the blessed Spirit; for even in this case, as well as in the other, where the Spirit of God is, there must be liberty.

120. Thirdly; If the spirit must be at liberty, who shall assure us this liberty must be in forms of prayer? And if so, whether also it must be in public prayer, and will it not suffice that it be in private? and if in public prayers, is not the liberty of the spirit sufficiently preserved, that the public spirit is free? That is, the church hath power, upon occasion, to alter and increase her litanies. By what argument shall any man make it so much as probable, that the Holy Ghost is injured, if every private minister's private spirit shall be guided (and therefore, by necessary consequence, limited) by the authority of the church's public spirit?

121. Fourthly; Does not the Directory that thing, which is here called restraining of the Spirit,—does it not appoint every thing but the words? And after this, is it not a goodly palladium that is contended for, and a princely liberty they leave unto the Spirit, to be free only in the supplying the place of a vocabulary, and a "copia verborum?" For as for the matter, it is all there described and appointed; and to those determined senses the Spirit must assist, or not at all, only for the words he shall take his choice. Now I desire it may be considered sadly and seriously, is it not as much injury to the Spirit to restrain his matter, as to appoint his words? Which is the more considerable of the two, sense or language, matter or words? I mean when they are taken singly, and separately. For so they may very well be, for as, if men prescribe the matter only, the Spirit may cover it with several words and expressions; so, if the Spirit prescribe the words, I may still abound in variety of sense, and preserve the liberty of my meaning: we see that true, in the various interpretations of the same words of Scripture. So that, in the greater of the two, the Spirit is restrained when his matter is appointed; and to make him amends, for not trusting him with the matter without our directions and limitations, we trust him to say what he pleases, so it be to our sense, to our purposes. A goodly compensation surely.

122. Fifthly; Did not Christ restrain the spirit of his apostles, when he taught them to pray the Lord's prayer, whether his precept to his disciples concerning it was, "Pray this," or "Pray thus;" "Pray these words," or "Pray after this manner?" Or though it had been less than either, and been only a directory for the matter, still it is a thing which our brethren, in all other cases of the same nature, are resolved perpetually to call a restraint. Certainly then, this pretended restraint is no such formidable thing. These men themselves do it by directing all of the matter, and much of the manner, and Christ himself did it, by prescribing both the matter and the words too.

123. Sixthly; These restraints, as they are called, or determinations of the spirit, are made by the Spirit himself. For I demand, when any assembly of divines appoint the matter of prayers to all particular ministers, as this hath done, is that appointment by the Spirit or no? if no, then for aught appears, this directory, not being made by God's Spirit, may be an enemy to it. But if this appointment be by the Spirit, then the determination and limitation of the spirit is by the Spirit himself; and such indeed is every pious and prudent constitution of the church, in matters spiritual. Such as was that of St. Paul to the Corinthians, when he prescribed orders for public prophesying, and interpretation, and speaking with tongues. The spirit of some he so restrained, that he bound them to hold their peace; he permitted but two or three to speak at one meeting, the rest were to keep silence, though possibly six or seven might, at that time, have the spirit.

124. Seventhly; Is it not a restraint of the spirit to sing a psalm in metre, by appointment? Clearly, as much as appointing forms of prayer, or eucharist; and yet that we see done daily, and no scruple made. Is not this to be partial in judgment, and inconsiderate of what we do?

125. Eighthly; And now after all this strife, what harm is there in restraining the spirit in the present sense? What prohibition? What law?

What reason or revelation is against it? What inconvenience in the nature of the thing? For, can any man be so weak as to imagine a despite is done to the Spirit of grace, when the gifts given to his church are used regularly, and by order? As if prudence was no gift of God's Spirit, as if helps in government, and the ordering spiritual matters, were none of those graces, which Christ, when "he ascended up on high," gave unto men. But this whole matter is wholly a stranger to reason, and never seen in Scripture.

126. For, divinity never knew any other vicious restraining the spirit, but either suppressing those holy incitements to virtue and good life, which God's Spirit ministers to us externally, or internally, or else a forbidding by public authority the ministers of the word and sacraments, to speak such truths as God hath commanded, and so taking away the liberty of prophesying. The first is directly vicious "in materia speciali:" the second is tyrannical and antichristian. And to it persecution of true religion is to be reduced. But as for this pretended limiting or restraining the spirit, viz. by appointing a regular form of prayer, it is so very a "chimæra," that it hath no footing or foundation upon any ground, where a wise man may build his confidence.

127. Ninthly; But lastly, how if the spirit must be restrained, and that by precept apostolical? That calls us to a new account. But if it be not true, what means St. Paul by saying, "The spirits of the prophets must be subject to the prophets?" What greater restraint than subjection? If subjected, then they must be ruled; if ruled, then limited; prescribed unto, and as much under restraint, as the spirits of the superior prophets shall judge convenient. I suppose by this time, this objection will trouble us no more. But perhaps another will.

128. For, why are not the ministers to be left as well to their liberty in making their prayers, as their sermons? I answer, the church may if she will, but whether she doth well or no, let her consider. This I am sure, there is not the same reason, and I fear the experience the world hath already had of it, will make demonstration enough of the inconvenience. But, however, the differences are many.

129. First; Our prayers offered up by the minister, are in behalf and in the name of the people; and, therefore, great reason they should know beforehand what is to be presented, that if they like not the message they may refuse to communicate, especially since people are so divided in their opinions, in their hopes, and in their faiths; it being a duty to refuse communion with those prayers, which they think to have in them the matter of sin or doubting. Which reason, on the other part, ceases. For the minister being to speak from God to the people, if he speaks what he ought not, God can right himself, however, is not a partner of the sin,—as, in the other case, the people possibly may be.

130. Secondly; It is more fit a liberty be left in preaching than praying, because the address of our discourses and exhortations is to be made according to the understanding and capacity of the audience, their prejudices are to be removed, all advantages to be taken, and they are to be surprised that way they lie most open; "But being crafty I caught you," saith St. Paul to the Corinthians. And discourses and arguments "ad hominem," upon their particular principles and practices, may more move them than the most polite and accurate that do not comply, and wind about their fancies and affections. St. Paul, from the absurd practice of being baptized for the dead, made an excellent argument to convince the Corinthians of the resurrection. But this reason also ceases in our prayers. For God understandeth what we say sure enough; he hath no prejudices to be removed, no infirmities to be wrought upon, and a fine figure of rhetoric, a pleasant cadence and a curious expression, move not him at all: no other twinings and compliances stir him, but charity, and humility, and zeal, and importunity, which all are things internal and spiritual. It was observed by Pliny, "Deos ipsos, non tam accuratis adorantium precibus, quàm innocentiâ, et sanctitate lætari: gratioremque existimari qui delubris eorum puram castamque mentem, quàm qui meditatum carmen intulerit."[u] And, therefore of necessity, there is to be great variety of discourses to the people, and permissions accordingly; but not so to God,—with whom a "Deus miserere" prevails, as soon as the great office of forty hours not long since invented in the church of Rome, or any other prayers spun out to a length beyond the extension of the office of a pharisee.

131. Thirdly; I fear it cannot stand with our reverence to God, to permit to every spirit a liberty of public address to him, in behalf of the people. Indeed, he that is not fit to pray, is not always fit to preach; but it is more safe to be bold with the people, than with God, if the persons be not so fit. In that there may be indiscretion, but there may be impiety and irreligion in this. The people may better excuse and pardon an indiscretion, or a rudeness, if any such should happen, than we may venture to offer it to God.

132. Fourthly; There is a latitude of theology much whereof is left to us, so without precise and clear determination, that without breach either of faith or charity, men may differ in opinion: and if they may not be permitted to abound in their own sense, they will be apt to complain of tyranny over consciences, and that men lord it over their faith. In prayer this thing is so different, that it is imprudent, and full of inconvenience, to derive such things into our prayers, which may with good profit be matter of sermons. Therefore, here a liberty may well enough be granted, when there it may better be denied.

133. Fifthly; But indeed, if I may freely declare my opinion, I think it were not amiss, if the liberty of making sermons were something more restrained than it is, and that either such persons only were intrusted with the liberty, for whom the church herself may safely be responsive, that is, to men learned and pious, and that the other part the "vulgus cleri" should instruct the people out of the fountains of the church, and the public stock, till by so long exercise and discipline in the schools of the prophets, they may also be intrusted to minister of their own unto the people. This, I am sure, was the practice of the primitive church; when preaching was as ably and religiously performed as now it is; but in this I prescribe nothing. But truly I think the reverend divines of the assembly are many of them of my mind in this particular, and that they observe a liberty indulged to some persons to preach, which, I think, they had rather should hold their peace, and yet think the church better edified in their silence, than their sermons.

134. Sixthly; But yet methinks the argument objected so far as the extempore men make use of it, if it were turned with the edge the other way, would have more reason in it; and instead of arguing, "Why should not the same liberty be allowed to their spirit in praying as in preaching?" it were better to substitute this: "If they can pray with the Spirit, why do they not also preach with the Spirit?" And, it may be, there may be in reason or experience, something more for preaching and making orations by the excellency of a man's spirit and learning, than for the other, which, in the greatest abilities, it may be unfit to venture to God, without public approbation: but for sermons, they may be fortunate and safe, if made extempore. "Si calor ac spiritus tulit, frequenter accidit, ut successum extemporalem consequi cura non possit; Deum tunc adfuisse, cum id evenisset, veteres oratores, 'ut Cicero ait," dictitabant."[x] Now let them make demonstration of their spirit, by making excellent sermons extempore: that it may become an experiment of their other faculty, that after they are tried and approved in this, they may be considered for the other: and if praying with the Spirit be praying extempore, why shall not they preach extempore too, or else confess they preach without the Spirit, or that they have not the gift of preaching? For to say that the gift of prayer is a gift extempore, but the gift of preaching is with study and deliberation, is to become vain and impertinent. "Quis enim discrevit?" "Who hath made them of a different consideration?" I mean as to this particular, as to their efficient cause? Nor reason, nor revelation, nor God, nor man.

135. To sum up all. If any man hath a mind to exercise his gift of prayer, let him set himself to work, and compose books of devotion; (we have need of them in the church of England, so apparent need, that some of the church of Rome have made it an objection against us;) and this his gift of prayer will be to edification. But, otherwise, I understand it is more fit for ostentation, than any spiritual advantage. For God hears us not the sooner for our extempore, long, or conceived prayers, possibly they may become a hinderance, as in the cases before instanced. And I am sure, if the people be intelligent, and can discern, they are hindered in their devotion; for they dare not say "Amen," till they have considered, and many such cases will occur in extempore or unlicensed prayers, that need much considering before we attest them. But if the people be not intelligent, they are apt to swallow all the inconveniences which may multiply in so great a license: and therefore it were well that the governors of the church, who are to answer for their souls, should judge for them, before they say "Amen;" which judgment cannot be without set forms of liturgy. My sentence therefore is, ἵνα μένωμεν ὥσπερ ἐσμὲν, "let us be as we are already;" few changes are for the better.

136. For if it be pretended, that in the liturgy of the church of England,—which was composed with much art and judgment, by a church that hath as much reason to be confident,—she hath the spirit and gift of prayer, as any single person hath; and each learned man, that was at its first composition, can as much prove that he had the Spirit, as the objectors now-a-days (and he that boasts most, certainly hath the least): if, I say, it be pretended, that there are many errors and inconveniences, both in the order and in the matter of the common prayer-book, made by such men, with so much industry: how much more, and with how much greater reason, may we all dread the inconveniences and disorders of extempore and conceived prayers? Where respectively there is neither conjunction of heads, nor premeditation, nor industry, nor method, nor art, nor any of those things, or at least, not in the same degree, which were likely to have exempted the common prayer-book from errors and disorders. "If these things be done in the green tree, what will be done in the dry?"

137. But if it be said, the extempore and conceived prayers will be secured from error by the Directory, because that chalks them out the matter; I answer, it is not sufficient, because, if when men study both the matter and the words too, they may be, and, it is pretended, are actually, deceived, —much more may they, when the matter is left much more at liberty, and the words under no restraint at all. And no man can avoid the pressure and the weight of this, unless the compilers of the Directory were infallible, and that all their followers are so too, of the certainty of which I am not yet fully satisfied.

138. And after this, I would fain know, what benefit and advantages the church of England, in her united capacity, receives by this new device? For the public, it is clear, that whether the ministers pray before they study, or study before they pray, there must needs be infinite deformity in the public worship, and all the benefits which before were the consequents of conformity and unity, will be lost; and if they be not valuable, I leave it to all them to consider, who know the inconveniences of public disunion, and the public disunion that is certainly consequent to them, who do not communicate in any common forms of worship; and to think that the Directory will bring conformity, is as if one should say, that all who are under the same hemisphere, are joined "in communi patriâ," and will love like countrymen. For under the Directory

there will be as different religions, and as different desires, and as differing forms, as there are several varieties of men and manners under the one half of heaven, who yet breathe under the same half of the globe.

139. But ask again, what benefit can the public receive by this form, or this no form? For I know not whether to call it. Shall the matter of prayers be better in all churches? shall God be better served? shall the word of God, and the best patterns of prayers, be always exactly followed? It is well if it be. But there is no security given us by the Directory; for the particulars, and special instances of the matter, are left at every man's dispose for all that, and we must depend upon the honesty of every particular for it: and if any man proves a heretic, or a knave, then he may introduce what impiety he please into the public forms of God's worship: and there is no law made to prevent it, and it must be cured afterward, if it can, but beforehand it is not prevented at all by the Directory, which trusts every man.

140. But I observe that all the benefit which is pretended, is, that it will make an able ministry. "Maximus verò studiorum fructus est, et præmium quoddam amplissimum longi laboris, extempore dicendi facultas," said an excellent person.[y] And it is very true; to be able to speak excellent things, without long considering, is an effect of a long industry, and greatest learning; but, certainly, the greatest enemy in the world to its production: much learning, and long use of speaking, may enable a man to speak upon sudden occasions, but speaking without consideration will never make much learning. "Nec quisquam tantum fidi ingenio, ut sibi speret incipienti statim posse contingere, sed sicut in cogitatione præcipimus, ita facilitatem quoque extemporalem à parvis initiis paulatim perducemus ad summam:"[z] And to offer that, as a means of getting learning, which cannot be done at all as it ought, but after learning is already gotten, in a very great degree, is highest mistaking. I confess I am very much from believing the allegation, and so will every man be, that considers what kind of men they are that have been most zealous for that way of conceived prayer. I am sure that very few of the learnedest, very many ignorants, most those who have the least abode in the schools of the prophets. And that I may disgrace no man's person, we see tradesmen of the most illiberal arts, and women, pretend to it, and do it with as many words, (and that is the main thing,) with as much confidence, and speciousness of spirit, as the best among them.[a]—"Sed nec tumultuarii nec fortuiti sermonis contextum mirabor unquam, quem jurgantibus etiam mulierculis superfluere video;" said Quintilian.[b] And it is but a small portion of learning that will serve a man to make conceived forms of prayer, which they may have easily upon the stock of other men, or upon their own fancy, or upon any thing in which no learning is required. He that knows not thi knows nothing of the craft that may be in th preacher's trade. But what? Is God better served I would fain see any authority, or any reason, any probability for that. I am sure, ignorant me offer him none of the best sacrifices extempore, an learned men will be sure to deliberate and kno God is then better served when he is served by public, than when by a private spirit. I cann imagine what accruements will hence come to th public: it may be some advantages may be to th private interests of men. For there are a sort men, whom our blessed Saviour noted, "Who devo widows' houses, and for a pretence make lon prayers."—They "make prayers," and they "mak them long;" by this means they receive doubl advantages, for they get reputation to their abilit and to their piety. And although the commo prayer-book, in the Preface to the Directory, b charged with unnecessary length, yet we see tha most of these men, they that are most eminent, would be thought so, make their prayers longe and will not lose the benefits which their cred gets, and they, by their credit, for making the prayers.

141. Add this, that there is no promise in Scri ture, that he who prays extempore shall be hea the better, or that he shall be assisted at all to suc purposes; and, therefore, to innovate in so high matter, without a warrant to command us, or a pr mise to warrant us, is no better than vanity the thing, and presumption in the person. H therefore, that considers that this way of prayer without all manner of precedent in the primitiv church, against the example of all famous church in all christendom, in the whole descent of fiftee ages, without all command or warrant of Scri ture; that it is unreasonable in the nature of th thing, against prudence and the best wisdom humanity, because it is without deliberation; tha it is innovation in a high degree, without that au thority which is truly, and by inherent and ancie right, to command and prescribe to us in extern forms of worship; that it is much to the disgrac of the first reformers of our religion; that it give encouragement to the church of Rome to quarre with some reason, and more pretence, against ou reformation, as being by the Directory confessed t have been done in much blindness, and, therefor might err in the excess as well as in the defec throwing out too much, as casting off too litt (which is the more likely, because they wanted n zeal to carry them far enough): he that consider the universal deformity of public worship, and th no means of union, no symbol of public communio being publicly consigned; that all heresies may with the same authority, be brought into our prayer and offered to God in the behalf of the people, wit the same authority that any truth may, all the pa ticular matter of our prayers being left to th choice of all men of all persuasions,—and then observes, that actually there are in many places heresy, and blasphemy, and impertinency, and illiterate rudenesses, put into the devotion of the most solemn days and the most public meetings; and then, lastly, that there are divers parts of liturgy for which no provision at all is made in the Directory, and the very administration of the sacraments left so loosely, that if there be any thing essential in the forms of sacraments, the sacrament may become ineffectual for want of due words, and due administration;—I say, he that considers all these things (and many more he may consider) will find that particular men are not fit to be intrusted to offer in public with their private spirit to God, for the people, in such solemnities, in matters of so great concernment, where the honour of God,—the benefit of the people, the interest of kingdoms,—the being of a church,—the unity of minds,—the conformity of practice,—the truth of persuasion,—and the salvation of souls,—are so much concerned as they are in the public prayers of a whole national church. TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

CHRISTOPHER LORD HATTON,

BARON HATTON OF KIRBY, COMPTROLLER OF HIS MAJESTY'S HOUSEHOLD, AND ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY COUNCIL.

My Lord,

In this great storm, which hath dashed the vessel of the church all in pieces, I have been cast up the coast of Wales, and, in a little boat, thought to have enjoyed that rest and quietness, which, in En land, in a greater, I could not hope for. Here I cast anchor, and thinking to ride safely, the storm f lowed me with so impetuous violence, that it broke a cable, and I lost my anchor; and here again I w exposed to the mercy of the sea, and the gentleness of an element that could neither distinguish thin nor persons. And but that he who stilleth the raging of the sea, and the noise of his waves, and t madness of his people, had provided a plank for me, I had been lost to all the opportunities of content study. But I know not whether I have been more preserved by the courtesies of my friends, or t gentleness and mercies of a noble enemy: Οἱ γὰρ βάρβαροι παρεῖχον οὐ τὴν τυχοῦσαν φιλανθρωπί ἡμῖν· ἀνάψαντες γὰρ πυρὰν, προσελάβοντο πάντας ἡμᾶς, διὰ τὸν ὑετὸν τὸν ἐφεστῶτα, καὶ διὰ τὸ ψύχ And now since I have come ashore, I have been gathering a few sticks to warm me, a few books entertain my thoughts, and divert them from the perpetual meditation of my private troubles and t public dyscrasy: but those which I could obtain were so few, and so impertinent, and unuseful any great purposes, that I began to be sad upon a new stock, and full of apprehension that I shou live unprofitably, and die obscurely, and be forgotten, and my bones thrown into some common charn house, without any name or note to distinguish me from those who only served their generation, filling the number of citizens, and who could pretend to no thanks or reward from the public, beyo "jus trium liberorum." While I was troubled with these thoughts, and busy to find an opportunity doing some good, in my small proportion, still the cares of the public did so intervene, that it w as impossible to separate my design from relating to the present, as to exempt myself from the participati of the common calamity; still half my thoughts was, in spite of all my diversions and arts of avocatio fixed upon, and mingled with, the present concernments; so that besides them I could not go. N because the great question is concerning religion, and in that also my scene lies, I resolved here to fix m considerations; especially when I observed the ways of promoting the several opinions, which n are busy, to be such, as besides that they were most troublesome to me, and such as I could, by means, be friends withal, they were also such as, to my understanding, did the most apparently disser their ends, whose design in advancing their own opinions was pretended for religion. For as co trary as cruelty is to mercy, as tyranny to charity, so is war and bloodshed to the meekness and gentleness of christian religion. And however that there are some exterminating spirits, who think God to delight in human sacrifices, as if that oracle—Καὶ κεφαλὰς ἄδῃ καὶ τῷ πατρὶ πέμπετε φῶτα had come from the Father of spirits; yet if they were capable of cool and tame homilies, or would hear men of other opinions give a quiet account, without invincible resolutions never to alter their persuasions, I am very much persuaded it would not be very hard to dispute such men into mercies, and compliances, and tolerations mutual, such, I say, who are zealous for Jesus Christ, than whose doctrine never was any thing more merciful and humane, whose lessons were softer than nard or the juice of the Candian olive. Upon the first apprehension, I designed a discourse to this purpose, with as much greediness as if I had thought it possible, with my arguments, to have persuaded the rough and hard-handed soldiers to have disbanded presently: for I had often thought of the prophecy that in the gospel "our swords should be turned into plow-shares, and our spears into pruning-hooks:" I knew that no tittle spoken by God's Spirit could return unperformed and ineffectual; and I was certain that such was the excellency of Christ's doctrine, that if men could obey it, christians should never war one against another: in the mean time, I considered not that it was "prædictio consilii, non eventûs," till I saw what men were now doing, and ever had done, since the heats and primitive fervours did cool, and the love of interests swelled higher than the love of christianity: but then, on the other side, I began to fear, that whatever I could say would be as ineffectual as it could be reasonable. For if those excellent words which our blessed Master spake, could not charm the tumult of our spirits, I had little reason to hope that one of the meanest and most ignorant of his servants could advance the end of that which he calls his great, and his old, and his new commandment, so well as the excellency of his own Spirit and discourses could. And yet since he who knew every event of things, and the success and efficacy of every doctrine, and that very much of it to most men, and all of it to some men, would be ineffectual, yet was pleased to consign our duty, that it might be a direction to them that would, and a conviction and a testimony against them that would not obey: I thought it might not misbecome my duty and endeavours to plead for peace and charity, and forgiveness and permissions mutual; although I had reason to believe, that such is the iniquity of men, and they so indisposed to receive such impresses, that I had as good plough the sands, or till the air, as persuade such doctrines, which destroy men's interests, and serve no end but the great end of a happy eternity, and what is in order to it. But because the events of things are in God's disposition, and I knew them not,—and because if I had known, my good purposes would be totally ineffectual as to others, yet my own designation and purposes would be of advantage to myself, who might, from God's mercy, expect the retribution which he is pleased to promise to all pious intendments: I resolved to encounter with all objections, and to do something to which I should be determined by the consideration of the present distemperatures and necessities, by my own thoughts, by the questions and scruples, the sects and names, the interests and animosities, which at this day, and for some years past, have exercised and disquieted christendom.

Thus far I discoursed myself into employment, and having come thus far, I knew not how to get further; for I had heard of a great experience, how difficult it was to make brick without straw: and here I had even seen my design blasted in the bud, and I despaired, in the calends, of doing what I purposed in the ides before. For I had no books of my own here, nor any in the voisinage: and but that I remembered the result of some of those excellent discourses I had heard your Lordship make, when I was so happy as, in private, to gather up what your temperance and modesty forbids to be public, I had come "in prælia inermis," and, like enough, might have fared accordingly. I had this only advantage besides, that I have chosen a subject, in which, if my own reason does not abuse me, I needed no other books or aids than what a man carries with him on horseback, I mean, the common principles of christianity, and those ἀξιώματα, which men use in the transactions of the ordinary occurrences of civil society: and upon the strength of them, and some other collateral assistances, I have run through it "utcunque;" and the sum of the following discourses is nothing but the sense of these words of Scripture, that since "we know in part, and prophesy in part, and that now we see through a glass darkly,"[a] we should not despise or contemn persons not so knowing as ourselves, but "him that is weak in the faith, we should receive, but not to doubtful disputations:"[b] therefore, certainly to charity, and not to vexations, not to those which are the idle effects of impertinent wranglings. And provided they keep close to the foundation, which is faith and obedience, let them build upon this foundation matter more or less precious, yet if the foundation be entire, they shall be saved with or without loss. And since we profess ourselves servants of so meek a Master, and disciples of so charitable an institute, "Let us walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love:"[c] for this is the best endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit, when it is fast tied in the bond of peace. And although it be a duty of christianity, "that we all speak the same thing, that there be no divisions among us, but that we be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment:"[d] yet this unity is to be estimated according to the unity of faith, in things necessary, in matters of creed, and articles fundamental: for as for other things, it is more to be wished than to be hoped for. There are some

[a] 1 Cor. xiii. [b] Rom. xiv. [c] Ephes. iv. 2, 3. [d] 1 Cor. i. 10.

"doubtful disputations,"[e] and in such "the scribe, the wise, the disputer of this world," are, mo commonly, very far from certainty, and, many times, from truth. There are diversity of persuasions matters adiaphorous, as meats, and drinks, and holy days, &c. and both parties, the affirmative and t negative, affirm and deny with innocence enough; for the observer, and he that observes not, inte both to God; and God is our common Master, we are all fellow-servants, and not the judge of ea other in matters of conscience or doubtful disputation; and every man that "hath faith, must have it himself before God," but no man must, in such matters, either "judge his brother or set him at nought but "let us follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another And the way to do that is not by knowledge, but by charity; for "knowledge puffeth up, but chari edifieth."[f] And since there is not in "every man the same knowledge, but the consciences of some a weak;"[g] as "my liberty must not be judged of another man's weak conscience,"[h] so must not I plea myself so much in my right opinion, but I must also take order that his "weak conscience be not offend or despised:" for no man must "seek his own, but every man another's wealth."[i] And although "must contend earnestly for the faith," yet "above all things, we must put on charity, which is the bo of perfectness." And, therefore, this contention must be with arms fit for the christian warfare, "t sword of the Spirit, and the shield of faith, and preparation of the gospel of peace, instead of shoes, a a helmet of salvation."[k] But not with other arms; for a churchman must not be πληκτικὸς, "a striker; for "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but spiritual," and the persons that use them ought be "gentle, and easy to be entreated; and we must give an account of our faith to them that ask us, wi meekness and humility, for so is the will of God, that with well-doing ye may put to silence the ignoran of foolish men." These, and thousands more to the same purpose, are the doctrines of christianity, who sense and intendment I have prosecuted in the following discourse, being very much displeased that so ma opinions and new doctrines are commenced among us; but more troubled, that every man that hath opinion, thinks his own and other men's salvation is concerned in its maintenance; but most of all, th men should be persecuted and afflicted for disagreeing in such opinions, which they cannot, with sufficie grounds, obtrude upon others necessarily, because they cannot propound them infallibly, and because th have no warrant from Scripture so to do. For if I shall tie other men to believe my opinion, because think I have a place of Scripture, which seems to warrant it to my understanding, why may not he ser up another dish to me in the same dress, and exact the same task of me to believe the contradictory And then, since all the heretics in the world have offered to prove their articles by the same means which true believers propound theirs, it is necessary that some separation, either of doctrine or of perso be clearly made, and that all pretences may not be admitted, nor any just allegations be rejected; and y that in some other questions, whether they be truly or falsely pretended, if not evidently or demonstr tively, there may be considerations had to the persons of men, and to the laws of charity, more than to t triumphing in any opinion or doctrine not simply necessary. Now, because some doctrines are clear not necessary, and some are absolutely necessary, why may not the first separation be made upon th difference, and articles necessary be only urged as necessary, and the rest left to men indifferently, as th were by the Scripture indeterminately? And it were well if men would as much consider themselves the doctrines, and think that they may as well be deceived by their own weakness, as persuaded by t arguments of a doctrine, which other men, as wise, call inevident. For it is a hard case that we shou think all papists, and anabaptists, and sacramentaries, to be fools and wicked persons: certainly, amo all these sects, there are very many wise men and good men, as well as erring. And although some zea are so hot, and their eyes so inflamed with their ardours, that they do not think their adversaries look li other men; yet certainly we find by the results of their discourses, and the transactions of their affairs civil society, that they are men that speak and make syllogisms, and use reason, and read Scripture: a although they do no more understand all of it than we do, yet they endeavour to understand as much concerns them, even all that they can, even all that concerns repentance from dead works, and faith in o Lord Jesus Christ. And, therefore, methinks this also should be another consideration distinguishing t persons: for, if the persons be christians in their lives, and christians in their profession, if they ackno ledge the eternal Son of God for their Master and their Lord, and live in all relations as becomes perso making such professions, why then should I hate such persons whom God loves, and who love God, w are partakers of Christ, and Christ hath a title to them, who dwell in Christ, and Christ in them, becau their understandings have not been brought up like mine, have not had the same masters, they have n met with the same books, nor the same company, or have not the same interest, or are not so wise, else are wiser; that is, for some reason or other, which I neither do understand nor ought to blame,— have not the same opinions that I have, and do not determine their school-questions to the sense of m sect or interest?

But now, I know beforehand, that those men who will endure none but their own sect, will make a manner of attempts against these purposes of charity and compliance, and, say I or do I what I can, wi tell all their proselytes that I preach indifferency of religion; that I say it is no matter how we believ nor what they profess, but that they may comply with all sects, and do violence to their own consciences that they may be saved in all religions, and so make way for a "colluvies" of heresies, and by cons quence destroy all religion. Nay, they will say worse than all this; and, but that I am not used to the phrases and forms of declamation, I am persuaded I might represent fine tragedies beforehand. And this will be such an objection, that although I am most confident I shall make it apparent to be as false and scandalous as the objectors themselves are zealous and impatient; yet, besides that I believe the objection will come where my answers will not come, or not be understood, I am also confident, that, in defiance and incuriousness of all that I shall say, some men will persist pertinaciously in the accusation, and deny my conclusion in despite of me. Well, but however, I will try.

And, first, I answer, that whatsoever is against the foundation of faith, or contrary to good life and the laws of obedience, or destructive to human society, and the public and just interests of bodies politic, is out of the limits of my question, and does not pretend to compliance or toleration: so that I allow no indifferency, nor any countenance, to those religions whose principles destroy government, nor to those religions (if there be any such) that teach ill life; nor do I think that any thing will now excuse from belief of a fundamental article, except stupidity or sottishness, and natural inability. This alone is sufficient answer to this vanity; but I have much more to say.

Secondly; the intendment of my discourse is, that permissions should be in questions speculative, indeterminable, curious, and unnecessary; and that men would not make more necessities than God made, which indeed are not many. The fault I find, and seek to remedy, is, that men are so dogmatical and resolute in their opinions, and impatient of others disagreeing, in those things wherein is no sufficient means of union and determination; but that men should let opinions and problems keep their own forms, and not be obtruded as axioms, nor questions in the vast collection of the system of divinity be adopted into the family of faith. And, I think, I have reason to desire this.

Thirdly; it is hard to say that he who would not have men put to death, or punished corporally, for such things for which no human authority is sufficient, either for cognizance or determination, or competent for infliction, that he persuades to an indifferency, when he refers to another judicatory, which is competent, sufficient, infallible, just, and highly severe. No man, or company of men, can judge or punish our thoughts or secret purposes, whilst they so remain. And yet it will be unequal to say, that he who owns this doctrine, preaches it lawful for men to think or purpose what they will. And so it is in matters of doubtful disputation, such as are the distinguishing articles of most of the sects of christendom; so it is in matters intellectual, which are not cognizable by a secular power; in matters spiritual, which are to be discerned by spiritual authority, which cannot make corporal inflictions; and in questions indeterminate, which are doubtfully propounded, or obscurely, and, therefore, may be, "in utramque partem," disputed or believed. For God alone must be Judge of these matters, who alone is Master of our souls, and hath a dominion over human understanding; and he that says this, does not say that indifferency is persuaded, because God alone is Judge of erring persons.

Fourthly; no part of this discourse teaches or encourages variety of sects, and contradiction in opinions, but supposes them already in being: and, therefore, since there are, and ever were, and ever will be, variety of opinions, because there is variety of human understandings, and uncertainty in things, no man should be too forward in determining all questions, nor so forward in prescribing to others, nor invade that liberty which God hath left to us entire, by propounding many things obscurely, and by exempting our souls and understandings from all power externally compulsory. So that the restraint is laid upon men's tyranny, but no license given to men's opinions; they are not considered in any of the conclusions, but in the premises only, as an argument to exhort to charity. So that if I persuade a license of discrediting any thing which God hath commanded us to believe, and allow a liberty where God hath not allowed it, let it be shown, and let the objection press as hard as it can: but to say that men are too forward in condemning, where God hath declared no sentence, nor prescribed any rule, is to dissuade from tyranny, not to encourage licentiousness; is to take away a license of judging, not to give a license of dogmatizing what every one please, or as may best serve his turn. And for the other part of the objection:

Fifthly; this discourse is so far from giving leave to men to profess any thing, though they believe the contrary, that it takes order that no man shall be put to it: for I earnestly contend that another man's opinion shall be no rule to mine, and that my opinion shall be no snare and prejudice to myself; that men use one another so charitably and so gently, that no error or violence tempt men to hypocrisy: this very thing being one of the arguments I use to persuade permissions, lest compulsion introduce hypocrisy, and make sincerity troublesome and unsafe.

Sixthly; if men would not call all opinions by the name of religion, and superstructures by the name of fundamental articles, and all fancies by the glorious appellative of faith, this objection would have no pretence or footing: so that it is the disease of the men, not any cause that is ministered by such precepts of charity, that makes them perpetually clamorous. And it would be hard to say that such physicians are incurious of their patients, and neglectful of their health, who speak against the unreasonableness of such empirics, that would cut off a man's head, if they see but a wart upon his cheek, or a dimple upon his chin, or any lines in his face to distinguish him from another man: the case is altogether the same, and we may as well decree a wart to be mortal, as a various opinion, "in re alioqui non necessariâ," to be capitable and damnable.

For I consider that there are but few doctrines of christianity that were ordered to be preached to all the world, to every single person, and made a necessary article of his explicit belief. Other doctrines, which are all of them not simply necessary, are either such as are not clearly revealed, or such as are. If they be clearly revealed, and that I know so too, or may, but for my own fault,—I am not to be excused: but for this I am to be left to God's judgment, unless my fault be externally such as to be cognizable and punishable in human judicatory. But then if it be not so revealed, but that wise men and good men differ in their opinions, it is a clear case it is not "inter dogmata necessaria simpliciter;" and then it is certain I may, therefore, safely disbelieve it, because I may be safely ignorant of it. For if I may, with innocence, be ignorant, then to know it, or believe it, is not simply obligatory; ignorance is absolutely inconsistent with such an obligation, because it is destructive and a plain negative to its performance; and if I do my honest endeavour to understand it, and yet do not attain it, it is certain that it is not obligatory to me so much as by accident; for no obligation can press the person of a man, if it be impossible; no man is bound to do more than his best, no man is bound to have an excellent understanding, or to be infallible, or to be wiser than he can; for these are things that are not in his choice and therefore not a matter of a law, nor subject to reward and punishment. So that where ignorance of the article is not a sin, there, disbelieving it in the right sense, or believing it in the wrong, is not a breach of any duty essentially or accidentally necessary, either in the thing itself, or to the person; that is, he is neither bound to the article, nor to any endeavours or antecedent acts of volition and choice; and that man who may safely be ignorant of the proposition, is not tied at all to search it out; and if not at all to search it, then certainly not to find it. All the obligation we are capable of is, not to be malicious or voluntarily criminal in any kind: and, then, if by accident we find out a truth, we are obliged to believe it; and so will every wise or good man do; indeed he cannot do otherwise. But if he disbelieves an article, without malice or design, or involuntarily or unknowingly, it is a contradiction to say it is a sin to him, who might totally have been ignorant of it; for, that he believes it in the wrong sense, it is his ignorance; and it is impossible that where he hath heartily endeavoured to find out a truth, that his endeavour should make him guilty of a sin, which would never have been laid to his charge, if he had taken no pains at all. His ignorance, in this case, is not a fault at all; possibly it might, if there had been no endeavour to have cured it.

So that there is wholly a mistake in this proposition. For true it is, there are some propositions, which if a man never hear of, they will not be required by him; and they who cannot read, might safely be ignorant that Melchisedec was king of Salem; but he who reads it in the Scripture, may not safely contradict it, although before that knowledge did arrive to him, he might safely have been ignorant of it. But this, although it be true, is not pertinent to our question; for, "in sensu diviso," this is true, that which, at one time, a man may be ignorant of, at some other time he may not disbelieve; but, "in sensu conjuncto," it is false; for, at what, and in what circumstance soever, it is no sin to be ignorant,—at that time, and in that conjuncture, it is no sin to disbelieve. And such is the nature of all questions disputable, which are, therefore, not required of us to be believed, in any one particular sense, because the nature of the thing is such as not to be necessary to be known at all, simply and absolutely; and such is the ambiguity and cloud of its face and representment, as not to be necessary, so much as by accident, and, therefore, not to the particular sense of any one person.

And yet, such is the iniquity of men, that they suck in opinions as wild asses do the wind, without distinguishing the wholesome from the corrupted air, and then live upon it at a venture; and when all their confidence is built upon zeal and mistake, yet, therefore, because they are zealous and mistaken, they are impatient of contradiction.

But, besides that against this I have laid prejudice enough, from the dictates of Holy Scripture, it is observable that this, with its appendant degrees, I mean restraint of prophesying, imposing upon other men's understanding, being masters of their consciences, and lording it over their faith, came in with the retinue and train of antichrist; that is, they came as other abuses and corruptions of the church did, by reason of the iniquity of times, and the cooling of the first heats of christianity, and the increase of interest, and the abatements of christian simplicity when the church's fortune grew better, and her sons grew worse, and some of her fathers worst of all. For, in the first three hundred years, there was no sign of persecuting any man for his opinion, though, at that time, there were very horrid opinions commenced, and such which were exemplary and parallel enough to determine this question; for they then were assaulted by new sects, which destroyed the common principles of nature, of christianity, of innocence, and public society; and they who used all the means, christian and spiritual, for their disimprovement and conviction, thought not of using corporal force, otherwise than by blaming such proceedings. And, therefore, I do not only urge their not doing it, as an argument of the unlawfulness of such proceeding, but their defying it, and speaking against such practices, as unreasonable, and destructive of christianity. For so Tertullian[1] is express: "Humani juris et naturalis potestatis, unicuique quod putaverit, colere; sed nec religionis est cogere religionem, quæ suscipi debet sponte, non vi." The same is the doctrine of St. Cyprian, Lactantius, St. Hilary, Minutius Felix, Sulpitius Severus, St. Chrysostom, St. Jerome, St. Austin, Damascen, Theophylact, Socrates Scholasticus, and St. Bernard, as they are severally referred to and urged, upon occasion, in the following discourse.

To which I add, that all wise princes, till they were overborne with faction, or solicited by peevish persons, gave toleration to differing sects, whose opinions did not disturb the public interest. But, at first, there were some heretical persons that were also impatient of an adversary, and they were the men, who at first entreated the emperors to persecute the catholics: but till four hundred years after Christ, no catholic persons, or very few, did provoke the secular arm, or implore its aid against the heretics, save only that Arius behaved himself so seditiously and tumultuarily, that the Nicene fathers procured a temporary decree for his relegation; but it was soon taken off, and God left to be his judge; who indeed did it to some purpose, when he was trusted with it, and the matter wholly left to him.

But as the ages grew worse, so men grew more cruel and unchristian: and in the Greek church, Atticus, and Nestorius of Constantinople, Theodosius of Synada, and some few others, who had forgotten the mercies of their great Master, and their own duty, grew implacable, and furious, and impatient of contradiction. It was a bold and an arrogant speech, which Nestorius made in a sermon before Theodosius the younger, "Da mihi, O imperator, terram ab hæreticis repurgatam, et ego tibi vicissim cœlum dabo: Disperde mecum hæreticos, et ego tecum disperdam Persas."—It was as groundless and unwarrantable, as it was bloody and inhuman.

And we see the contrary events prove truer than this groundless and unlearned promise: for Theodosius and Valentinian were prosperous princes, and have, to all ages, a precious memory, and the reputation of a great piety; but they were so far from doing what Nestorius had suggested, that they restrained him from his violence and immanity; and Theodosius did highly commend the good bishop Proclus, for his sweetness of deportment towards erring persons, far above the cruelty of his predecessor Atticus. And the experience which christendom hath had in this last age, is argument enough that toleration of different opinions is so far from disturbing the public peace, or destroying the interest of princes and commonwealths, that it does advantage to the public, it secures peace, because there is not so much as the pretence of religion left to such persons to contend for it, being already indulged to them. When France fought against the Huguenots, the spilling of her own blood was argument enough of the imprudence of that way of promoting religion; but since she hath given permission to them, the world is witness how prosperous she hath been ever since. But the great instance is in the differing temper, government, and success, which Margaret of Parma and the Duke of Alva had. The clemency of the first had almost extinguished the flame: but when she was removed, D'Alva succeeded, and managed the matter of religion with fire and sword: he made the flame so great, that his religion and his prince too have both been almost quite turned out of the country. "Pelli è medio sapientiam, quoties vi res agitur," said Ennius: and therefore the best of men, and the most glorious of princes, were always ready to give toleration, but never to make executions for matters disputable. Eusebius, in his second book of the life of Constantine, reports these words of the emperor, "Parem cum fidelibus, ii qui errant, pacis et quietis fruitionem gaudentes accipiant: ipsa siquidem communicationis et societatis restitutio ad rectam etiam veritatis viam perducere potest. Nemo cuiquam molestus sit; quisque quod animo destinat, hoc etiam faciat."

And indeed there is great reason for princes to give toleration to disagreeing persons, whose opinions, by fair means, cannot be altered. For if the persons be confident, they will serve God according to their persuasions; and if they be publicly prohibited, they will privately convene: and then all these inconveniences, and mischiefs, which are arguments against the permission of conventicles, are arguments for the public permissions of differing religions, because the denying of the public worship will certainly produce private conventicles, against which all wise princes and commonwealths have, upon great reasons, made edicts and severe sanctions. "Quicquid enim agitur, absente rege, in caput ejus plerumque redundat," say the politics. For the face of a king is as the face of a lion, and scatters all base machinations, which breathe not but in the dark. It is a proverbial saying, "Quòd nimia familiaritas servorum est conspiratio adversùs Dominum:" and they who, for their security, run into grots, and cellars, and retirements, think that, they being upon the defensive, those princes and those laws that drive them to it, are their enemies, and, therefore, they cannot be secure, unless the power of the one, and the obligation of the other, be lessened and rescinded: and then, the being restrained, and made miserable, endears the disconcerted persons mutually, and makes more hearty and dangerous confederations. King James, of blessed memory, in his letters to the States of the United Provinces, dated 6th March, 1613, thus wrote,—"Magis autem è re fore, si sopiantur auctoritate publicâ ità ut prohibeatis ministros vestros, nè eas disputationes in suggestum aut ad plebem ferant: ac districtè imperetis ut pacem colant, se invicem tolerando in ista opinionum ac sententiarum discrepantia.—Eòque justiùs videmur vobis hoc ipsum suadere debere, quòd neutram comperimus adeò deviam, ut non possint, et cum fidei Christianæ veritate, et cum animarum salute, consistere," &c. The like counsel, in the divisions of Germany, at the first reformation, was thought reasonable by the emperor Ferdinand, and his excellent son Maximilian. For they had observed, that violence did exasperate, was unblessed, unsuccessful, and unreasonable: and, therefore, they made decrees of toleration, and appointed tempers and expedients to be drawn up by discreet persons: and George Cassander was designed to this great work, and did something towards it. And Emanuel Philibert, Duke of Savoy, repenting of his war, undertaken for religion, against the Pedemontans, promised them toleration, and was as good as his word. As much is done by the nobility of Polonia. So that the best princes and the best bishops gave toleration and impunities: but it is known, that the first persecutions of disagreeing persons were, by the Arians, by the Circumcellians and Donatists: and from them they of the church took examples, who, in small numbers, did sometimes persuade it, sometimes practise it. And among the Greeks, it became a public and authorized practice, till the question of images grew hot and high: for then the worshippers of images, having taken their example from the empress Irene, who put her son's eyes out for making an edict against images, began to be as cruel as they were deceived; especially being encouraged by the popes of Rome, who then blew the coals to some purpose.

And that I may, upon this occasion, give account of this affair in the church of Rome, it is remarkable, that, till the time of Justinian the emperor, A. D. 525, the Catholics and Novatians had churches, indifferently permitted, even in Rome itself; but the bishops of Rome, whose interest was much concerned in it, spoke much against it, and laboured the eradication of the Novatians, and at last, when they got power into their hands, they served them accordingly: but it is observed by Socrates, that when the first persecution was made against them at Rome, by Pope Innocent I., at the same instant the Goths invaded Italy, and became lords of all; it being just in God to bring a persecution upon them for true belief, who, with an incompetent authority and insufficient grounds, do persecute an error less material in persons agreeing with them, in the profession of the same common faith. And I have heard it observed, as a blessing upon St. Austin, (who was so merciful to erring persons, as, the greatest part of his life, in all senses, even when he had twice changed his mind, yet to tolerate them, and never to endure they should be given over to the secular power to be killed,) that the very night the Vandals set down before his city of Hippo, to besiege it, he died and went to God, being, as a reward of his merciful doctrine, taken from the miseries to come. And yet that very thing was also a particular issue of the Divine Providence upon that city, who, not long before, had altered their profession into truth by force, and now were falling into their power, who afterward, by a greater force, turned them to be Arians.

But, in the church of Rome, the popes were the first preachers of force and violence, in matters of opinion, and that so zealously, that Pope Vigilius suffered himself to be imprisoned and handled roughly by the emperor Justinian, rather than he would consent to the restitution and peace of certain disagreeing persons. But as yet it came not so far as death. The first that preached that doctrine was Dominic, the founder of the begging orders of friars, the friar-preachers; in memory of which the inquisition is intrusted only to the friars of his order. And if there be any force in dreams, or truth in legends, (as there is not much in either,) this very thing might be signified by his mother's dream, who, the night before Dominic was born, dreamed she was brought to bed of a huge dog, with a fire-brand in his mouth. Sure enough, however his disciples expound the dream, it was a better sign that he should prove a rabid, furious incendiary than any thing else: whatever he might be in the other parts of his life, in his doctrine he was not much better, as appears in his deportment toward the Albigenses, against whom he so preached, "adeo quidem ut centum hæreticorum millia ab octo millibus catholicorum fusa et interfecta fuisse perhibeantur," saith one of him; and of those who were taken, one hundred and eighty were burnt to death, because they would not abjure their doctrine.[m] This was the first example of putting erring persons to death that I find in the Roman church. For about one hundred and seventy years before, Berengarius fell into opinion, concerning the blessed sacrament, which they called heresy, and recanted, and relapsed, and recanted again, and fell again two or three times, saith Gerson, writing against, "Romant of the Rose," and yet he died "siccâ morte," "his own natural death," and with hope of heaven, and yet Hildebrand was once his judge: which shows that, at that time, Rome was not come to so great heights of bloodshed. In England, although the pope had as great power here as any where, yet there were no executions for matter of opinion known till the time of Henry IV., who, because he usurped the crown, was willing by all means to endear the clergy by destroying their enemies, that so he might be sure of them, to all his purposes. And indeed, it may become them well enough, who are wiser in their generations than the children of light,—it may possibly serve the policies of evil persons, but never the pure and chaste designs of christianity, which admits no blood but Christ's, and the imitating blood of martyrs, but knows nothing how to serve her ends by persecuting any of her erring children.

By this time, I hope it will not be thought reasonable to say, he that teaches mercy to erring persons teaches indifferency in religion; unless so many fathers, and so many churches, and the best of emperors, and all the world (till they were abused by tyranny, popery, and faction) did teach indifferency. For I have shown that christianity does not punish corporally persons erring spiritually, but indeed popery does; the Donatists, and Circumcellians and Arians, and the Itaciani, they of old did: in the middle ages the patrons of images did, and the papists at this day do, and have done, ever since they were taught it by their St. Dominic.

Seventhly; and yet after all this, I have something more to exempt myself from the clamour of this objection. For let all errors be as much and as zealously suppressed as may be (the doctrine of the following discourse contradicts not that); but let it be done by such means as are proper instruments of their suppression, by preaching and disputation, (so that neither of them breed disturbance,) by charity and sweetness, by holiness of life, assiduity of exhortation, by the word of God and prayer.

For these ways are most natural, most prudent, most peaceable, and effectual. Only let not men be hasty in calling every disliked opinion by the name of heresy; and when they have resolved that they will call it so, let them use the erring person like a brother, not beat him like a dog, or convince him with a gibbet, or vex him out of his understanding and persuasions.

And now if men will still say, "I persuade to indifferency," there is no help for me, for I have given reasons against it; I must bear it as well as I can; I am not yet without remedy, as they are; for patience will help me, and reason will not cure them: let them take their course, and I will take mine.

Only I will take leave to consider this, and they would do well to do so too, that unless faith be kept within its own latitude, and not called out to patrocinate every less necessary opinion, and the interest of every sect or peevish person; and if damnation be pronounced against Christians believing the creed, and living good lives, because they are deceived, or are said to be deceived, in some opinions less necessary; there is no way in the world to satisfy unlearned persons, in the choice of their religion, or to appease the unquietness of a scrupulous conscience. For suppose an honest citizen, whose employment and parts will not enable him to judge the disputes and arguings of great clerks, sees factions commenced and managed with much bitterness, by persons, who might, on either hand, be fit enough to guide him; when if he follows either, he is disquieted, and pronounced damned by the other, (who also, if he be the most unreasonable in his opinion, will perhaps be more furious in his sentence) what shall this man do? where shall he rest the sole of his foot? Upon the doctrine of the church where he lives? Well, but that he hears declaimed against perpetually, and other churches claim highly and pretend fairly for truth, and condemn his church. If I tell him that he must live a good life, and believe the creed, and not trouble himself with their disputes, or interest himself in sects and factions, I speak reason; because no law of God ties him to believe more than what is of essential necessity, and whatsoever he shall come to know to be revealed by God: now if he believes his creed, he believes all that is necessary to all, or of itself; and if he does his moral endeavour beside, he can do no more toward finding out all the rest, and then he is secured. But then, if this will secure him, why do men press further, and pretend every opinion as necessary, and that in so high a degree, that if they all said true, or any two indeed of them, in five hundred sects which are in the world, (and for aught I know there may be five thousand,) it is five hundred to one but that every man is damned; for every sect damns all but itself, and that is damned of four hundred and ninety-nine, and it is excellent fortune then if that escape. And there is the same reason in every one of them, that is, it is extreme unreasonableness, in all of them, to pronounce damnation against such persons, against whom clearly and dogmatically Holy Scripture hath not. "In odiosis, quod minimum est sequimur: in favoribus, quod est maximum," saith the law; and therefore we should say any thing, or make any excuse, that is in any degree reasonable, rather than condemn all the world to hell: especially if we consider these two things,—that we ourselves are as apt to be deceived as any are; and that they who are deceived when they used their moral industry, that they might not be deceived, if they perish for this, they perish for what they could not help.

But, however, if the best security in the world be not in neglecting all sects and subdivisions of men, and fixing ourselves on points necessary and plain, and on honest and pious endeavours according to our several capacities and opportunities for all the rest,—if, I say, all this be not, through the mercies of God, the best security to all unlearned persons, and learned too, where shall we fix? where shall we either have peace or security? If you bid me follow your doctrine, you must tell me why; and perhaps when you have, I am not able to judge; or if I be as able as other people are, yet, when I have judged, I may be deceived too, and so may you, or any man else you bid me follow; so that I am not a whit the nearer truth or peace.

And then, if we look abroad, and consider how there is scarce any church but is highly charged by many adversaries in many things, possibly we may see a reason to charge every one of them, in some things; and what shall we do then? The church of Rome hath spots enough, and all the world is inquisitive enough to find out more, and to represent these to her greatest disadvantage. The Greek churches deny the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son. If that be false doctrine, she is highly to blame; if it be not, then all the western churches are to blame for saying the contrary. And there is no church that is in prosperity, but alters her doctrine every age, either by bringing in new doctrines, or by contradicting her old; which shows that none are satisfied with themselves, or with their own confessions. And since all churches believe themselves fallible, that only excepted, which all other churches say is most of all deceived,—it were strange if, in so many articles, which make up their several bodies of confessions, they had not mistaken, every one of them, in some thing or other. The Lutheran churches maintain consubstantiation, the Zuinglians are sacramentaries, the Calvinists are fierce in the matters of absolute predetermination, and all these reject episcopacy; which the primitive church would have made no doubt to have called heresy. The Socinians profess a portentous number of strange opinions; they deny the Holy Trinity, and the satisfaction of our blessed Saviour. The anabaptists laugh at pædobaptism: the Ethiopian churches are Nestorian. Where then shall we fix our confidence, or join communion? To pitch upon any one of these is to throw the dice, if salvation be to be had only in one of them, and that every error that by chance hath made a sect, and is distinguished by a name, be damnable.

If this consideration does not deceive me, we have no other help in the midst of these distractions and disunions, but all of us to be united in that common term, which as it does constitute the church in its being such, so it is the medium of the communion of saints; and that is the creed of the apostles; and, in all other things an honest endeavour to find out what truths we can,[1] and a charitable and mutual permission to others that disagree from us and our opinions. I am sure this may satisfy us, for it will secure us ; but I know not any thing else that will : and no man can be reasonably persuaded or satisfied in any thing else, unless he throws himself upon chance, or absolute predestination, or his own confidence ; in every one of which it is two to one, at least, but he may miscarry.

Thus far I thought I had reason on my side, and I suppose I have made it good, upon its proper grounds, in the pages following. But then, if the result be, that men must be permitted in their opinions, and that christians must not persecute christians, I have also as much reason to reprove all those oblique arts which are not direct persecutions of men's persons, but they are indirect proceedings, ungentle and unchristian, servants of faction and interest, provocations to zeal and animosities, and destructive of learning and ingenuity. And these are, suppressing all the monuments of their adversaries, forcing them to recant, and burning their books.

For it is a strange industry and an importune diligence that was used by our forefathers ; of all those heresies which gave them battle and employment, we have absolutely no record or monument, but what themselves, who are adversaries, have transmitted to us; and we know that adversaries, especially such who observed all opportunities to discredit both the persons and doctrines of the enemy, are not always the best records or witnesses of such transactions. We see it now in this very age, in the present distemperatures, that parties are no good registers of the actions of the adverse side : and if we cannot be confident of the truth of a story now, now I say that it is possible for any man, and likely that the interested adversary will discover the imposture, it is far more unlikely that after-ages should know any other truth, but such as serves the ends of the representers. I am sure such things were never taught us by Christ and his apostles : and if we were sure that ourselves spoke truth, or that truth were able to justify herself, it were better if, to preserve a doctrine, we did not destroy a commandment, and out of zeal, pretending to christian religion, lose the glories and rewards of ingenuity and christian simplicity.

Of the same consideration is mending of authors, not to their own mind, but to ours, that is, to mend them so as to spoil them ; forbidding the publication of books in which there is nothing impious or against the public interest, leaving out clauses in translations, disgracing men's persons, charging disavowed doctrines upon men, and the persons of the men with the consequents of their doctrine, which they deny either to be true or to be consequent; false reporting of disputations and conferences, burning books by the hand of the hangman, and all such arts, which show that we either distrust God for the maintenance of his truth, or that we distrust the cause, or distrust ourselves and our abilities. I will say no more of these, but only concerning the last I shall transcribe a passage out of Tacitus, in the life of Julius Agricola, who gives this account of it : Veniam non petissem, nisi incursaturus tam sæva et infesta virtutibus tempora. Legimus, cùm Aruleno Rustico Pætus Thrasea, Herennio Senecioni Priscus Helvidius laudati essent, capitale fuisse : neque in ipsos modo auctores, sed in libros quoque eorum sævitum, delegato Triumviris ministerio, ut monumenta clarissimorum ingeniorum in comitio ac foro urerentur. Scilicet, illo igne vocem populi Romani, et libertatem senatûs, et conscientiam generis humani aboleri arbitrabantur, expulsis insuper sapientiæ professoribus, atque omni bona arte in exsilium acta, ne quid usquam honestum occurreret."—It is but an illiterate policy to think that such indirect and uningenuous proceedings can, among wise and free men, disgrace the authors, and disrepute their discourses. And I have seen that the price hath been trebled upon a forbidden, or a condemned book ; and some men in policy have got a prohibition, that their impression might be the more certainly vendible, and the author himself thought considerable.

The best way is to leave tricks and devices, and to fall upon that way which the best ages of the church did use. With the strength of argument, and allegations of Scripture, and modesty of deportment, and meekness and charity to the persons of men, they converted misbelievers, stopped the mouths of adversaries, asserted truth, and discountenanced error ; and those other stratagems and arts of support and maintenance to doctrines, were the issues of heretical brains. The old catholics had nothing to secure themselves but the ἓν μέγα of truth and plain dealing.

And, to my understanding, it is a plain art and design of the devil, to make us so in love with our own opinions, as to call them faith and religion, that we may be proud in our understanding : and besides that, by our zeal in our opinions, we grow cool in our piety and practical duties ; he also by this earnest contention, does directly destroy good life, by engagement of zealots to do any thing rather than be overcome, and lose their beloved propositions. But I would fain know, why is not any vicious habit as bad, or worse than a false opinion? Why are we so zealous against those we call heretics, and yet great friends with drunkards, fornicators, and swearers, and intemperate and idle persons? Is it because we are commanded by the apostle to "reject a heretic after two admonitions, and not bid such a one God speed?" It is good reason why we should be zealous against such persons, provided we mistake them not. For those of whom these apostles speak, are such as deny Christ to be come in the flesh, such as deny an article of creed; and in such odious things, it is not safe, nor charitable, to extend the gravamen and punishment beyond the instances the apostles make, or their exact parallels. But then also it would be remembered that the apostles speak as fiercely against communion with fornicators, and all disorders practical, as against communion with heretics: "If any man that is called a brother, be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such a one no not to eat." I am certain that a drunkard is as contrary to God, and lives as contrary to the laws of christianity, as a heretic; and I am also sure that I know what drunkenness is: but I am not sure that such an opinion is heresy; neither would other men be so sure as they think for, if they did consider it aright, and observe the infinite deceptions, and causes of deceptions, in wise men, and in most things, and in all doubtful questions, and that they did not mistake confidence for certainty.

But, indeed, I could not but smile at those jolly friars; two Franciscans offered themselves to the fire, to prove Savonarola to be a heretic; but a certain Jacobine[o] offered himself to the fire to prove that Savonarola had true revelations, and was no heretic: in the mean time Savonarola preached, but made no such confident offer, nor durst he venture at that new kind of fire-ordeal. And, put case all four had passed through the fire, and died in the flames, what would that have proved? Had he been a heretic or no heretic, the more or less, for the confidence of these zealous idiots? If we mark it, a great many arguments whereon many sects rely, are no better probation than this comes to. Confidence is the first, and the second, and the third part, of a very great many of their propositions.

But now if men would a little turn the tables, and be as zealous for a good life, and all the strictest precepts of christianity, (which is a religion the most holy, the most reasonable, and the most consummate that ever was taught to man,) as they are for such propositions in which neither the life nor the ornament of christianity is concerned, we should find that, as a consequent of this piety, men would be as careful as they could to find out all truths, and the sense of all revelations which may concern their duty; and where men were miserable and could not, yet others that lived good lives too, would also be so charitable, as not to add affliction to this misery: and both of them are parts of good life. To be compassionate, and to help to bear one another's burdens, not to destroy the weak, but to entertain him meekly, that is a precept of charity: and to endeavour to find out the whole will of God, that also is a part of the obedience, the choice and the excellency of faith: and he lives not a good life that does not do both these.

But men think they have more reason to be zealous against heresy, than against a vice in manners; because heresy is infectious and dangerous, and the principle of much evil. Indeed, if by a heresy we mean that which is against an article of creed, and breaks part of the covenant made between God and man, by the mediation of Jesus Christ, I grant it to be a very grievous crime, a calling God's veracity into question, and a destruction also of good life: because, upon the articles of creed, obedience is built, and it lives, or dies, as the effect does, by its proper cause,—for faith is the moral cause of obedience. But then heresy, that is such as this, is also a vice, and the person criminal, and so the sin is to be esteemed in its degrees of malignity; and let men be as zealous against it as they can, and employ the whole arsenal of the spiritual armour against it: such as this is worse than adultery or murder, inasmuch as the soul is more noble than the body, and a false doctrine is of greater dissemination and extent than a single act of violence or impurity. Adultery or murder is a duel: but heresy (truly and indeed such) is an unlawful war,—it slays thousands. The losing of faith is like digging down a foundation; all the superstructures of hope, and patience, and charity, fall with it. And besides this, heresy of all crimes is the most inexcusable, and of least temptation: for true faith is most commonly kept with the least trouble of any grace in the world: and heresy of itself hath not only no pleasure in it, but is a very punishment; because faith, as it opposes heretical or false opinions, and distinguishes from charity, consists in mere acts of believing: which, because they are of true propositions, are natural and proportionable to the understanding, and more honourable than false. But then, concerning those things which men now-a-days call heresy, they cannot be so formidable as they are represented; and if we consider that drunkenness is certainly a damnable sin, and that there are more drunkards than heretics, and that drunkenness is parent of a thousand vices, it may better be said of this vice than of most of those opinions which we call heresies, "it is infectious and dangerous, and the principle of much evil:" and, therefore, as fit an object for a pious zeal to contest against, as is any of those opinions which trouble men's ease or reputation, for that is the greatest of their malignity.

But if we consider that sects are made, and opinions are called heresies upon interest, and the grounds of emolument, we shall see that a good life would cure much of this mischief. For first, the church of Rome, which is the great dictatrix of dogmatical resolutions, and the declarer of heresy, and calls heretic more than all the world besides, hath made that the rule of heresy, which is the conservatory of interest, and the ends of men. For, to recede from the doctrine of the church, with them, makes heresy; that is, to dispute their authority, and not to obey them, not to be their subjects, not to give them the empire of our conscience, is the great κριτήριον of heresy.

[o] Commin. l. viii. c. 19.

So that, with them, heresy is to be esteemed clearly by human ends, not by Divine rules; that is formal heresy, which does materially disserve them. And it would make a suspicious man a little inquisitive into their particular doctrines: and when he finds that indulgences, and jubilees, and purgatories, and masses, and offices for the dead, are very profitable,—that the doctrine of primacy, of infallibility, of superiority over councils, of indirect power in temporals, are great instruments of secular honour; he would be apt enough to think that if the church of Rome would learn to lay her honour at the feet of the crucifix, and despise the world, and prefer Jerusalem before Rome, and heaven above the Lateran, that these opinions would not have in them any native strength to support them against the perpetual assaults of their adversaries, that speak so much reason and Scripture against them, I have instanced in the Roman religion, but I wish it may be considered also, how far men's doctrines, in other sects, serve men's temporal ends; so far that it would not be unreasonable or unnecessary to attempt to cure some of their distemperatures or mispersuasions, by the salutary precepts of sanctity and holy life. Sure enough, if it did not more concern their reputation, and their lasting interest, to be counted true believers rather than good livers, they would rather endeavour to live well, than to be accounted of a right opinion in things beside the creed.

For my own particular, I cannot but expect that God, in his justice, should enlarge the bounds of the Turkish empire, or some other way punish christians, by reason of their pertinacious disputing about things unnecessary, undeterminable, and unprofitable, and for their hating and persecuting their brethren, which should be as dear to them as their own lives, for not consenting to one another's follies and senseless vanities. How many volumes have been written about angels, about immaculate conception, about original sin, when that all that is solid reason or clear revelation, in all these three articles, may be reasonably enough comprised in forty lines? And in these trifles and impertinencies men are curiously busy, while they neglect those glorious precepts of christianity and holy life, which are the glories of our religion, and would enable us to a happy eternity.

My Lord, thus far my thoughts have carried me, and then I thought I had reason to go further, and to examine the proper grounds upon which these persuasions might rely and stand firm, in case any body should contest against them. For, possibly, men may be angry at me, and my design: for I do all them great displeasure, who think no end is then well served, when their interest is disserved; and but that I have written so untowardly and heavily, that I am not worth a confutation, possibly some or other might be writing against me. But then I must tell them, I am prepared of an answer beforehand: for I think I have spoken reason in my book, and examined it with all the severity I have; and if after all this I be deceived, this confirms me in my first opinion, and becomes a new argument to me that I have spoken reason; for it furnishes me with a new instance that it is necessary there should be a mutual compliance and toleration, because even then when a man thinks he hath most reason to be confident, he may easily be deceived.

For I am sure I have no other design but the prosecution and advantage of truth, and I may truly use the words of Gregory Nazianzen, "Non studemus paci in detrimentum veræ doctrinæ,—ut facilitatis et mansuetudinis famam colligamus:" but I have written this, because I thought it was necessary, and seasonable, and charitable, and agreeable to the great precepts and design of christianity, consonant to the practice of the apostles, and of the best ages of the church, most agreeable to Scripture and reason, to revelation and the nature of the thing; and it is such a doctrine, that, if there be variety in human affairs, if the event of things be not settled in a durable consistence, but is changeable, every one of us all may have need of it. I shall only, therefore, desire that they who will read it, may come to the reading it with us much simplicity of purposes and unmixed desires of truth, as I did to the writing it; and that no man trouble himself with me or my discourse, that thinks beforehand that his opinion cannot be reasonably altered. If he thinks me to be mistaken before he tries, let him also think that he may be mistaken too,—and that he who judges before he hears, is mistaken, though he gives a right sentence.

was good counsel. But at a venture, I shall leave this sentence of Solomon to his consideration, "A wise man feareth, and departeth from evil; but a fool rageth, and is confident."—Πάντα εἰδέναι οἴεσθαι καὶ διϊσχυρίζεσθαι "is a trick of boys, and bold young fellows," says Aristotle; but they who either know themselves, or things, or persons, προστιθέασιν ἀεὶ τὸ ἴσως, καὶ τὸ τάχα. Peradventure yea, peradventure no, is very often the wisest determination of a question. For there are μωραὶ καὶ ἀπαίδευτοι ζητήσεις, as the apostle notes, "foolish and unlearned questions."[r] And it were better to stop the current of such fopperies by silence, than, by disputing them, convey them to posterity. And many things there are of more profit, which yet are of no more certainty; and, therefore, boldness of assertion (except it be in matters of faith and clearest revelation) is an argument of the vanity of the man, never of the truth of the proposition: for, to such matters, the saying of Xenophanes, in Varro, is pertinent and applicable, "Hominis est hæc opinari, Dei scire;" "God only knows them, and we conjecture."

[r] 2 Tim. ii.

And although I be as desirous to know what I should, and what I should not, as any of my brethren, the sons of Adam; yet I find that the more I search, the further I am from being satisfied, and make but few discoveries, save of my own ignorance; and, therefore, I am desirous to follow the example of a very wise personage, Julius Agricola, of whom Tacitus gave this testimony, "Retinuitque (quod est difficillimum) ex scientiâ modum:" or, that I may take my precedent from within the pale of the church, it was the saying of St. Austin, "Mallem quidem eorum, quæ à me quæsivisti, habere scientiam quam ignorantiam; sed quia id nondum potui, magis eligo cautam ignorantiam confiteri, quam falsam scientiam profiteri." And these words do very much express my sense. But if there be any man so confident as Luther sometime was, who said that he could expound all Scripture; or so vain as Eckius, who, in his Chrysopassus, ventured upon the highest and most mysterious question of predestination, "ut in ea juveniles possit calores exercere;" such persons as these, or any that is furious in his opinion, will scorn me and my discourse; but I shall not be much moved at it, only I shall wish that I had as much knowledge as they think me to want, and they as much as they believe themselves to have. In the mean time, modesty were better for us both, and indeed for all men. For when men indeed are knowing, amongst other things they are able to separate certainties from uncertainties: if they be not knowing, it is pity that their ignorance should be triumphant, or discompose the public peace, or private confidence.

And now, my Lord, that I have inscribed this book to your Lordship, although it be a design of doing honour to myself, that I have marked it with so honoured and beloved a name, might possibly need as much excuse as it does pardon, but that your Lordship knows your own; for out of your mines I have digged the mineral; only I have stamped it with my own image, as you may perceive by the deformities which are in it. But your great name in letters will add so much value to it, as to make it obtain its pardon amongst all them that know how to value you, and all your relatives and dependants, by the proportion of relation. For others I shall be incurious, because the number of them that honour you, is the same with them that honour learning and piety, and they are the best theatre, and the best judges; amongst which the world must needs take notice of my ambition, to be ascribed by my public pretence to be what I am in all heartiness of devotion, and for all the reason of the world,

My honoured Lord,

Your Lordship's most faithful,

And most affectionate servant,

JER. TAYLOR.

ΘΕΟΛΟΓΙΑ ΕΚΛΕΚΤΙΚΗ,

OR,

A DISCOURSE OF THE LIBERTY OF PROPHESYING,

WITH ITS JUST LIMITS AND TEMPER.

The infinite variety of opinions, in matters of religion, as they have troubled christendom with interests, factions, and partialities, so have they caused great divisions of the heart, and variety of thoughts and designs amongst pious and prudent men. For they all, seeing the inconveniences which the disunion of persuasions and opinions have produced, directly or accidentally, have thought themselves obliged to stop this inundation of mischiefs, and have made attempts accordingly. But it hath happened to most of them, as to a mistaken physician, who gives excellent physic, but misapplies it, and so misses of his cure: so have these men; their attempts have, therefore, been ineffectual: for they put their help to a wrong part, or they have endeavoured to cure the symptoms, and have let the disease alone till it seemed incurable. Some have endeavoured to reunite these fractions, by propounding such a guide which they were all bound to follow; hoping that the unity of a guide would have persuaded unity of minds; but who this guide should be, at last, became such a question, that it was made part of the fire that was to be quenched, so far was it from extinguishing any part of the flame. Others thought of a rule, and this must be the means of union, or nothing could do it. But supposing all the world had been agreed of this rule, yet the interpretation of it was so full of variety, that this also became part of the disease for which the cure was pretended. All men resolved upon this, that, though they yet had not hit upon the right, yet some way must be thought upon to reconcile differences in opinion, thinking so long as this variety should last, Christ's kingdom was not advanced, and the work of the gospel went on but slowly. Few men, in the mean time, considered, that so long as men had such variety of principles, such several constitutions, educations, tempers, and distempers, hopes, interests, and weaknesses, degrees of light and degrees of understanding, it was impossible all should be of one mind. And what is impossible to be done, is not necessary it should be done. And, therefore, although variety of opinions was impossible to be cured (and they who attempted it did like him who claps his shoulder to the ground to stop an earthquake); yet the inconveniences arising from it, might possibly be cured, not by uniting their beliefs, —that was to be despaired of, but by curing that which caused these mischiefs, and accidental inconveniences of their disagreeings. For although these inconveniences which every man sees and feels, were consequent to this diversity of persuasions, yet it was but accidentally and by chance; inasmuch as we see that in many things, and they of great concernment, men allow to themselves and to each other a liberty of disagreeing, and no hurt neither. And, certainly, if diversity of opinions were, of itself, the cause of mischiefs, it would be so ever, that is, regularly and universally: but that we see it is not. For there are disputes in christendom concerning matters of greater concernment than most of those opinions, that distinguish sects and make factions; and yet, because men are permitted to differ in those great matters, such evils are not consequent to such differences, as are to the uncharitable managing of smaller and more inconsiderable questions. It is of greater consequence to believe right, in the question of the validity or invalidity of a death-bed repentance, than to believe aright in the question of purgatory; and the consequences of the doctrine of pre-determination are of deeper and more material consideration, than the products of the belief of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of private masses: and yet these great concernments, where a liberty of prophesying in these questions hath been permitted, have made no distinct communion, no sects of christians, and the others have; and so have these too, in those places where they have peremptorily been determined on either side. Since, then, if men are quiet and charitable in some disagreeings, that then and there the inconvenience ceases: if they were so in all others, where lawfully they might, (and they may in most,) christendom should be no longer rent in pieces, but would be redintegrated in a new pentecost. And although the Spirit of God did rest upon us in divided tongues, yet, so long as those tongues were of fire, not to kindle strife, but to warm our affections and inflame our charities, we should find that this variety of opinions, in several persons, would be looked upon as an argument only of diversity of operations, while the Spirit is the same: and that another man believes not so well as I, is only an argument that I have a better and a clearer illumination than he, that I have a better gift than he, received a special grace and favour, and excel him in this, and am, perhaps, excelled by him in many more. And if we all impartially endeavour to find a truth, since this endeavour and search only is in our power, that we shall find it being "ab extra," a gift and an assistance extrinsical, I can see no reason why this pious endeavour to find out truth shall not be of more force to unite us in the bonds of charity, than the misery in missing it shall be to disunite us. So that since a union of persuasion is impossible to be attained, if we would attempt the cure by such remedies as are apt to enkindle and increase charity, I am confident we might see a blessed peace would be the reward and crown of such endeavours.

But men are, now-a-days, and, indeed, always have been, since the expiration of the first blessed ages of christianity, so in love with their own fancies and opinions, as to think faith and all christendom is concerned in their support and maintenance; and whoever is not so fond, and does not dandle them like themselves, it grows up to a quarrel which, because it is in "materiâ theologiæ," is made a quarrel in religion, and God is entitled to it; and then if you are once thought an enemy to God, it is our duty to "persecute you even to death"—we do God good service in it: when, if we should examine the matter rightly, the question is either in "materiâ non revelatâ," or "minus evidenti," or "non necessariâ," either it is not revealed, or not so clearly, but that wise and honest men may be of different minds; or else it is not of the foundation of faith, but a remote superstructure; or else of mere speculation; or perhaps, when all comes to all, it is a false opinion, or a matter of human interest, that we have so zealously contended for; for to one of these heads most of the disputes of christendom may be reduced; so that I believe the present fractions, or the most, are from the same cause which St. Paul observed in the Corinthian schism: "When there are divisions among you, are ye not carnal?" It is not the differing opinions that is the cause of the present ruptures, but want of charity; it is not the variety of understandings, but the disunion of wills and affections; it is not the several principles, but the several ends, that cause our miseries; our opinions commence, and are upheld, according as our turns are served, and our interests are preserved, and there is no cure for us but piety and charity. A holy life will make our belief holy, if we consult not humanity, and its imperfections, in the choice of our religion, but search for truth without designs, save only of acquiring heaven, and then be as careful to preserve charity, as we were to get a point of faith; I am as much persuaded we shall find out more truths by this means; or however, which is the main of all, we shall be secured though we miss them; and then we are well enough.

For if it be evinced, that one heaven shall hold men of several opinions, if the unity of faith be not destroyed by that which men call differing religions, and if a unity of charity be the duty of us all, even towards persons that are not persuaded of every proposition we believe, then I would fain know to what purpose are all those stirs and great noises in christendom; those names of faction, the several names of churches not distinguished by the division of kingdoms, "ut ecclesia sequatur imperium," which was the primitive rule and canon,[z] but distinguished by names of sects and men; these are all become instruments of hatred; thence come schisms and parting of communions, and then persecutions, and then wars and rebellion, and then the dissolutions of all friendships and societies. All these mischiefs proceed not from this, that all men are not of one mind, for that is neither necessary nor possible,—but that every opinion is made an article of faith, every article is a ground of a quarrel, every quarrel makes a faction, every faction is zealous, and all zeal pretends for God, and whatsoever is for God cannot be too much; we, by this time, are come to that pass, we think we love not God except we hate our brother, and we have not the virtue of religion, unless we persecute all religions but our own; for lukewarmness is so odious to God and man, that we, proceeding furiously upon these mistakes, by supposing we preserve the body, we destroy the soul of religion, or, by being zealous for faith, or, which is all one, that which we mistake for faith, we are cold in charity, and so lose the reward of both.

All these errors and mischiefs must be discovered and cured, and that is the purpose of this discourse.

SECTION I.

Of the Nature of Faith, and that its Duty is completed in believing the Articles of the Apostles' Creed.

1. FIRST, then, it is of great concernment to know the nature and integrity of faith, for there begins our first and great mistake; for faith, although it be of great excellency, yet, when it is taken for a habit intellectual, it hath so little room, and so narrow a capacity, that it cannot lodge thousands of those opinions which pretend to be of her family.

2. For although it be necessary for us to believe whatsoever we know to be revealed of God, and so every man does, that believes there is a God; yet it is not necessary, concerning many things, to know that God hath revealed them; that is, we may not be ignorant of or doubt concerning the propositions, and indifferently maintain either part, when the question is not concerning God's veracity, but whether God hath said so or no: that which is of the foundation of faith, that only is necessary; and the knowing or not knowing of that, the believing or disbelieving it, is that only which, in "genere credendorum," is in immediate and necessary order to salvation or damnation.

3. Now, all the reason and demonstration of the world convinces us, that this foundation of faith, or the great adequate object of the faith that saves us, is that great mysteriousness of christianity which Christ taught with so much diligence,—for the credibility of which he wrought so many miracles,—for the testimony of which the apostles endured persecutions,—that which was a folly to the gentiles, and a scandal to the Jews; this is that which is the object of a christian's faith: all other things are implicitly in the belief of the articles of God's veracity, and are not necessary, in respect of the constitution of faith, to be drawn out, but may there lie in the bowels of the great articles, without danger to any thing or any person, unless some other accident or circumstance makes them necessary. Now, the great object which I speak of, is "Jesus Christ crucified;" "Constitui enim apud vos nihil scire præter Jesum Christum et hunc crucifixum;" so said St. Paul to the church of Corinth. This is the article, upon the confession of which Christ built his church, viz. only upon St. Peter's creed, which was no more but this simple enunciation, "We believe, and are sure, that thou art Christ, the Son of the living God:"[a] and to this, salvation particularly is promised, as in the case of Martha's creed.[b] To this the Scripture gives the greatest testimony, and to all them that confess it; "For every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God: and whoever confesseth that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God."[c] The believing this article is the end of writing the four Gospels: "For all these things are written, that ye might believe, that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God;" and then that this is sufficient follows, and that "believing, viz. this article, for this was only instanced in, "ye might have life through his name."[d] This is that great article which, in "genere credendorum," is sufficient disposition to prepare a catechumen to baptism, as appears in the case of the Ethiopian eunuch, whose creed was only this, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God;" and upon this confession, saith the story, they both went into the water, and the Ethiop was washed, and became as white as snow.

4. In these particular instances there is no variety of articles, save only that in the annexes of the several expressions, such things are expressed, as besides that Christ is come, they tell from whence, and to what purpose; and whatsoever is expressed, or is, to these purposes, implied, is made articulate and explicate in the short and admirable mysterious creed of St. Paul: "This is the word of faith which we preach, that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe, in thine heart, that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."[e] This is the great and entire complexion of a christian's faith, and since salvation is promised to the belief of this creed, either a snare is laid for us, with a purpose to deceive us, or else nothing is of prime and original necessity to be believed, but this, "Jesus Christ, our Redeemer;" and all that which is the necessary parts, means, or main actions, of working this redemption for us, and the honour for him, is in the bowels and fold of the great article, and claims an explicit belief, by the same reason that binds us to the belief of its first complexion, without which neither the thing could be acted, nor the proposition understood.

5. For the act of believing propositions is not for itself, but in order to certain ends; as sermons are to good life and obedience; for (excepting that it acknowledges God's veracity, and so is a direct act of religion) believing a revealed proposition hath no excellency in itself, but in order to that end for which we are instructed in such revelations. Now God's great purpose being to bring us to him by Jesus Christ, Christ is our medium to God,—obedience is the medium to Christ,—and faith the medium to obedience, and, therefore, is to have its estimate in proportion to its proper end; and those things are necessary which necessarily promote the end, without which obedience cannot be encouraged, or prudently enjoined: so that those articles are necessary, that is, those are fundamental points, upon which we build our obedience; and as the influence of the article is to the persuasion or engagement of obedience, so they have their degrees of necessity. Now all that Christ, when he preached, taught us to believe, and all that the apostles, in their sermons, propound, all aim at this,—that we should acknowledge Christ for our Lawgiver and our Saviour; so that nothing can be necessary, by a prime necessity, to be believed explicitly, but such things which are, therefore, parts of the great article, because they either encourage our services, or oblige them,—such as declare Christ's greatness in himself, or his goodness to us: so that, although we must neither deny, nor doubt of any thing, which we know our great Master hath taught us, yet salvation is, in special and by name, annexed to the belief of those articles only, which have in them the endearments of our services, or the support of our confidence, or the satisfaction of our hopes; such as are, Jesus Christ the Son of the living God, the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus, forgiveness of sins by his blood, resurrection of the dead, and life eternal; because these propositions qualify Christ for our Saviour and our Lawgiver, the one to engage our services, the other to endear them; for so much is necessary as will make us to be his servants and his disciples; and what can be required more? This only:—Salvation is promised to the explicit belief of those articles, and, therefore, those only are necessary, and those are sufficient; but thus, to us, in the formality of christians, which is a formality superadded to a former capacity, we, before we are christians, are reasonable creatures, and capable of a blessed eternity; and there is a creed, which is the gentiles' creed, which is so supposed in the christian's creed, as it is supposed in a christian to be a man, and that is, "oportet accedentem ad Deum credere Deum esse, et esse remuneratorem quærentium eum."

6. If any man will urge further, that whatsoever is deducible from these articles by necessary consequence, is necessary to be believed explicitly,—I answer: It is true, if he sees the deduction and coherence of the parts; but it is not certain that every man shall be able to deduce whatsoever is either immediately or certainly deducible from these premises; and then, since salvation is promised to the explicit belief of these, I see not how any man can justify the making the way to heaven narrower than Jesus Christ hath made it, it being already so narrow, that there are few that find it.

7. In the pursuance of this great truth, the apostles, or the holy men their contemporaries and disciples, composed a creed, to be a rule of faith to all christians, as appears in Irenæus, Tertullian,[f] St. Cyprian,[g] St. Austin,[h] Ruffinus,[i] and divers others;[k] which creed, unless it had contained all the entire object of faith, and the foundation of religion, it cannot be imagined to what purpose it should serve; and that it was so esteemed by the whole church of God, in all ages, appears in this,—that since faith is a necessary predisposition to baptism in all persons capable of the use of reason, all catechumens in the Latin church, coming to baptism, were interrogated concerning their faith, and gave satisfaction in the recitation of this creed. And in the east they professed exactly the same faith, something differing in words, but of the same matter, reason, design, and consequence; and so they did at Jerusalem, so at Aquileia. This was that ὀρθὴ καὶ ἀμώμητος πίστις, ἥνπερ κηρύττει ἡ ἁγία τοῦ Θεοῦ καθολικὴ καὶ ἀποστολικὴ ἐκκλησία, κατ' οὐδένα τρόπον καινισμὸν δεξαμένη. These articles were τὰ τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων, καὶ τῶν μετ' ἐκείνων διατριψάντων ἐν ταῖς ἁγίαις Θεοῦ ἐκκλησίαις, διδάγματα.[l] Now since the apostles, and apostolical men, and churches, in these their symbols, did recite particular articles to a considerable number, and were so minute in their recitation, as to descend to circumstances, it is more than probable that they omitted nothing of necessity; and that these articles are not general principles, in the bosom of which many more articles, equally necessary to be believed explicitly, and more particular, are enfolded; but that it is as minute an explication of those "prima credibilia" I before reckoned, as is necessary to salvation.

8. And, therefore, Tertullian calls the creed "Regulam fidei, quâ salvâ, et formâ ejus manente in suo ordine, possit in Scripturâ tractari et inquiri si quid videtur, vel ambiguitate pendere, vel obscuritate obumbrari."—"Cordis signaculum, et nostræ militiæ sacramentum," St. Ambrose calls it;[m] "Comprehensio fidei nostræ atque perfectio,"—by St.

Austin;[n] "Confessio, expositio, regula fidei," generally by the ancients. The profession of this creed was the exposition of that saying of St. Peter, Συνειδήσεως ἀγαθῆς ἐπερώτημα εἰς Θεὸν, "The answer of a good conscience towards God." For of the recitation and profession of this creed in baptism, it is that Tertullian says,[o] "Anima non lotione sed responsione sancitur."—And of this was the prayer of Hilary,[p] "Conserva hanc conscientiæ meæ vocem, ut quod in regenerationis meæ symbolo, baptizatus in Patre, Filio, Spiritu Sancto, professus sum, semper obtineam." And according to the rule and reason of this discourse (that it may appear that the creed hath in it all articles "primò et per se," primely and universally necessary) the creed is just such an explication of that faith which the apostles preached, viz. the creed which St. Paul recites, as contains in it all those things which entitle Christ to us, in the capacities of our Lawgiver and our Saviour, such as enable him to the great work of redemption, according to the predictions concerning him, and such as engage and encourage our services. For, taking out the article of Christ's descent into hell, (which was not in the old creed, as appears in some of the copies I before referred to, in Tertullian, Ruffinus, and Irenæus; and, indeed, was omitted in all the confessions of the eastern churches, in the church of Rome, and in the Nicene creed, which, by adoption, came to be the creed of the Catholic church,) all other articles are such as directly constitute the parts and work of our redemption, such as clearly derive the honour to Christ, and enable him with the capacities of our Saviour and Lord. The rest engage our services by proposition of such articles, which are rather promises than propositions; and the whole creed, take it in any of the old forms, is but an analysis of that which St. Paul calls "the word of salvation, whereby we shall be saved," viz. that "we confess Jesus to be Lord, and that God raised him from the dead:" by the first whereof he became our Lawgiver and our Guardian; by the second he was our Saviour: the other things are but parts and main actions of those two. Now what reason there is in the world that can inwrap any thing else within the foundation, that is, in the whole body of articles, simply and inseparably necessary, or in the prime original necessity of faith, I cannot possibly imagine. These do the work; and therefore, nothing can, upon the true grounds of reason, enlarge the necessity to the enclosure of other articles.

9. Now if more were necessary than the articles of the creed, I demand why was it made the characteristic[q] note of a christian from a heretic, or a Jew, or an infidel? or to what purpose was it composed? or if this was intended as sufficient, did the apostles, or those churches which they founded, know any thing else to be necessary? If they did not, then either nothing more is necessary, (I speak of matters of mere belief,) or they did not know all the will of the Lord, and so were unfit dispensers of the mysteries of the kingdom; or if they did know more was necessary, and yet would not insert it, they did an act of public notice, and consigned it to all ages of the church, to no purpose, unless to beguile credulous people, by making them believe their faith was sufficient, having tried it by that touchstone apostolical, when there was no such matter.

10. But, if this was sufficient to bring men to heaven then, why not now? If the apostles admitted all to their communion that believed this creed, why shall we exclude any that preserve the same entire? Why is not our faith of these articles of as much efficacy for bringing us to heaven, as it was in the churches apostolical, who had guides more infallible, that might, without error, have taught them superstructures enough, if they had been necessary? And so they did; but that they did not insert them into the creed, when they might have done it with as much certainty as these articles, makes it clear to my understanding, that other things were not necessary, but these were; that whatever profit and advantages might come from other articles, yet these were sufficient, and however certain persons might accidentally be obliged to believe much more, yet this was the one and only foundation of faith, upon which all persons were to build their hopes of heaven; this was, therefore, necessary to be taught to all, because of necessity to be believed by all: so that, although other persons might commit a delinquency "in genere morum," if they did not know, or did not believe much more, because they were obliged to further disquisitions in order to other ends, yet none of these who held the creed entire, could perish for want of necessary faith, though possibly he might for supine negligence or affected ignorance, or some other fault which had influence upon his opinions, and his understanding, he having a new supervening obligation, "ex accidente," to know and believe more.

11. Neither are we obliged to make these articles more particular and minute than the creed. For since the apostles, and, indeed, our blessed Lord himself, promised heaven to them who believed him to be the Christ that was to come into the world, and that he who believes in him should be partaker of the resurrection and life eternal, he will be as good as his word. Yet, because this article was very general, and a complexion rather than a single proposition, the apostles and others, our fathers in Christ, did make it more explicit; and though they have said no more than what lay entire, and ready formed in the bosom of the great article, yet they made their extracts to great purpose, and absolute sufficiency; and, therefore, there needs no more deductions, or remoter consequences, from the first great article, than the creed of the apostles. For although whatsoever is certainly deduced from any of these articles, made already so explicit, is as certainly true, and as much to be believed, as the article itself, because "ex veris possunt nil nisi vera sequi:"

[q] Vide Isidor. de Eccl. Offic. lib. i. cap. 20. Suidan. Turnebum. lib. ii. c. 30. advers. Venant. For. in Exag. Symb. Fevardent. in Iren. lib. i. c. 2.

yet because it is not certain that our deductions from them are certain, and what one calls evident is so obscure to another, that he believes it is false, it is the best and only safe course to rest in that explication the apostles have made; because, if any of these apostolical deductions were not demonstrable, evidently to follow from that great article to which salvation is promised,—yet the authority of them who compiled the symbol, the plain description of the articles from the words of Scriptures, the evidence of reason, demonstrating these to be the whole foundation, are sufficient upon great grounds of reason to ascertain us: but if we go further, besides the easiness of being deceived, we relying upon our own discourses,—which though they may be true, and then bind us to follow them, but yet no more than when they only seem truest,—yet they cannot make the thing certain to another, much less necessary in itself. And since God would not bind us, upon pain of sin and punishment, to make deductions ourselves, much less would he bind us to follow another man's logic as an article of our faith; I say, much less another man's, for our own integrity (for we will certainly be true to ourselves, and do our own business heartily) is as fit and proper to be employed as another man's ability: he cannot secure me that his ability is absolute and the greatest, but I can be more certain that my own purposes and fidelity to myself are such. And since it is necessary to rest some where, lest we should run to an infinity, it is best to rest there, where the apostles and the churches apostolical rested: when, not only they who are able to judge, but others who are not, are equally ascertained of the certainty and of the sufficiency of that explication.

12. This, I say, not that I believe it unlawful or unsafe for the church, or any of the "antistites religionis," or any wise man, to extend his own creed to any thing which may certainly follow from any one of the articles; but I say that no such deduction is fit to be pressed on others as an article of faith; and that every deduction which is so made, unless it be such a thing as is at first evident to all, is but sufficient to make a human faith; nor can it amount to a divine, much less can be obligatory to bind a person of a differing persuasion to subscribe, under pain of losing his faith, or being a heretic. For it is a demonstration, that nothing can be necessary to be believed, under pain of damnation, but such propositions of which it is certain that God hath spoken and taught them to us, and of which it is certain that this is their sense and purpose; for if the sense be uncertain, we can no more be obliged to believe it in a certain sense, than we are to believe it at all, if it were not certain that God delivered it. But if it be only certain that God spake it, and not certain to what sense, our faith of it is to be as indeterminate as its sense; and it can be no other in the nature of the thing, nor is it consonant to God's justice to believe of him that he can or will require more. And this is of the nature of those propositions which Aristotle calls θέσεις, to which, without any further probation all wise men will give assent at its first publication. And therefore deductions, inevident from the evident and plain letter of faith, are as great recession from the obligation, as they are from the simplicity and certainty of the article. And this I also affirm, although the church of any one denomination, or represented in a council, shall make the deduction or declaration. For unless Christ had promised his Spirit to protect every particular church from all errors less material, unless he had promised an absolute universal infallibility "etiam in minutioribus," unless superstructures be of the same necessity with the foundation, and that God's Spirit doth not only preserve his church in the being of a church but in a certainty of not saying any thing that is less certain; and that too, whether they will or no we may be bound to peace and obedience, to silence and to charity, but have not a new article of faith made; and a new proposition, though consequent (as it is said) from an article of faith, becomes not therefore, a part of the faith, nor of absolute necessity. "Quid unquam aliud ecclesia conciliorum decretis enisa est, nisi ut quod antea simplicite credebatur, hoc idem postea diligentiùs crederetur," said Vincentius Lirinensis:[r] whatsoever was of necessary belief, is so still, and hath a new decree added by reason, of a new light, or a clear explication; but no propositions can be adopted into the foundation. The church hath power to intend our faith, but not to extend it; to make our belief more evident, but not more large and comprehensive. For Christ and his apostles concealed nothing that was necessary to the integrity of christian faith, or salvation of our souls: Christ declared all the will of his Father, and the apostles were stewards and dispensers of the same mysteries, and were faithful in all the house, and therefore concealed nothing, but taught the whole doctrine of Christ, so they said themselves. And indeed, if they did not teach all the doctrine of faith, an angel or a man might have taught us other things than what they taught, without deserving an anathema, but not without deserving a blessing, for making up that faith entire which the apostles left imperfect. Now, if they taught all the whole body of faith, either the church, in the following ages, lost part of the faith;—and then, where was their infallibility and the effect of those glorious promises to which she pretends, and hath certain title? for she may as well introduce a falsehood as lose a truth, it being as much promised to her that the Holy Ghost shall lead her into all truth, as that she shall be preserved from all errors; as appears, John xvi. 13.: or, if she retained all the faith which Christ and his apostles consigned and taught, then no age can, by declaring any point, make that be an article of faith, which was not so in all ages of christianity before such declaration. And, indeed, if the church, by declaring an article can make that to be necessary, which before was not necessary, I do not see how it can stand with the charity of the church so to do, especially after so long experience she hath had, that all men will not believe every such decision or explication; for, by so doing, she makes the narrow way to heaven narrower, and chalks out one path more to the devil than he had before, and yet the way was broad enough, when it was at the narrowest. For, before, differing persons might be saved in diversity of persuasions; and now, after this declaration, if they cannot, there is no other alteration made, but that some shall be damned, who before, even in the same dispositions and belief, should have been beatified persons. For, therefore, it is well for the fathers of the primitive church, that their errors were not discovered; for if they had been contested, (for that would have been called discovery enough,) "vel errores emendâssent, vel ab ecclesiâ ejecti fuissent."[t] But it is better as it was; they went to heaven by that good fortune, whereas otherwise they might have gone to the devil. And yet there were some errors; particularly that of St. Cyprian, that was discovered; and he went to heaven, it is thought: possibly they might so too, for all this pretence. But suppose it true, yet, whether that declaration of an article, of which, with safety, we either might have doubted, or been ignorant, does more good than the damning of those many souls occasionally, but yet certainly and foreknowingly, does hurt, I leave it to all wise and good men to determine. And yet, besides this, it cannot enter into my thoughts, that it can possibly consist with God's goodness, to put it into the power of man so palpably and openly to alter the paths and inlets to heaven, and to straiten his mercies, unless he had furnished these men with an infallible judgment, and an infallible prudence, and a never-failing charity, that they should never do it but with great necessity, and with great truth, and without human ends and designs; of which I think no arguments can make us certain what the primitive church hath done in this case. I shall afterwards consider, and give an account of it; but, for the present, there is no insecurity in ending there where the apostles ended, in building where they built, in resting where they left us, unless the same infallibility which they had, had still continued, which, I think, I shall hereafter make evident it did not. And, therefore, those extensions of creed, which were made in the first ages of the church, although, for the matter, they were most true, yet because it was not certain that they should be so, and they might have been otherwise,—therefore, they could not be in the same order of faith, nor in the same degrees of necessity to be believed with the articles apostolical; and, therefore, whether they did well, or no, in laying the same weight upon them, or whether they did lay the same weight or no, we will afterwards consider.

13. But to return. I consider that a foundation of faith cannot alter; unless a new building be to be made, the foundation is the same still; and this foundation is no other but that which Christ and his apostles laid, which doctrine is like himself, yesterday and to-day, and the same for ever. So that the articles of necessary belief to all, (which are the only foundation,) they cannot be several in several ages, and to several persons. Nay, the sentence and declaration of the church cannot lay this foundation, or make any thing of the foundation, because the church cannot lay her own foundation; we must suppose her to be a building, and that she relies upon the foundation, which is, therefore, supposed to be laid before, because she is built upon it; or, to make it more explicit, because a cloud may arise from the allegory of building and foundation, it is plainly thus: the church being a company of men obliged to the duties of faith and obedience, the duty and obligation, being of the faculties of will and understanding, to adhere to such an object, must pre-suppose the object made ready for them; for as the object is before the act, in order of nature, and, therefore, not to be produced or increased by the faculty, which being receptive, cannot be active upon its proper object; so the object of the church's faith is, in order of nature, before the church, or before the act and habit of faith, and therefore cannot be enlarged by the church, any more than the act of the visive faculty can add visibility to the object. So that if we have found out what foundation Christ and his apostles did lay, that is, what body and system of articles simply necessary they taught and required of us to believe, we need not, we cannot go any farther for foundation, we cannot enlarge that system or collection. Now then, although all that they said is true, and nothing of it to be doubted or disbelieved, yet, as all that they said is neither written or delivered, (because all was not necessary,) so we know that of those things which are written, some things are as far off from the foundation as those things which were omitted; and, therefore, although now accidentally they must be believed by all that know them, yet it is not necessary all should know them; and that all should know them in the same sense and interpretation, is neither probable nor obligatory; but, therefore, since these things are to be distinguished by some differences of necessary and not necessary,—whether or no, is not the declaration of Christ and his apostles, affixing salvation to the belief of some great comprehensive articles, and the act of the apostles rendering them as explicit as they thought convenient, and consigning that creed, made so explicit, as a tessera of a christian, as a comprehension of the articles of his belief, as a sufficient disposition and an express of the faith of a "catechumen," in order to baptism: whether or no, I say, all this be not sufficient probation that these only are of absolute necessity, that this is sufficient for mere belief in order to heaven, and that, therefore, whosoever believes these articles heartily and explicitly, Θεὸς μένει ἐν αὐτῷ, as St. John's expression is, "God dwelleth in him,"—I leave it to be considered and judged of from the premises. Only this: if the old doctors had been made judges in these questions, they would have passed their affirmative; for to instance in one for all,—of this it was said by Tertullian,[u] "Regula quidem fidei una omnino est sola immobilis et irreformabilis," &c. " Hâc lege fidei manente, cætera jam disciplinæ et conversationis admittunt novitatem correctionis, operante scilicet, et proficiente usque in finem gratiâ Dei :" " This symbol is the one sufficient, immovable, unalterable, and unchangeable rule of faith, that admits no increment or decrement; but if the integrity and unity of this be preserved, in all other things men may take a liberty of enlarging their knowledges and prophesyings, according as they are assisted by the grace of God."

SECTION II.

Of Heresy, and the Nature of it; and that it is to be accounted according to the strict capacity of Christian Faith, and not in Opinions speculative, nor ever to pious Persons.

1. And thus I have represented a short draught of the object of faith, and its foundation. The next consideration, in order to our main design, is to consider what was, and what ought to be, the judgment of the apostles concerning heresy: for although there are more kinds of vices than there are of virtues, yet the number of them is to be taken by accounting the transgressions of their virtues, and by the limits of faith: we may also reckon the analogy and proportions of heresy, that as we have seen who were called faithful by the apostolical men, we may also perceive who were listed by them in the catalogue of heretics, that we, in our judgments, may proceed accordingly.

2. And, first, the word heresy is used in Scripture indifferently; in a good sense, for a sect or division of opinion, and men following it; or sometimes in a bad sense, for a false opinion, signally condemned: but these kind of people were then called antichrists and false prophets, more frequently than heretics, and then there were many of them in the world. But it is observable that no heresies are noted " signanter" in Scripture, but such as are great errors practical, " in materiâ pietatis," such whose doctrines taught impiety, or such who denied the coming of Christ directly or by consequence, not remote or withdrawn, but prime and immediate; and, therefore, in the code " de Sanctâ Trinitate et Fide Catholicâ," heresy is called ἀσεβὴς δόξα, καὶ ἀθέμιτος διδασκαλία, " a wicked opinion, and an ungodly doctrine."

3. The first false doctrine we find condemned by the apostles, was the opinion of Simon Magus, who thought the Holy Ghost was to be bought with money: he thought very dishonourably to the Blessed Spirit; but yet his followers are rather noted of a vice neither resting in the understanding, nor derived from it, but wholly practical; it is simony, not heresy; though in Simon it was a false opinion, proceeding from a low account of God, and promoted by his own ends of pride and covetousness. The great heresy that troubled them, was the doctrine of the necessity of keeping the law of Moses, the necessity of circumcision against which doctrine they were therefore zealous because it was a direct overthrow to the very end and excellency of Christ's coming. And this was an opinion most pertinaciously and obstinately maintained by the Jews, and had made a sect among the Galatians: and this was, indeed, wholly in opinion; and against it the apostles opposed two articles of the creed, which served, at several times according as the Jews changed their opinion, and left some degrees of their error; " I believe in Jesus Christ, and I believe the holy catholic church:" for they, therefore, pressed the necessity of Moses's law, because they were unwilling to forego the glorious appellative of being God's own peculiar people; and that salvation was of the Jews, and that the rest of the world were capable of that grace not otherwise but by adoption into their religion, and becoming proselytes. But this was so ill a doctrine, as that it overthrew the great benefits of Christ's coming; for, " if they were circumcised Christ profited them nothing:" meaning this, that Christ will not be a Saviour to them, who do not acknowledge him for their Lawgiver; and they neither confess him their Lawgiver, nor their Saviour, that look to be justified by the law of Moses and observation of legal rites: so that this doctrine was a direct enemy to the foundation, and, therefore, the apostles were so zealous against it. Now then, that other opinion, which the apostles met at Jerusalem to resolve, was but a piece of that opinion: for the Jews and proselytes were drawn off from their lees and sediment by degrees, step by step. At first, they would not endure any should be saved but themselves and their proselytes. Being wrought off from this height by miracles, and preaching of the apostles, they admitted the gentiles to a possibility of salvation, but yet so as to hope for it by Moses's law. From which foolery when they were, with much ado, persuaded, and told that salvation was by faith in Christ, not by works of the law, yet they resolved to plough with an ox and an ass still, and join Moses with Christ; not as shadow and substance, but in an equal confederation, Christ should save the gentiles, if he was helped by Moses,—but, alone, christianity could not do it. Against this the apostles assembled at Jerusalem, and made a decision of the question, tying some of the gentiles (such only who were blended by the Jews " in communi patria") to observation of such rites, which the Jews had derived by tradition from Noah, intending, by this, to satisfy the Jews, as far as might be, with a reasonable compliance and condescension; the other gentiles who were unmixed, in the mean while remaining free, as appears in the liberty St. Paul gave the church of Corinth of eating idol sacrifices, (expressly against the decree at Jerusalem,) so it were without scandal. And yet, for all this care and curious discretion, a little of the leaven still remained: all this they thought did so concern the gentiles, that it was totally impertinent to the Jews; still they had a distinction to satisfy the letter of the apostles' decree, and yet to persist in their old opinion; and this so continued, that fifteen christian bishops in succession were circumcised, even until the destruction of Jerusalem, under Adrian, as Eusebius reports.[a]

4. First, by the way, let me observe, that never any matter of question in the christian church was determined with greater solemnity, or more full authority of the church, than this question concerning circumcision; no less than the whole college of the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, and that with a decree of the highest sanction, "Visum est Spiritui Sancto et nobis." Secondly; Either the case of the Hebrews, in particular, was omitted, and no determination concerning them, whether it were necessary or lawful for them to be circumcised, or else it was involved in the decree, and intended to oblige the Jews. If it was omitted since the question was "de re necessariâ," (for "dico vobis," "I, Paul, say unto you, if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing,") it is very remarkable, how the apostles, to gain the Jews, and to comply with their violent prejudice in behalf of Moses's law, did, for a time, tolerate their dissent "etiam in re alioquin necessariâ," which I doubt not but was intended as a precedent for the church to imitate for ever after: but if it was not omitted, either all the multitude of the Jews, (which St. James, then their bishop, expressed by ποσαὶ μυριάδες· "Thou seest how many myriads of Jews that believe, and yet are zealots for the law:[b]—and Eusebius,[c] speaking of Justus, says, he was one "ex infinitâ multitudine eorum, qui ex circumcisione in Jesum credebant,") I say all these did perish, and their believing in Christ served them to no other ends, but, in the infinity of their torments, to upbraid them with hypocrisy and heresy; or if they were saved, it is apparent how merciful God was, and pitiful to human infirmities, that, in a point of so great concernment, did pity their weakness, and pardon their errors, and love their good mind; since their prejudice was little less than insuperable, and had fair probabilities, at least, and was such as might abuse a wise and good man, (and so it did many,) they did "bono animo errare." And, if I mistake not, this consideration St. Paul urged as a reason why God forgave him, who was a persecutor of the saints, because he did it "ignorantly in unbelief,"[d] that is, he was not convinced in his understanding of the truth of the way which he persecuted, he, in the mean while, remaining in that incredulity, not out of malice or ill ends, but the mistakes of humanity and a pious zeal; therefore "God had mercy on him;" and so it was in this great question of circumcision; here only was the difference, the invincibility of St. Paul's error, and the honesty of his heart, caused God so to pardon him, as to bring him to the knowledge of Christ, which God therefore did because it was necessary, "necessitate medii;" no salvation was consistent with the actual remanency of that error; but in the question of circumcision, although they, by consequence, did overthrow the end of Christ's coming; yet, because it was such a consequence, which they, being hindered by a prejudice non-impious, did not perceive, God tolerated them in their error, till time, and a continual dropping of the lessons and dictates apostolical, did wear it out, and then the doctrine put on its apparel, and became clothed with necessity; they, in the mean time, so kept to the foundation, that is, Jesus Christ crucified and risen again, that although this did make a violent concussion of it, yet they held fast with their heart what they ignorantly destroyed with their tongue,—which Saul, before his conversion, did not,—that God upon other titles, than an actual dereliction of their error, did bring them to salvation.

5. And in the descent of so many years, I find not any one anathema past, by the apostles or their successors, upon any of the bishops of Jerusalem, or the believers of the circumcision, and yet it was a point as clearly determined, and of as great necessity, as any of those questions that, at this day, vex and crucify christendom.

6. Besides this question, and that of the resurrection, commenced in the church of Corinth, and promoted with some variety of sense, by Hymenæus and Philetus, in Asia, who said that the resurrection was past already, I do not remember any other heresy named in Scripture, but such as were errors of impiety, "seductiones in materiâ practicâ;" such as was, particularly, forbidding to marry,—and the heresy of the Nicolaitans, a doctrine that taught the necessity of lust and frequent fornication.

7. But in all the animadversions against errors made by the apostles in the New Testament, no pious person was condemned, no man that did invincibly err, or "bonâ mente;" but something that was amiss "in genere morum," was that which the apostles did redargue. And it is very considerable, that even they of the circumcision, who, in so great numbers, did heartily believe in Christ, and yet most violently retain circumcision, and, without question, went to heaven in great numbers;—yet, of the number of these very men, they came deeply under censure, when, to their error, they added impiety; so long as it stood with charity, and without human ends and secular interests, so long it was either innocent or connived at; but when they grew covetous, and for filthy lucre's sake taught the same doctrine which others did in the simplicity of their hearts, then they turned heretics,—then they were termed seducers; and Titus was commanded to look to them, and to silence them; "For there are many that are intractable and vain babblers, seducers of minds, especially they of the circumcision, who seduce whole houses, teaching things that they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake." These, indeed, were not to be endured; but to be silenced by the conviction of sound doctrine, and to be rebuked sharply, and avoided.

8. For heresy is not an error of the understanding, but an error of the will. And this is clearly insinuated in the Scripture, in the style whereof faith and a good life are made one duty, and vice is called opposite to faith, and heresy opposed to holiness and sanctity. So in St. Paul: "For," saith he, "the end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith unfeigned;" "à quibus quòd aberrârunt quidam," "from which charity, and purity, and goodness, and sincerity, because some have wandered," "deflexerunt ad vaniloquium."[e] And immediately after, he reckons the oppositions to faith and sound doctrine; and instances only in vices that stain the lives of christians, "the unjust, the unclean, the uncharitable, the liar, the perjured person, 'et si quis alius qui sanæ doctrinæ adversatur;'" these are the enemies of the true doctrine. And, therefore, St. Peter, having given in charge, "to add to our virtue patience, temperance, charity, and the like," gives this for a reason,—for "if these things be in you, and abound, ye shall be fruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ."—So that knowledge and faith is "inter præcepta morum," is part of a good life.[f] And St. Paul calls faith, or the form of sound words, κατ' εὐσεβείαν διδασκαλίαν, "the doctrine that is according to godliness."[g] And "veritati credere," and "in injustitiâ sibi complacere," are, by the same apostle, opposed,[h] and intimate that piety and faith is all one thing; faith must be ὑγιὴς καὶ ἄμωμος, "entire and holy too," or it is not right. It was the heresy of the Gnostics, that it was no matter how men lived, so they did but believe aright; which wicked doctrine Tatianus, a learned christian, did so detest, that he fell into a quite contrary, "Non est curandum quod quisque credat; id tantum curandum est, quod quisque faciat;" and thence came the sect Encratites: both these heresies sprang from the too nice distinguishing the faith from the piety and good life of a christian; they are both but one duty. However they may be distinguished if we speak like philosophers,—they cannot be distinguished when we speak like christians. For to believe what God hath commanded, is in order to a good life; and to live well is the product of that believing, and as proper emanation from it, as from its proper principle, and as heat is from the fire. And therefore, in Scripture, they are used promiscuously in sense, and in expression, as not only being subjected in the same person, but also in the same faculty; faith is as truly seated in the will as in the understanding, and a good life as merely derives from the understanding as the will. Both of them are matters of choice and of election,—neither of them an effect natural and invincible, or necessary antecedently; "necessaria ut fiant, non necessariò facta." And, indeed, if we remember that St. Paul reckons heresy amongst the works of the flesh, and ranks it with all manner of practical impieties, we shall easily perceive, that if a man mingles not a vice with his opinion, if he be innocent in his life, though deceived in his doctrine,—his error is his misery, not his crime; it makes him an argument of weakness, and an object of pity, but not a person sealed up to ruin and reprobation.

9. For as the nature of faith is, so is the nature of heresy, contraries having the same proportion and commensuration. Now faith, if it be taken for an act of the understanding merely, is so far from being that excellent grace that justifies us, that it is not good at all, in any kind but "in genere naturæ," and makes the understanding better in itself, or pleasing to God, just as strength doth the arm, or beauty the face, or health the body; these are natural perfections indeed, and so knowledge and a true belief is to the understanding. But this makes us not at all more acceptable to God; for then the unlearned were certainly in a damnable condition, and all good scholars should be saved; whereas, I am afraid, too much of the contrary is true. But unless faith be made moral by the mixtures of the choice and charity, it is nothing but a natural perfection, not a grace or a virtue; and this is demonstrably proved in this,—that by the confession of all men, of all interests and persuasions, in matters of mere belief, invincible ignorance is our excuse if we be deceived; which could not be, but that neither to believe aright is commendable, nor to believe amiss is reprovable; but where both one and the other is voluntary, and chosen antecedently or consequently, by prime election, or "ex post facto," and so comes to be considered in morality, and is part of a good life or a bad life respectively. Just so it is in heresy; if it be a design of ambition, and making of a sect, (so Erasmus expounds St. Paul, αἱρετικὸν ἄνθρωπον, "sectarum auctorem,"[i]) if it be for filthy lucre's sake, as it was in some that were of the circumcision; if it be of pride and "love of pre-eminence," as it was in Diotrephes, ὁ φιλοπρωτεύων; or out of peevishness and indocibleness of disposition, or of a contentious spirit, that is, that their feet are not shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;—in all these cases the error is just so damnable, as is its principle; but, therefore, damnable not of itself, but by reason of its adherency. And if any shall say any otherwise, it is to say that some men shall be damned when they cannot help it, perish without their own fault, and be miserable for ever because of their unhappiness to be deceived, through their own simplicity, and natural or accidental, but inculpable, infirmity.

8. For it cannot stand with the goodness of God, who does so know our infirmities, that he pardons many things in which our wills indeed have the least share, (but some they have,) but are overborne with the violence of an impetuous temptation; I say, it is inconsistent with his goodness to condemn those who err, where the error hath nothing of the will in it; who, therefore, cannot repent of their error, because they believe it true; who, therefore, cannot make compensation, because they know not that they are tied to dereliction of it. And although all heretics are in this condition, that is, they believe their errors to be true; yet there is a vast difference between them who believe so out of simplicity, and them who are given over to believe a lie, as a punishment, or an effect of some other wickedness or impiety. For all have a concomitant assent to the truth of what they believe; and no man can, at the same time, believe what he does not believe; but this assent of the understanding in heretics is caused, not by force of argument, but the argument is made forcible by something that is amiss in his will; and although a heretic may, peradventure, have a stronger argument for his error, than some true believer for his right persuasion, yet it is not considerable how strong his argument is, (because, in a weak understanding, a small motive will produce a great persuasion, like gentle physic in a weak body,) but that which here is considerable, is, what it is that made his argument forcible. If his invincible and harmless prejudice, if his weakness, if his education, if his mistaking piety, if any thing that hath no venom nor a sting in it, there the heartiness of his persuasion is no sin, but his misery and his excuse: but if any thing that is evil "in genere morum," did incline his understanding; if his opinion did commence upon pride, or is nourished by covetousness, or continues through stupid carelessness, or increases by pertinacy, or is confirmed by obstinacy,—then the innocency of the error is disbanded, his misery is changed into a crime, and begins its own punishment. But, by the way, I must observe, that when I reckoned "obstinacy" amongst those things, which make a false opinion criminal, it is to be understood with some discretion and distinction. For there is an obstinacy of will, which is, indeed, highly guilty of misdemeanour; and when the school makes pertinacy or obstinacy to be the formality of heresy, they say not true at all, unless it be meant the obstinacy of the will and choice; and if they do, they speak imperfectly and inartificially, this being but one of the causes that makes error become heresy; the adequate and perfect formality of heresy is whatsoever makes the error voluntary and vicious, as is clear in Scripture, reckoning covetousness, and pride, and lust, and whatsoever is vicious, to be its causes:—and in habits, or moral changes and productions, whatever alters the essence of a habit, or gives it a new formality, is not to be reckoned the efficient, but the form:—but there is also an obstinacy you may call it, but, indeed, it is nothing but a resolution and confirmation of understanding, which is not in a man's power honestly to alter, and it is not all the commands of humanity, that can be argument sufficient to make a man leave believing that for which he thinks he hath reason, and for which he hath such arguments as heartily convince him. Now, the persisting in an opinion finally, and against all the confidence and imperiousness of human commands, that makes not this criminal obstinacy, if the erring person have so much humility of will as to submit to whatsoever God says, and that no vice in his will hinders him from believing it. So that we must carefully distinguish continuance in opinion from obstinacy, confidence of understanding from peevishness of affection, a not being convinced from a resolution never to be convinced, upon human ends and vicious principles: "Scimus quosdam, quod semel imbiberint, nolle deponere, nec propositum suum facile mutare; sed, salvo inter collegas pacis et concordiæ vinculo, quædam propria, quæ apud se semel sint usurpata, retinere; quâ in re nec nos vim cuiquam facimus, aut legem damus," saith St. Cyprian.[k] And he himself was such a one; for he persisted in his opinion of rebaptization, until death; and yet his obstinacy was not called criminal, or his error turned to heresy. But to return.

11. In this sense it is that a heretic is αὐτοκατάκριτος, "self-condemned," not by an immediate express sentence of understanding, but by his own act or fault, brought into condemnation. As it is in the canon law, "Notorius percussor clerici" is "ipso jure" excommunicate, not "per sententiam latam ab homine," but "à jure." No man hath passed sentence "pro tribunali," but law hath decreed it "pro edicto:" so it is in the case of a heretic. The understanding, which is judge, condemns him not by an express sentence; for he errs with as much simplicity in the result, as he had malice in the principle; but there is "sententia lata à jure;" his will, which is his law, that hath condemned him. And this is gathered from that saying of St. Paul, "But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived."[l] First, they are evil men; malice and peevishness is in their wills; then they turn heretics, and seduce others; and while they grow worse and worse, the error is master of their understanding, they are deceived themselves, "given over to believe a lie," saith the apostle: they first play the knave, and then play the fool; they first sell themselves to the purchase of vain-glory or ill ends; and then they become possessed with a lying spirit, and believe those things heartily, which, if they were honest, they should, with God's grace, discover and disclaim. So that now we see that "bona fides in falso articulo," "a hearty persuasion in a false article," does not always make the error to be esteemed involuntary, but then only when it is as innocent in the principle, as it is confident in the present persuasion. And such persons, who, by their ill lives and vicious actions, or manifest designs, (for "by their fruits ye shall know them,") give testimony of such criminal indispositions, so as competent judges, by human and prudent estimate, may so judge them, then they are to be declared heretics, and avoided. And if this were not true, it were vain that the apostle commands us to avoid a heretic: for no external act can pass upon a man for a crime that is not cognoscible.

12. Now every man that errs, though in a matter of consequence, so long as the foundation is entire, cannot be suspected justly guilty of a crime to give his error a formality of heresy; for we see many a good man miserably deceived, as we shall make it appear afterwards; and he that is the best amongst men, certainly hath so much humility to think he may be easily deceived, and, twenty to one, but he is in some thing or other; yet, if his error be not voluntary, and part of an ill life, then, because he lives a good life, he is a good man, and, therefore, no heretic: no man is a heretic against his will. And if it be pretended that every man that is deceived, is therefore proud, because he does not submit his understanding to the authority of God or man respectively, and so his error becomes a heresy;—to this I answer, that there is no christian man but will submit his understanding to God, and believes whatsoever he hath said; but always, provided he knows that God hath said so, else he must do his duty by a readiness to obey when he shall know it. But for obedience or humility of the understanding towards men, that is a thing of another consideration, and it must first be made evident that his understanding must be submitted to men; and who those men are, must also be certain, before it will be adjudged a sin not to submit. But if I mistake not Christ's saying,—"Call no man master upon earth,"—is so great a prejudice against this pretence, as I doubt it will go near wholly to make it invalid. So that, as the worshipping of angels is a humility indeed, but it is voluntary and a will-worship to an ill sense, not to be excused by the excellency of humility, nor the virtue of religion:—so is the relying upon the judgment of a man a humility too, but such as comes not under that ὑπακοὴ πίστεως, that "obedience of faith," which is the duty of every christian; but intrenches upon that duty, which we owe to Christ as an acknowledgment that he is our great Master, and the Prince of the catholic church. But whether it be or be not, if that be the question, whether the disagreeing person be to be determined by the dictates of men, I am sure the dictates of men must not determine him in that question, but it must be settled by some higher principle: so that if of that question the disagreeing person does opine, or believe, or err "bonâ fide,—he is not therefore to be judged a heretic, because he submits not his understanding; because, till it be sufficiently made certain to him, that he is bound to submit, he may innocently and piously disagree: and this not submitting is, therefore, not a crime, and so cannot make a heresy, because, without a crime, he may lawfully doubt, whether he be bound to submit or no;—for that is the question. And if in such questions, which have influence upon a whole system of theology, a man may doubt lawfully, if he doubts heartily, because the authority of men being the thing in question, cannot be the judge of this question, and, therefore, being rejected, or, which is all one, being questioned, that is, not believed, cannot render the doubting person guilty of pride, and, by consequence, not of heresy;—much more may particular questions be doubted of, and the authority of men examined, and yet the doubting person be humble enough, and, therefore, no heretic for all this pretence. And it would be considered that humility is a duty in great ones as well as in idiots. And as inferiors must not disagree without reason, so neither must superiors subscribe to other without sufficient authority, evidence, and necessit too: and if rebellion be pride, so is tyranny; and being "in materiâ intellectuali," both may be guilt of pride of understanding,—sometimes the one i imposing, sometimes the other in a causeless dis agreeing; but in the inferiors, it is then only th want of humility, when the guides impose or pre scribe what God hath also taught; and then it i the disobeying God's dictates, not man's, that make the sin. But then this consideration will also in tervene: that as no dictate of God obliges men t believe it, unless I know it to be such; so neithe will any of the dictates of my superiors engage m faith, unless I also know, or have no reason to dis believe, but that they are warranted to teach ther to me; therefore, because God hath taught th same to them, which if I once know, or have n reason to think the contrary, if I disagree, my si is not in resisting human authority, but Divine And, therefore, the whole business of submittin our understanding to human authority, comes t nothing; for either it resolves into the direct duty o submitting to God, or, if it be spoken of abstract ly, it is no duty at all.

13. But this pretence of a necessity of humblin the understanding, is none of the meanest art whereby some persons have invaded, and hav usurped a power over men's faith and consciences and, therefore, we shall examine the pretence after wards, and try if God hath invested any man, o company of men, with such a power. In the mea time, he that submits his understanding to all tha he knows God hath said, and is ready to submit t all that he hath said, if he but know it, denying hi own affections, and ends, and interests, and huma persuasions, laying them all down at the foot of hi great Master, Jesus Christ,—that man hath brough his understanding into subjection, and every prou thought unto the obedience of Christ, and this i ὑπακοὴ πίστεως, "the obedience of faith," which i the duty of a christian.

14. But to proceed: Besides these heresies note in Scripture, the age of the apostles, and that whic followed, was infested with other heresies; but such as had the same formality and malignity with th precedent, all of them, either such as taught practi cal impieties, or denied an article of the creed Hegesippus, in Eusebius, reckons seven only prim heresies, that sought to deflower the purity of th church:—that of Simon,—that of Thebutes,—o Cleobius,—of Dositheus,—of Gortheus,—of Masbo theus; I suppose Cerinthus to have been th seventh man, though he express him not: but o these, except the last, we know no particulars; bu that Hegesippus says, they were false Christs, and that their doctrine was directly against God and his blessed Son. Menander also was the first of a sect but he bewitched the people with his sorceries Cerinthus's doctrine pretended enthusiasm, or a new revelation, and ended in lust and impious theorems in matter of uncleanness. The Ebionites[m] denied Christ to be the Son of God, and affirmed him ψιλὸν ἄνθρωπον, begot by natural generation, (by occasion of which, and the importunity of the Asian bishops, St. John wrote his Gospel,) and taught the observation of Moses's law. Basilides taught it lawful to renounce the faith, and take false oaths, in time of persecution. Carpocrates was a very bedlam, half-witch and quite madman; and practised lust, which he called the secret operations to overcome the potentates of the world. Some more there were, but of the same nature and pest, not of a nicety in dispute, not a question of secret philosophy, not of atoms and undiscernible propositions, but open defiances of all faith, of all sobriety, and of all sanctity, excepting only the doctrine of the millenaries, which, in the best ages, was esteemed no heresy, but true catholic doctrine, though it since hath justice done to it, and hath suffered a just condemnation.

15. Hitherto, and in these instances, the church did esteem and judge of heresies, in proportion to the rules and characters of faith. For faith being a doctrine of piety as well as truth, that which was either destructive of fundamental verity, or of christian sanctity, was against faith, and if it made a sect, was heresy; if not it ended in personal impiety, and went no further. But those, who, as St. Paul says, "not only did such things, but had pleasure in them that do them," and, therefore, taught others to do what they impiously did dogmatize,—they were heretics, both in matter and form, in doctrine and deportment, towards God, and towards man, and judicable in both tribunals.

16. But the Scripture and apostolical sermons, having expressed most high indignation against these masters of impious sects, leaving them under prodigious characters and horrid representments, as calling them "men of corrupt minds,—reprobates concerning the faith,—given over to strong delusions to the belief of a lie,—false apostles,—false prophets,—men already condemned, and that by themselves,—antichrists,—enemies to God;"—and heresy itself, "a work of the flesh, excluding from the kingdom of heaven;" left such impressions in the minds of all their successors, and so much zeal against such sects, that if any opinion commenced in the church, not heard of before, it oftentimes had this ill luck to run the same fortune with an old heresy. For because the heretics did bring in new opinions in matters of great concernment, every opinion, "de novo," brought in, was liable to the same exception; and because the degree of malignity, in every error, was oftentimes undiscernible, and most commonly indemonstrable, their zeal was alike against all; and those ages, being full of piety, were fitted to be abused with an over active zeal, as wise persons and learned are, with too much indifferency.

17. But it came to pass, that the further the succession went from the apostles, the more forward men were in numbering heresies, and that upon slighter and more uncertain grounds. Some footsteps of this we shall find, if we consider the sects that are said to have sprung in the first three hundred years, and they were pretty and quick in their springs and falls; fourscore and seven of them are reckoned. They were indeed reckoned afterward; and though, when they were alive, they were not condemned with as much forwardness as after they were dead, yet, even then, confidence began to mingle with opinions less necessary,—and mistakes in judgment were oftener, and more public, than they should have been. But if they were forward in their censures, (as sometimes some of them were,) it is no great wonder they were deceived. For what principle or κριτήριον had they then to judge of heresies, or condemn them, besides the single dictates or decretals of private bishops? for Scripture was indifferently pretended by all; and concerning the meaning of it, was the question: now there was no general council all that while, no opportunity for the church to convene; and if we search the communicatory letters of the bishops and martyrs, in those days, we shall find but few sentences decretory, concerning any question of faith, or new-sprung opinion. And in those that did, for aught appears, the persons were misreported, or their opinions mistaken, or at most, the sentence of condemnation was no more than this; such a bishop who hath had the good fortune, by posterity, to be reputed a catholic, did condemn such a man of such an opinion, and yet himself erred in as considerable matters; but meeting with better neighbours in his life-time, and a more charitable posterity, hath his memory preserved in honour. It appears plain enough, in the case of Nicholas, the deacon of Antioch, upon a mistake of his words, whereby he taught παραχρῆσθαι τῇ σαρκὶ, "to abuse the flesh," viz. by acts of austerity, and self-denial, and mortification; some wicked people that were glad to be mistaken and abused into a pleasing crime, pretended that he taught them to abuse the flesh by filthy commixtures and pollutions. This mistake was transmitted to posterity with a full cry, and acts afterwards found out, to justify an ill opinion of him. For by St. Jerome's time it grew out of question, but that he was the vilest of men, and the worst of heretics; "Nicolaus, Antiochenus, omnium immunditiarum conditor choros duxit fœmineos."[n] And again, "Iste Nicolaus diaconus ita immundus exstitit, ut etiam in præsepi Domini nefas perpetravit:"[o] Accusations that, while the good man lived, were never thought of; for his daughters were virgins, and his sons lived in holy celibate all their lives, and himself lived in chaste wedlock; and yet his memory had rotted in perpetual infamy, had not God (in whose sight the memory of the saints is precious) preserved it, by the testimony of Clemens Alexandrinus,[p] and, from him, of Eusebius and Nicephorus.[q] But in the catalogue of heretics, made by Philastrius, he stands marked with a black character, as guilty of many heresies: by which one testimony we may guess what trust is to be given to those catalogues. Well, this good man had ill luck to fall into unskilful hands, at first; but Irenæus, Justin Martyr, Lactantius,—to name no more, had better fortune; for it being still extant in their writings that they were of the millenary opinion, Papius before, and Nepos after, were censured hardly, and the opinion put into the catalogue of heresies; and yet these men were never suspected as guilty, but like the children of the captivity, walked in the midst of the flame, and not so much as the smell of fire passed on them. But the uncertainty of these things is very memorable, in the story of Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, contesting with Eusebius Pamphilus: Eustathius accused Eusebius for going about to corrupt the Nicene creed, "of which slander he then acquitted himself," saith Socrates;[r] and yet he is not cleared by posterity, for still he is suspected, and his fame not clear: however Eusebius, then scaped well, but to be quit with his adversary, he recriminates and accuses him to be "a favourer of Sabellius, rather than of the Nicene canons;" an imperfect accusation, God knows, when the crime was a suspicion, provable only by actions capable of divers constructions, and at the most, made but some degrees of probability; and the fact itself did not consist "in indivisibili," and, therefore, was to stand or fall, to be improved or lessened, according to the will of the judges, whom in this cause, Eustathius, by his ill fortune and a potent adversary, found harsh towards him, insomuch that he was for heresy deposed in the synod of Antioch; and though this was laid open in the eye of the world, as being most ready at hand, with the greatest ease charged upon every man, and with greatest difficulty acquitted by any man; yet there were other suspicions raised upon him privately, or, at least, talked of "ex post facto," and pretended as causes of his deprivation, lest the sentence should seem too hard for the first offence. And yet, what they were, no man could tell, saith the story. But it is observable what Socrates saith,[s] as an excuse for such proceedings, Τοῦτο δὲ ἐπὶ πάντων εἰώθασι τῶν καθαιρουμένων ποιεῖν οἱ ἐπίσκοποι, κατηγοροῦντες μὲν καὶ ἀσεβῆ λέγοντες, τὰς δὲ αἰτίας τῆς ἀσεβείας οὐ λέγουσι· "It is the manner among the bishops, when they accuse them that are deposed, they call them wicked, but they publish not the actions of their impiety."—It might possibly be that the bishops did it in tenderness of their reputation, but yet hardly; for to punish a person publicly and highly, is a certain declaring the person punished guilty of a high crime, and then to conceal the fault, upon pretence to preserve his reputation, leaves every man at liberty to conjecture what he pleaseth; who possibly will believe it worse than it is, inasmuch as they think his judges so charitable as therefore to conceal the fault, lest the publishing of it should be his greatest punishment, and the scandal greater than his deprivation. However this course,[t] if it were just in any, was unsafe in all; for it might undo more than it could preserve, and, therefore, is of more danger than it can be of charity. It is, therefore, too probable that the matter was not very fair; for, in public sentences, the acts ought to be public, but that they rather pretend heresy to bring their ends about, shows how easy it is to impute that crime, and how forward they were to do it: and that they might, and did then, as easily call heretic as afterward, when Vigilius was condemned of heresy, for saying there were antipodes; or as the friars of late did, who suspected Greek and Hebrew of heresy, and called their professors heretics, and had like to have put Terence and Demosthenes into the "Index Expurgatorius;" sure enough they railed at them "pro concione," therefore because they understood them not, and had reason to believe they would accidentally be enemies to their reputation among the people.

18. By this instance, which was a while after the Nicene council, where the acts of the church were regular, judicial, and orderly, we may guess at the sentences passed upon heresy, at such times and in such cases, when their process was more private, and their acts more tumultuary, their information less certain, and, therefore, their mistakes more easy and frequent. And it is remarkable, in the case of the heresy of Montanus, the scene of whose heresy lay within the first three hundred years, though it was represented in the catalogues afterwards, and possibly the mistake concerning it, is to be put upon the score of Epiphanius, by whom Montanus and his followers were put into the catalogue of heretics, for commanding abstinence from meats, as if they were unclean, and of themselves unlawful. Now the truth was, Montanus said no such thing; but, commanded frequent abstinence, enjoined dry diet, and an ascetic table, not for conscience' sake, but for discipline; and yet because he did this with too much rigour and strictness of mandate, the primitive church misliked it in him, as being too near their error, who, by a Judaical superstition, abstained from meats as from uncleanness. This, by the way, will much concern them, who place too much sanctity in such rites and acts of discipline; for it is an eternal rule, and of never-failing truth, that such abstinences, if they be obtruded as acts of original immediate duty and sanctity, are unlawful and superstitious; if they be for discipline, they may be good, but of no very great profit; it is that ἀφειδία τοῦ σώματος, which, St. Paul says, profited but little; and just in the same degree, the primitive church esteemed them; for they therefore reprehended Montanus, for urging such abstinences with too much earnestness, though but in the way of discipline; for that it was no more, Tertullian, who was himself a Montanist, and knew best the opinions of his own sect, testifies; and yet Epiphanius, reporting the errors of Montanus, commends that which Montanus truly and really taught, and which the primitive church condemned in him; and, therefore, represents that heresy to another sense, and affixes that to Montanus, which Epiphanius believed a heresy, and yet, which Montanus did not teach. And this also, among many other things, lessens my opinion very much of the integrity or discretion of the old catalogues of heretics, and much abates my confidence towards them.

[t] Simpliciter pateat vitium fortasse pusillum;
Quod tegitur, majus creditur esse malum. Martial.

19. And now that I have mentioned them casually, in passing by, I shall give a short account of them; for men are much mistaken; some in their opinions concerning the truth of them, as believing them to be all true; some concerning their purpose, as thinking them sufficient, not only to condemn all those opinions, there called heretical, but to be a precedent to all ages of the church, to be free and forward in calling heretic. But he that considers the catalogues themselves, as they are collected by Epiphanius, Philastrius, and St. Austin, shall find that many are reckoned for heretics, for opinions in matters disputable, and undetermined, and of no consequence; and in these catalogues of heretics, there are men numbered for heretics, which, by every side respectively, are acquitted; so that there is no company of men in the world that admit these catalogues as good records, or sufficient sentences of condemnation. For the churches of the reformation, I am certain, they acquit Aerius, for denying prayer for the dead,—and the Eustathians, for denying invocation of saints. And I am partly of opinion, that the church of Rome is not willing to call the Collyridians heretics, for offering a cake to the Virgin Mary, unless she also will run the hazard of the same sentence, for offering candles to her; and that they will be glad, with St. Austin, (l. vi. de Hæres. c. 86.) to excuse the Tertullianists,[u] for picturing God in a visible corporeal representment. And yet these sects are put in the black book by Epiphanius, and St. Austin, and Isidore respectively. I remember also, that the Osseni are called heretics, because they refused to worship towards the east; and yet, in that dissent, I find not the malignity of a heresy, nor any thing against an article of faith or good manners; and it being only in circumstance, it were hard, if they were otherwise pious men and true believers, to send them to hell for such a trifle. The Parermeneutæ refused to follow other men's dictates like sheep, but would expound Scripture according to the best evidence themselves could find, and yet were called heretics, whether they expounded true or no. The Paulicians,[x] for being offended at crosses,—the Proclians, for saying, in a regenerate man all his sins were not quite dead, but only curbed and assuaged,—were called heretics, and so condemned, for aught I know, for affirming that which all pious men feel, in themselves, to be too true. And he that will consider how numerous the catalogues are, and to what a volume they are come in their last collections, to no less than five hundred and twenty, (for so many heresies and heretics are reckoned by Prateolus,) may think, that if a retrenchment were justly made of truths, and all impertinencies, and all opinions, either still disputable, or less considerable, the number would much decrease; and, therefore, that the catalogues are much amiss, and the name heretic is made a "terriculamentum" to affright people from their belief, or to discountenance the persons of men, and disrepute them, that their schools may be empty, and their disciples few.

20. So that I shall not need to instance how that some men were called heretics by Philastrius, for rejecting the translation of the Seventy, and following the Bible of Aquila, wherein the great faults mentioned by Philastrius, are that he translates Χριστὸν Θεοῦ, not "Christum," but "unctum Dei," and instead of "Emanuel," writes "Deus nobiscum." But this most concerns them of the primitive church, with whom the translation of Aquila was in great reputation, "is enim veluti plus à quibusdam—intellexisse laudatur:" "It was supposed he was a great clerk, and understood more than ordinary;" it may be he did. But whether yea or no, yet, since the other translators, by the confession of Philastrius, "quædam prætermisisse necessitate urgente cogerentur," if some wise men, or unwise, did follow a translator who understood the original well, (for so Aquila had learnt among the Jews,) it was hard to call men heretics for following his translation, especially since the other Bibles (which were thought to have in them contradictories, and, it was confessed, had omitted some things) were excused by necessity,—and the other's necessity of following Aquila, when they had no better, was not at all considered, nor a less crime than heresy laid upon their score.[y] Such another was the heresy of the Quarto-decimani; for the Easterlings were all proclaimed heretics, for keeping Easter after the manner of the East; and as Socrates and Nicephorus report, the bishop of Rome was very forward to excommunicate all the bishops of the Lesser Asia, for observing the feast according to the tradition of their ancestors, though they did it modestly, quietly, and without faction; and although they pretended, and were as well able to prove their tradition from St. John, of so observing it, as the western church could prove their tradition derivative from St. Peter and St. Paul. If such things as these make up the catalogues of heretics, (as we see they did,) their accounts differ from the precedents they ought to have followed,—that is, the censures apostolical,—and therefore, are unsafe precedents for us; and unless they took the liberty of using the word heresy, in a lower sense than the world now doth, since the councils have been forward in pronouncing anathema, and took it only for a distinct sense, and a differing persuasion in matters of opinion and minute articles, we cannot excuse the persons of the men: but if they intended the crime of heresy against those opinions, as they laid them down in their catalogues, that crime, I say, which is a work of the flesh, which excludes from the kingdom of heaven, all that I shall say against them, is, that the causeless curse shall return empty; and no man is damned the sooner, because his enemy cries ὦ κατάρατε, and they that were the judges and accusers, might err as well as the persons accused, and might need as charitable construction of their opinions and practices as the other. And of this we are sure, they had no warrant from any rule of Scripture, or practice apostolical, for driving so furiously and hastily, in such decretory sentences. But I am willing rather to believe their sense of the word "heresy" was more gentle than with us it is; and for that they might have warrant from Scripture.

21. But by the way, I observe, that although these catalogues are a great instance to show, that they whose age and spirits were far distant from the apostles, had also other judgments concerning faith and heresy, than the apostles had, and the ages apostolical; yet, these catalogues, although they are reports of heresies, in the second and third ages, are not to be put upon the account of those ages, not to be reckoned as an instance of their judgment, which, although it was in some degrees more culpable than that of their predecessors, yet in respect of the following ages, it was innocent and modest. But these catalogues I speak of, were set down according to the sense of the then present ages, in which as they, in all probability, did differ from the apprehensions of the former centuries, so it is certain, there were differing learnings, other fancies, divers representments and judgments of men depending upon circumstances, which the first ages knew, and the following ages did not; and, therefore, the catalogues were drawn with some truth, but less certainty, as appears in their differing about the authors of some heresies; several opinions imputed to the same, and some put in the roll of heretics by one, which the other left out; which, to me, is an argument, that the collectors were determined, not by the sense and sentence of the three first ages, but by themselves, and some circumstances about them, which to reckon for heretics, which not. And that they themselves were the prime judges, or perhaps some in their own age, together with them; but there was not any sufficient external judicatory competent to declare heresy, that, by any public or sufficient sentence or acts of court, had furnished them with warrant for their catalogues. And, therefore, they are no argument sufficient, that the first ages of the church, which certainly were the best, did much recede from that which I showed to be the sense of the Scripture, and the practice of the apostles: they all contented themselves with the apostles' creed, as the rule of the faith; and, therefore, were not forward to judge of heresy, but by analogy to their rule of faith. And those catalogues, made after these ages, are not sufficient arguments that they did otherwise; but rather of the weakness of some persons, or of the spirit and genius of the age in which the compilers lived; in which the device of calling all differing opinions by the name of heresies, might grow to be a design to serve ends, and to promote interests, as often as an act of zeal and just indignation against evil persons, destroyers of the faith, and corrupters of manners.

22. For whatever private men's opinions were, yet, till the Nicene council, the rule of faith was entire in the apostles' creed; and provided they retained that, easily they broke not the unity of faith, however differing opinions might possibly commence in such things, in which a liberty were better suffered, than prohibited with a breach of charity. And this appears exactly in the question between St. Cyprian, of Carthage,—and Stephen, bishop of Rome; in which one instance it is easy to see, what was lawful and safe for a wise and good man; and yet how others began, even then, to be abused by that temptation, which since hath invaded all christendom. St. Cyprian rebaptized heretics, and thought he was bound so to do; calls a synod in Africa, as being metropolitan, and confirms his opinion by the consent of his suffragans and brethren, but still with so much modesty, that if any man was of another opinion, he judged him not, but gave him that liberty that he desired himself. Stephen, bishop of Rome, grows angry, excommunicates the bishops of Asia and Africa, that in divers synods had consented to rebaptization,—and without peace, and without charity, condemns them for heretics. Indeed, here was the rarest mixture and conjunction of unlikelihoods that I have observed. Here was error of opinion, with much modesty and sweetness of temper, on one side; and on the other, an over active and impetuous zeal to attest a truth. It uses not to be so; for error usually is supported with confidence, and truth suppressed and discountenanced by indifferency. But that it might appear that the error was not the sin, but the uncharitableness, Stephen was accounted a zealous and furious person; and St. Cyprian, though deceived, yet a very good man, and of great sanctity.[z] For although every error is to be opposed, yet, according to the variety of errors, so is there variety of proceedings. If it be against faith, that is, a destruction of any part of the foundation, it is with zeal to be resisted; and we have for it an apostolical warrant, "contend earnestly for the faith;" but then, as these things recede further from the foundation, our certainty is the less, and their necessity not so much; and, therefore, it were very fit that our confidence should be according to our evidence, and our zeal according to our confidence, and our confidence should then be the rule of our communion, and the lightness of an article should be considered with the weight of a precept of charity. And, therefore, there are some errors to be reproved, rather by a private friend than a public censure, and the persons of the men not avoided, but admonished; and their doctrine rejected, not their communion. Few opinions are of that malignity which are to be rejected with the same exterminating spirit, and confidence of aversation, with which the first teachers of christianity condemned Ebion, Manes, and Cerinthus; and in the condemnation of heretics, the personal iniquity is more considerable than the obliquity of the doctrine, not for the rejection of the article, but for censuring the persons; and, therefore, it is the piety of the man that excused St. Cyprian; which is a certain argument that it is not the opinion, but the impiety, that condemns and makes the heretic. And this was it which Vincentius Lirinensis said, in this very case of St. Cyprian: "Unius et ejusdem opinionis (mirum videri potest) judicamus auctores catholicos, et sequaces hæreticos. Excusamus magistros, et condemnamus scholasticos. Qui scripserunt libros sunt hæredes cœli, quorum librorum defensores detruduntur ad infernum."[a] Which saying, if we confront against the saying of Salvian, condemning the first authors of the Arian sect, and acquitting the followers,—we are taught by these two wise men, that an error is not it that sends a man to hell; but he that begins the heresy, and is the author of the sect, he is the man marked out to ruin; and his followers escaped, when the heresiarch commenced the error upon pride and ambition, and his followers went after him in simplicity of their heart. And so it was most commonly: but, on the contrary, when the first man in the opinion was honestly and invincibly deceived, as St. Cyprian was, and that his scholars, to maintain their credit or their ends, maintained the opinion not for the excellency of the reason persuading, but for the benefit and accruements, or peevishness, as did the Donatists, "qui de Cypriani auctoritate sibi carnalitèr blandiuntur," as St. Austin said of them; then the scholars are the heretics, and the master is a catholic; for his error is not the heresy formally, and an erring person may be a catholic. A wicked person, in his error, becomes heretic, when the good man, in the same error, shall have all the rewards of faith. For whatever an ill man believes, if he therefore believe it because it serves his own ends, be his belief true or false, the man hath an heretical mind, for, to serve his own ends, his mind is prepared to believe a lie. But a good man that believes what, according to his light, and upon the use of his moral industry, he thinks true, whether he hits upon the right or no,—because he hath a mind desirous of truth, and prepared to believe every truth, is therefore acceptable to God, because nothing hindered him from it, but what he could not help, his misery and his weakness, which being imperfections merely natural, which God never punishes,—he stands fair for a blessing of his morality, which God always accepts. So that now, if Stephen had followed the example of God Almighty, or retained but the same peaceable spirit which his brother of Carthage did,—he might, with more advantage to truth, and reputation both of wisdom and piety, have done his duty in attesting what he believed to be true; for we are as much bound to be zealous pursuers of peace, as earnest contenders for the faith. I am sure, more earnest we ought to be for the peace of the church, than for an article which is not of the faith,—as this question of rebaptization was not; for St. Cyprian died in belief against it, and yet was a catholic, and a martyr for the christian faith.

23. The sum is this: St. Cyprian did right in a wrong cause, as it hath been since judged; and Stephen did ill in a good cause. As far then as piety and charity is to be preferred before a true opinion, so far is St. Cyprian's practice a better precedent for us, and an example of primitive sanctity, than the zeal and indiscretion of Stephen. St. Cyprian had not learned to forbid to any one a liberty of prophesying or interpretation, if he transgressed not the foundation of faith, and the creed of the apostles.

24. Well, thus it was, and thus it ought to be, in the first ages: the faith of christendom rested still upon the same foundation, and the judgments of heresies were accordingly, or were amiss. But the first great violation of this truth was, when general councils came in, and the symbols were enlarged, and new articles were made as much of necessity to be believed as the creed of the apostles, and damnation threatened to them that did dissent; and at last the creeds multiplied in number and in articles, and the liberty of prophesying began to be something restrained.

25. And this was of so much the more force and efficacy, because it began upon great reason, and, in the first instance, with success good enough. For I am much pleased with the enlarging of the creed, which the council of Nice made, because they enlarged it to my sense: but I am not sure that others are satisfied with it. While we look upon the articles they did determine, we see all things well enough; but there are some wise personages consider it in all circumstances, and think the church had been more happy, if she had not been, in some sense, constrained to alter the simplicity of her faith, and make it more curious and articulate, so much that he had need be a subtle man to understand the very words of the new determinations.

26. For the first Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, in the presence of his clergy, entreats[b] somewhat more curiously of the secret of the mysterious Trinity and Unity; so curiously that Arius (who was a sophister too subtle, as it afterwards appeared) misunderstood him, and thought he intended to bring in the heresy of Sabellius. For while he taught the unity of the Trinity, either he did it so inartificially, or so intricately, that Arius thought he did not distinguish the persons, when the bishop intended only the unity of nature. Against this Arius furiously drives; and, to confute Sabellius, and in him (as he thought) the bishop, distinguishes the natures too, and so, to secure the article of the Trinity, destroys the unity. It was the first time the question was disputed in the world, and in such mysterious niceties, possibly every wise man may understand something, but few can understand all,—and, therefore, suspect what they understand not, and are furiously zealous for that part of it which they do perceive. Well, it happened in these as always in such cases, in things men understand not, they are most impetuous; and because suspicion is a thing infinite in degrees, for it hath nothing to determine it,—a suspicious person is ever most violent; for his fears are worse than the thing feared, because the thing is limited, but his fears are not; so that upon this grew contentions on both sides, and tumultuous railing and reviling each other; and then the laity were drawn into parts, and the Meletians abetted the wrong part; and the right part, fearing to be overborne, did any thing that was next at hand to secure itself.[c] Now then, they that lived in that age, that understood the men, that saw how quiet the church was before this stir, how miserably rent now, what little benefit from the question, what schism about it,—gave other censures of the business than we since have done, who only look upon the article determined with truth and approbation of the church generally, since that time. But the epistle[d] of Constantine to Alexander and Arius, tells the truth, and chides them both for commencing the question, Alexander for broaching it, Arius for taking it up. And although this be true, that it had been better for the church it never had begun, yet being begun, what is to be done in it? Of this also, in that admirable epistle, we have the emperor's judgment (I suppose not without the advice and privity of Hosius, bishop of Corduba, whom the emperor loved and trusted much, and employed in the delivery of the letters): for, first, he calls it "a certain vain piece of a question ill begun, and more unadvisedly published; a question which no law or ecclesiastical canon defineth; a fruitless contention, the product of idle brains; a matter so nice, so obscure, so intricate, that it was neither to be explicated by the clergy, nor understood by the people; a dispute of words, a doctrine inexplicable, but most dangerous when taught, lest it introduce discord or blasphemy; and, therefore, the objector was rash, and the answer unadvised; for it concerned not the substance of faith, or the worship of God, nor any chief commandment of Scripture; and, therefore, why should it be the matter of discord? for though the matter be grave, yet, because neither necessary nor explicable, the contention is trifling and toyish. And, therefore, as the philosophers of the same sect, though differing in explication of an opinion, yet more love the unity of their profession, than disagree for the difference of opinion; so should christians, believing in the same God, retaining the same faith, having the same hopes, opposed by the same enemies, not fall at variance upon such disputes, considering our understandings are not all alike, and, therefore, neither can our opinions in such mysterious articles. So that the matter being of no great importance, but vain, and a toy in respect of the excellent blessings of peace and charity, it were good that Alexander and Arius should leave contending, keep their opinions to themselves, ask each other forgiveness, and give mutual toleration." This is the substance of Constantine's letter; and it contains in it much reason, if he did not undervalue the question; but it seems it was not then thought a question of faith, but of nicety of dispute; they both did believe one God, and the Holy Trinity. Now, then, that he afterwards called the Nicene council, it was upon occasion of the vileness of the men of the Arian part, their eternal discord and pertinacious wrangling, and to bring peace into the church: that was the necessity, and in order to it was the determination of the article. But, for the article itself, the letter declares what opinion he had of that; and this letter was by Socrates called "a wonderful exhortation, full of grave and sober counsels," and such as Hosius himself, who was the messenger, pressed with all earnestness, with all the skill an authority he had.

[d] Cap. 7.

27. I know the opinion the world had of th article, afterwards, is quite differing from this cen sure given of it before; and, therefore, they have pu it into the creed, I suppose, to bring the world t unity, and to prevent sedition in this question, an the accidental blasphemies which were occasione by their curious talkings of such secret mysterie and by their illiterate resolutions. But, althoug the article was determined with an excellent spiri and we all, with much reason, profess to believe i yet it is another consideration, whether or no it migh not have been better determined, if with more sim plicity; and another yet, whether or no, since man of the bishops who did believe this thing, yet di not like the nicety and curiosity of expressing it, had not been more agreeable to the practice of th apostles, to have made a determination of the articl by way of exposition of the apostles' creed, and t have left this in a rescript, for record to all pos terity, and not to have enlarged the creed with it for since it was an explication of an article of th creed of the apostles, as sermons are of places c Scripture, it was thought by some that Scriptur might, with good profit and great truth, be ex pounded, and yet the expositions not put into th canon, or go for Scripture, but that left still in th naked original simplicity; and so much the rathe since that explication was further from the founda tion: and, though most certainly true, yet no penned by as infallible a spirit as was that of th apostles, and, therefore, not with so much evidenc as certainty. And if they had pleased, they migh have made use of an admirable precedent, to thi and many other great and good purposes, no less tha of the blessed apostles, whose symbol they might hav imitated, with as much simplicity as they did th expressions of Scripture, when they first compose it. For it is most considerable, that although, i reason, every clause in the creed should be clea and so inopportune and unapt to variety of interpre tation, that there might be no place left for severa senses, or variety of expositions: yet, when the thought fit to insert some mysteries into the creed which, in Scripture, were expressed in so mysterious words, that the last and most explicit sense woul still be latent; yet, they who (if ever any did understood all the senses and secrets of it, though it not fit to use any words but the words of Scrip ture, particularly in the articles of "Christ's de scending into hell," and "sitting at the right han of God," to show us, that those creeds are best which keep the very words of Scripture; and tha faith is best, which hath greatest simplicity; an that it is better, in all cases, humbly to submit than curiously to inquire, and pry into the mystery under the cloud; and to hazard our faith, by im proving our knowledge. If the Nicene fathers ha done so too, possibly the church would never hav repented it.

28. And, indeed, the experience the church ha afterwards, showed that the bishops and priest were not satisfied in all circumstances, nor th schism appeased, nor the persons agreed, nor the canons accepted, nor the article understood, nor any thing right, but when they were overborne with authority; which authority, when the scales turned, did the same service and promotion to the contrary.

29. But it is considerable, that it was not the article, or the thing itself, that troubled the disagreeing persons, but the manner of representing it. For the five dissenters, Eusebius of Nicomedia, Theognis, Maris, Theonas, and Secundus, believed Christ to be very God of very God; but the clause of ὁμοούσιος they derided, as being persuaded by their logic, that he was neither "of the substance of the Father," by division, as a piece of a lump; nor derivation, as children from their parents; nor by production, as buds from trees; and nobody could tell them any other way at that time, and that made the fire to burn still. And that was it I said; if the article had been with more simplicity, and less nicety, determined, charity would have gained more, and faith would have lost nothing. And we shall find the wisest of them all, for so Eusebius Pamphilus [e] was esteemed, published a creed or confession in the synod; and though he, and all the rest, believed that great mystery of godliness, "God manifested in the flesh," yet he was not fully satisfied, nor so soon, of the clause of "one substance," till he had done a little violence to his own understanding; for even when he had subscribed to the clause of "one substance," he does it with a protestation, that "heretofore he never had been acquainted, nor accustomed himself to such speeches." And the sense of the word [f] was either so ambiguous, or their meaning so uncertain, that Andreus Fricius does, with some probability, dispute that the Nicene fathers, by ὁμοούσιος, did mean, "Patris similitudinem, non essentiæ unitatem." [g] And it was so well understood by personages disinterested, that when Arius and Euzoius had confessed Christ to be "Deus verbum," without inserting the clause of "one substance," the emperor, by his letter, approved of his faith, and restored him to his country and office, and the communion of the church. And a long time after, although the article was believed with nicety enough, [h] yet when they added more words still to the mystery, and brought in the word ὑπόστασις, saying there were three "hypostases" in the Holy Trinity; it was so long before it could be understood, that it was believed therefore, because they would not oppose their superiors, or disturb the peace of the church, in things which they thought could not be understood: insomuch, that St. Jerome wrote to Damascus in these words: "Decerne, si placet, obsecro, non timebo tres hypostases dicere, si jubetis:" and again, "Obtestor beatitudinem tuam per Crucifixum, mundi salutem, per ὁμοούσιον Trinitatem, ut mihi epistolis tuis, sive tacendarum, sive dicendarum hypostaseôn detur auctoritas."

30. But, without all question, the fathers determined the question with much truth; though I cannot say the arguments, upon which they built their decrees, were so good, as the conclusion itself was certain. But that which in this case is considerable, is, whether or no they did well in putting a curse to the foot of their decree, and the decree itself into the symbol, as if it had been of the same necessity? For the curse, Eusebius Pamphilus could hardly find in his heart to subscribe,—at last he did, but with this clause,—that he subscribed it, because the former curse did only "forbid men to acquaint themselves with foreign speeches, and unwritten languages," whereby confusion and discord are brought into the church. So that it was not so much a magisterial high assertion of the article, as an endeavour to secure the peace of the church. And to the same purpose, for aught I know, the fathers composed a form of confession, not as a prescript rule of faith to build the hopes of our salvation on, but as a "tessera" of that communion, which, by public authority, was therefore established upon those articles, because the articles were true, though not of prime necessity; and because that unity of confession was judged, as things then stood, the best preserver of the unity of minds.

31. But I shall observe this, that although the Nicene fathers, in that case, at that time, and in that conjuncture of circumstances, did well (and yet their approbation is made, by after-ages, "ex post facto):" yet if this precedent had been followed by all councils, (and certainly they had equal power, if they had thought it equally reasonable,) and that they had put all their decrees into the creed, as some have done since, to what a volume had the creed by this time swelled! and all the house had run into foundation, nothing left for superstructures. But that they did not, it appears, 1. That since they thought all their decrees true, yet they did not think them all necessary, at least not in that degree, and that they published such decrees, they did it "declarando," not "imperando," as doctors in their chairs, not masters of other men's faith and consciences. 2. And yet there is some more modesty, or wariness, or necessity (what shall I call it?) than this comes to: for why are not all controversies determined? But even when general assemblies of prelates have been, some controversies, that have been very vexatious, have been pretermitted, and others of less consequence have been determined. Why did never any general council condemn, in express sentence, the Pelagian heresy, that great pest, that subtle infection of christendom? and yet divers general councils did assemble, while the heresy was in the world. Both these cases, in several degrees, leave men in their liberty of believing and prophesying. The latter proclaims that all controversies cannot be determined to sufficient purposes; and the first declares, that those that are, are not all of them matters of faith; and themselves are not so secure, but they may be deceived; and, therefore, possibly, it were better it were let alone; for if the latter leaves them divided in their opinions, yet their communions, and, therefore, probably, their charities, are not divided; but the former divides their communions, and hinders their interest;—and yet for aught is certain, the accused person is the better catholic. And yet, after all this, it is not safety enough to say, "Let the council or prelates determine articles warily, seldom, with great caution, and with much sweetness and modesty." For though this be better than to do it rashly, frequently, and furiously; yet if we once transgress the bounds set us by the apostles in their creed, and not only preach other truths, but determine them "pro tribunali" as well as "pro cathedra," although there be no error in the subject matter, as in Nice there was none; yet, if the next ages say they will determine another article with as much care and caution, and pretend as great a necessity, there is no hindering them, but by giving reasons against it; and so like enough they might have done against the decreeing the article at Nice; yet that this is not sufficient; for since the authority of the Nicene council hath grown to the height of a mountainous prejudice against him that should say it was ill done, the same reason and the same necessity may be pretended, by any age, and in any council; and they think themselves warranted by the great precedent at Nice, to proceed as peremptorily as they did; but then if any other assembly of learned men may possibly be deceived, were it not better they should spare the labour, than that they should, with so great pomp and solemnities, engage men's persuasions, and determine an article which after-ages must rescind; for, therefore, most certainly, in their own age, the point with safety of faith and salvation, might have been disputed and disbelieved: and that many men's faiths have been tied up by acts and decrees of councils, for those articles, in which the next age did see a liberty had better been preserved, because an error was determined,—we shall afterwards receive a more certain account.

32. And, therefore, the council of Nice did well, and Constantinople did well, so did Ephesus and Chalcedon; but it is because the articles were truly determined (for that is part of my belief); but who is sure it should be so beforehand? and whether the points there determined were necessary or no to be believed or to be determined, if peace had been concerned in it through the faction and division of the parties, I suppose the judgment of Constantine the emperor, and the famous Hosius of Corduba, is sufficient to instruct us, whose authority I rather urge than reasons, because it is a prejudice, and not a reason, I am to contend against it.

33. So that such determinations and publishing of confessions with authority of prince and bishop, are sometimes of very good use for the peace of the church; and they are good also to determine the judgment of indifferent persons, whose reasons, of either side, are not too great to weigh down the probability of that authority; but for persons of confident and imperious understandings, they on whose side the determination is, are armed with a prejudice against the other, and with a weapon to affront them, but with no more to convince them; and they against whom the decision is, do the more readily betake themselves to the defensive, and are engaged upon contestation and public enmities, for such articles, which either might safely have been unknown, or with much charity disputed. Therefore, the Nicene council, although it have the advantage of an acquired and prescribing authority, yet it must not become a precedent to others: lest the inconveniences of multiplying more articles upon a great pretence of reason, as then, make the act of the Nicene fathers in straitening prophesying, and enlarging the creed, become accidentally an inconvenience. The first restraint, although, if it had been complained of, might possibly have been better considered of; yet the inconvenience is not visible, till it comes by way of precedent to usher in more. It is like an arbitrary power, which, although by the same reason it take sixpence from the subject, it may take a hundred pounds, and then a thousand, and then all, yet so long as it is within the first bounds, the inconvenience is not so great; but when it comes to be a precedent or argument for more, then the first may justly be complained of, as having in it that reason in the principle, which brought the inconvenience in the sequel; and we have seen very ill consequences from innocent beginnings.

34. And the inconveniences which might possibly arise from this precedent, those wise personages also did foresee; and, therefore, although they took liberty in Nice, to add some articles, or at least more explicitly to declare the first creed, yet they then would have all the world to rest upon that, and go no further, as believing that to be sufficient. St. Athanasius declares their opinion, Ἡ γὰρ ἐν αὐτῇ, παρὰ τῶν πατέρων κατὰ τὰς θείας γραφὰς, ὁμολογηθεῖσα πίστις, αὐτάρκης ἐστὶ πρὸς ἀνατροπὴν μὲν πάσης ἀσεβείας, σύστασιν δὲ τῆς εὐσεβείας ἐν Χριστῷ πίστεως.[i] "That faith which the fathers there confessed, was sufficient for the refutation of all impiety, and the establishment of all faith in Christ and true religion." And, therefore, there was a famous epistle written by Zeno the emperor,[k] called the Ἑνωτικὸν, or the "epistle of reconciliation," in which all disagreeing interests are entreated to agree in the Nicene symbol, and a promise made upon that condition to communicate with all other sects,—adding withal, that the church should never receive any other symbol, than that which was composed by the Nicene fathers. And, however Honorius was condemned for a monothelite; yet, in one of the epistles which the sixth synod alleged against him, viz. the second, he gave them counsel that would have done the church as much service as the determination of the article did; for he advised them not to be curious in their disputings, nor dogmatical in their determinations about that question; and because the church was not used to dispute in that question, it were better to preserve the simplicity of faith, than to insnare men's consciences by a new article. And when the emperor Constantius was, by his faction, engaged in a contrary practice, the inconvenience and unreasonableness was so great, that a prudent heathen observed and noted it in this character of Constantius: "Christianam religionem absolutam et simplicem anili superstitione confudit. In quâ scrutandâ perplexiùs quàm in componendâ gratiùs, excitavit dissidia quæ progressa fusiùs, aluit concertatione verborum, dum ritum omnem ad suum trahere conatur arbitrium."

[i] Epist. ad. Epict.

35. And yet men are more led by example, than either by reason or by precept; for in the council of Constantinople, one article "de novo et integro" was added, viz. "I believe one baptism for the remission of sins;" and then again they were so confident that that confession of faith was so absolutely entire, and that no man ever after should need to add any thing to the integrity of faith, that the fathers of the council of Ephesus pronounced anathema to all those, that should add any thing to the creed of Constantinople. And yet for all this, the church of Rome in a synod at Gentilly, added the clause of "Filioque," to the article of the procession of the Holy Ghost, and what they have done since, all the world knows, "Exempla non consistunt, sed quamvis in tenuem recepta tramitem, latissimè evagandi sibi faciunt potestatem." All men were persuaded that it was most reasonable the limits of faith should be no more enlarged; but yet they enlarged it themselves, and bound others from doing it like an intemperate father, who, because he knows he does ill himself, enjoins temperance to his son, but continues to be intemperate himself.

36. But now if I should be questioned concerning the symbol of Athanasius, (for we see the Nicene symbol was the father of many more, some twelve or thirteen symbols in the space of a hundred years,) I confess I cannot see that moderate sentence and gentleness of charity in his preface and conclusion, as there was in the Nicene creed. Nothing there but damnation and perishing everlastingly, unless the article of the Trinity be believed, as it is there with curiosity and minute particularities explained. Indeed, Athanasius had been soundly vexed on one side, and much cried up on the other; and, therefore, it is not so much wonder for him to be so decretory and severe in his censure; for nothing could more ascertain his friends to him, and disrepute his enemies, than the belief of that damnatory appendix; but that does not justify the thing. For the articles themselves, I am most heartily persuaded of the truth of them, and yet I dare not say all that are not so are irrevocably damned; because "citra hoc symbolum," the faith of the apostle's creed is entire; and "he that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved," that is, he that believeth such a belief as is sufficient disposition to be baptized, that faith with the sacrament is sufficient for heaven. Now the apostles' creed does one; why, therefore, do not both entitle us to the promise? Besides, if it were considered concerning Athanasius's creed, how many people understand it not, how contrary to natural reason it seems, how little the Scripture[l] says of those curiosities of explication, and how tradition was not clear on his side for the article itself, much less for those forms and minutes (how himself is put to make an answer, and excuse for the fathers[m] speaking in excuse of the Arians, at least so seemingly, that the Arians appealed to them for trial, and the offer was declined): and after all this, that the Nicene creed itself went not so far, neither in article, nor anathema, nor explication, it had not been amiss if the final judgment had been left to Jesus Christ; for he is appointed Judge of all the world, and he shall judge the people righteously; for he knows every truth, the degree of every necessity, and all excuses that do lessen or take away the nature or malice of a crime; all which I think Athanasius, though a very good man, did not know so well as to warrant such a sentence; and put case, the heresy there condemned be damnable, (as it is damnable enough,) yet a man may maintain an opinion that is in itself damnable, and yet he, not knowing it so, and being invincibly led into it, may go to heaven; his opinion shall burn, and himself be saved. But, however, I find no opinion in Scripture called damnable, but what are impious "in materiâ practicâ," or directly destructive of the faith, or the body of christianity; such of which St. Peter speaks: "Bringing in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, these are the false prophets, who, out of covetousness, make merchandise of you through cozening words."[n] Such as these are truly heresies, and such as these are certainly damnable. But because there are no degrees either of truth or falsehood, every true proposition being alike true; that an error is more or less damnable, is not told us in Scripture, but is determined by the man and his manners, by circumstances and accidents; and, therefore, the censure in the preface and end, are arguments of his zeal and strength of his persuasion; but they are extrinsical and accidental to the articles, and might as well have been spared. And, indeed, to me it seems very hard to put uncharitableness into the creed, and so to make it become as an article of faith, though perhaps this very thing was no faith of Athanasius; who, if we may believe Aquinas,[o] made this manifestation of faith, "Non per modum symboli, sed per modum doctrinæ," that is, if I understand him right, "not with a purpose to impose it upon others, but with confidence to declare his own belief;" and that it was prescribed to others as a creed, was the act of the bishops of Rome; so he said, nay, possibly it was none of his: so said the patriarch of Constantinople, Meletius, about one hundred and thirty years since, in his epistle to John Douza, "Athanasio falsò adscriptum symbolum, cum Pontificum Romanorum appendice illâ adulteratum, luce lucidiùs contestamur." And it is more than probable that he said true, because this creed was written originally in Latin, which in all reason Athanasius did not, and it was translated into Greek, it being apparent that the Latin copy is but one; but the Greek is various, there being three editions, or translations rather, expressed by Genebrard, "lib. iii. de Trinit." But in this particular, who list, may better satisfy himself in a disputation "de symbolo Athanasii," printed at Wertzburg, 1590, supposed to be written by Serrarius or Clencherus.

37. And yet I must observe, that this symbol of Athanasius, and that other of Nice, offer not at any new articles; they only pretend to a further explication of the articles apostolical, which is a certain confirmation, that they did not believe more articles to be of belief necessary to salvation; if they intended these further explanations to be as necessary as the dogmatical articles of the apostles' creed, I know not how to answer all that may be objected against that; but the advantage that I shall gather from their not proceeding to new matters, is laid out ready for me in the words of Athanasius, saying of this creed, "This is the catholic faith:" and if his authority be good, or his saying true, or he the author, then no man can say of any other article, that it is a part of the catholic faith, or that the catholic faith can be enlarged beyond the contents of that symbol; and, therefore, it is a strange boldness in the church of Rome,[p] first to add twelve new articles, and then to add the appendix of Athanasius to the end of them, "This is the catholic faith, without which no man can be saved."

38. But so great an example of so excellent a man hath been either mistaken or followed with too much greediness,—all the world in factions, all damning one another, each party damned by all the rest; and there is no disagreeing in opinion from any man that is in love with his own opinion, but damnation presently to all that disagree. A ceremony and a rite hath caused several churches to excommunicate each other, as in the matter of the Saturday fast, and keeping Easter. But what the spirits of men are, when they are exasperated, in a question and difference of religion, as they call it, though the thing itself may be most inconsiderable, is very evident in that request of Pope Innocent III. desiring of the Greeks, (but reasonably a man would think,) that they would not so much hate the Roman manner of consecrating in unleavened bread, as to wash, and scrape, and pare the altars after a Roman priest had consecrated. Nothing more furious than a mistaken zeal, and the actions of a scrupulous and abused conscience. When men think every thing to be their faith and their religion, commonly they are so busy in trifles and such impertinencies, in which the scene of their mistake lies, that they neglect the greater things of the law, charity, and compliances, and the gentleness of christian communion; for this is the great principle of mischief, and yet is not more pernicious than unreasonable.

39. For I demand: Can any man say and justify that the apostles did deny communion to any man, that believed the apostles' creed, and lived a good life? And dare any man tax that proceeding of remissness, and indifferency in religion? And since our blessed Saviour promised salvation "to him that believeth," (and the apostles, when they gave this word the greatest extent, enlarged it not beyond the borders of the creed,) how can any man warrant the condemning of any man to the flames of hell, that is ready to die in attestation of this faith, so expounded and made explicit by the apostles, and lives accordingly? And to this purpose it was excellently said by a wise and a pious prelate, St. Hilary, "Non per difficiles nos Deus ad beatam vitam quæstiones vocat, &c. In absoluto nobis et facili est æternitas; Jesum suscitatum à mortuis per Deum credere, et ipsum esse Dominum confiteri," &c.[q] These are the articles which we must believe which are the sufficient and adequate object of the faith, which is required of us in order to salvation. And therefore it was, that when the bishops of Istria deserted the communion of Pope Pelagius "in causâ trium capitulorum,"[r] he gives them an account of his faith, by recitation of the creed, and by attesting the four general councils; and is confident upon this, that "de fidei firmitate nulla poteri esse quæstio, vel suspicio generari;" let the apostle's creed, especially so explicated, be but secured, and all faith is secured; and yet that explication too was less necessary than the articles themselves; for the explication was but accidental, but the articles even before the explication, were accounted a sufficient inlet to the kingdom of heaven.

40. And that there was security enough in the simple believing the first articles, is very certain amongst them, and by their principles, who allow of an implicit faith to serve most persons to the greatest purposes; for, if the creed did contain in it the whole faith, and that other articles were in it implicitly, (for such is the doctrine of the school and particularly of Aquinas,[s]) then he that explicitly believes all the creed, does implicitly believe all the articles contained in it; and then it is better the implication should still continue, than that by any explication, which is simply unnecessary, the church should be troubled with questions and uncertain determinations, and factions enkindled, and animosities set on foot, and men's souls endangered, who before were secured by the explicit belief of all that the apostles required as necessary; which belief also did secure them from all the rest, because it implied the belief of whatsoever was virtually in the first articles, if such belief should by chance be necessary.

41. The sum of this discourse is this; if we take an estimate of the nature of faith from the dictates and promises evangelical, and from the practice apostolical, the nature of faith and its integrity consist in such propositions which make the foundation of hope and charity, that which is sufficient to make us to do honour to Christ, and to obey him, and to encourage us in both; and this is completed in the apostles' creed. And since contraries are of the same extent, heresy is to be judged by its proportion and analogy to faith; and that is heresy only which is against faith. Now, because faith is not only a precept of doctrines, but of manners, and holy life, whatsoever is either opposite to an article of creed, or teaches ill life, that is heresy; but all those propositions, which are extrinsical to these two considerations, be they true or be they false, make not heresy, nor the man a heretic; and, therefore, however he may be an erring person, yet he is to be used accordingly, pitied and instructed, not condemned or excommunicated; and this is the result of the first ground, the consideration of the nature of faith and heresy.

SECTION III.

Of the Difficulty and Uncertainty of Arguments from Scripture, in Questions not simply necessary, not literally determined.

1. GOD, who disposes of all things sweetly, and according to the nature and capacity of things and persons, had made those only necessary, which he had taken care should be sufficiently propounded to all persons, of whom he required the explicit belief. And, therefore, all the articles of faith are clearly and plainly set down in Scripture; and the gospel is not hid "nisi pereuntibus," saith St. Paul; Πάσης γὰρ ἀρετῆς παράκλησιν, καὶ κακίας ἀπάσης τροπὴν ἐν ταύταις εὑρίσκομεν, saith Damascen;[a] and that so manifestly that no man can be ignorant of the foundation of faith, without his own apparent fault. And this is acknowledged by all wise and good men, and is evident, besides the reasonableness of the thing, in the testimonies of St. Austin,[b] Jerome,[c] Chrysostom,[d] Fulgentius,[e] Hugo de Sancto Victore,[f] Theodoret,[g] Lactantius,[h] Theophilus Antiochenus,[i] Aquinas,[k] and the later schoolmen. And God hath done more; for many things which are only profitable, are also set down so plainly, that as St. Austin says, "Nemo inde haurire non possit, si modò ad hauriendum devotè ac piè accedat:"[l] but of such things there is no question commenced in christendom; and if there were, it cannot but be a crime and human interest, that are the authors of such disputes; and therefore these cannot be simple errors, but always heresies, because the principle of them is a personal sin.

2. But besides these things, which are so plainly set down, "some for doctrine," as St. Paul says, that is, for articles and foundation of faith; some for instruction, some for reproof, some for comfort, that is, in matters practical and speculative, of several tempers and constitutions;—there are innumerable places, containing in them great mysteries, but yet either so inwrapped with a cloud, or so darkened with umbrages, or heightened with expressions, or so covered with allegories and garments of rhetoric, so profound in the matter, or so altered or made intricate in the manner, in the clothing, and in the dressing, that God may seem to have left them as trials of our industry, and arguments of our imperfections, and incentives to the longings after heaven, and the clearest revelations of eternity, and as occasions and opportunities of our mutual charity and toleration to each other, and humility in ourselves, rather than the repositories of faith, and furniture of creeds, and articles of belief.

3. For wherever the word of God is kept, whether in Scripture alone, or also in tradition, he that considers that the meaning of the one, and the truth or certainty of the other, are things of great question, will see a necessity in these things, which are the subject matter of most of the questions of christendom, that men should hope to be excused by an implicit faith in God Almighty. For when there are in the explications of Scripture so many commentaries, so many senses and interpretations, so many volumes in all ages, and all, like men's faces, exactly none like another, either this difference and inconvenience is absolutely no fault at all, or if it be, it is excusable, by a mind prepared to consent in that truth which God intended. And this I call an implicit faith in God; which is, certainly, of as great excellency as an implicit faith in any man or company of men. Because they who do require an implicit faith in the church, for articles less necessary, and excuse the want of explicit faith by the implicit,—do require an implicit faith in the church, because they believe that God hath required of them to have a mind prepared to believe whatever the church says; which, because it is a proposition of no absolute certainty, whosoever does, in readiness of mind, believe all that God spake, does also believe that sufficiently, if it be fitting to be believed, that is, if it be true, and if God hath said so; for he hath the same obedience of understanding in this as in the other. But because it is not so certain that God hath tied him in all things to believe that which is called the church; and that it is certain we must believe God in all things, and yet neither know all that either God hath revealed or the church taught; it is better to take the certain than the uncertain, to believe God rather than men; especially since if God hath bound us to believe men, our absolute submission to God does involve that, and there is no inconvenience in the world this way, but that we implicitly believe one article more, viz. the church's authority or infallibility; which may well be pardoned, because it secures our belief of all the rest; and we are sure if we believe all that God said explicitly, or implicitly, we also believe the church implicitly in case we are bound to it; but we are not certain, that if we believe any company of men whom we call the church, that we therefore obey God, and believe what he hath said. But, however, if this will not help us, there is no help for us, but good fortune or absolute predestination; for by choice and industry, no man can secure himself that in all the mysteries of religion taught in Scripture, he shall certainly understand, and explicitly believe, that sense that God intended. For to this purpose there are many considerations.

4. First; There are so many thousands of copies, that were written by persons of several interests and persuasions,—such different understandings and tempers,—such distinct abilities and weaknesses,—that it is no wonder there is so great variety of readings both in the Old Testament and in the New. In the Old Testament, the Jews pretend that the christians have corrupted many places, on purpose to make symphony between both the Testaments. On the other side, the christians have had so much reason to suspect the Jews, that when Aquila had translated the Bible in their schools, and had been taught by them, they rejected the edition, many of them, and some of them called it heresy to follow it. And Justin Martyr justified it to Tryphon, that the Jews had defalked many sayings from the books of the old prophets, and, amongst the rest, he instances in that of the psalm, "Dicite in nationibus, quia Dominus regnavit à ligno." The last words they have cut off, and prevailed so far in it, that to this day none of our Bibles have it; but if they ought not to have it, then Justin Martyr's Bible had more in it than it should have, for there it was; so that a fault there was, either under or over. But, however, there are infinite readings in the New Testament, (for in that I will instance,) some whole verses in one part that are not in another; and there was, in some copies of St. Mark's Gospel, in the last chapter, a whole verse, a chapter it was anciently called, that is not found in our Bibles, as St. Jerome, "ad Hedibiam, q. 3." notes. The words he repeats, "Contr. Polygamos, lib. ii." "Et illi satis faciebant dicentes, sæculum istud iniquitatis et incredulitatis substantia est, quæ non sinit per immundos spiritûs veram Dei apprehendi virtutem, ideirco, jam nunc revela justitiam tuam."—These words are thought by some to savour of Manichaism; and, for aught I can find, were therefore rejected out of many Greek copies, and at last out of the Latin. Now suppose that a Manichee, in disputation, should urge this place, having found it in his Bible, if a catholic should answer him, by saying it is apocryphal, and not found in divers Greek copies, might not the Manichee ask how it came in, if it was not the word of God,—and if it was, how came it out? and at last take the same liberty of rejecting any other authority which shall be alleged against him, if he can find any copy that may favour him, however that favour be procured. And did not the Ebionites reject all the epistles of St. Paul, upon pretence he was an enemy to the law of Moses? Indeed it was boldly and most unreasonably done; but if one tittle, or one chapter of St. Mark be called apocryphal, for being suspected of Manichaism, it is a plea that will too much justify others, in their taking and choosing what they list. But I will not urge it so far; but is not there as much reason for the fierce Lutherans to reject the epistle of St. James, for favouring justification by works, or the epistle to the Hebrews, upon pretence that the sixth and tenth chapters do favour Novatianism; especially since it was, by some famous churches, at first not accepted, even by the church of Rome herself? The parable of the woman taken in adultery, which is now in John viii. Eusebius says was not in any gospel, but the gospel, "secundum Hebræos;" and St. Jerome makes it doubtful; and so does St. Chrysostom and Euthymius, the first not vouchsafing to explicate it in his homilies upon St. John, the other affirming it not to be found in the exacter copies. I shall not need to urge, that there are some words so near in sound, that the scribes might easily mistake: there is one famous one of Κυρίῳ δουλεύοντες, which yet some copies read καίρῳ δουλεύοντες; the sense is very unlikely, though the words be near, and there needs some little luxation to strain this latter reading to a good sense: that famous precept of St. Paul, that "the women must pray with a covering on their head," διὰ τους ἀγγέλους, "because of the angels," hath brought into the church an opinion that angels are present in churches, and are spectators of our devotion and deportment. Such an opinion, if it should meet with peevish opposites on the one side, and confident hyperaspists on the other, might possibly make a sect; and here were a clear ground for the affirmative, and yet who knows but that it might have been a mistake of the transcribers; for if it were read as Gothofrid, and some others, would have it, διὰ τοὺς ἀγέλους, or rather, διὰ τὰς ἀγέλας, or, τοὺς ἀγελαίους, that the sense be, "women, in public assemblies, must wear a veil, by reason of the 'companies of the young men' there present," it would be no ill exchange for the little change of some letters in a word, to make so probable, so clear a sense of the place. But the instances in this kind are too many, as appears in the variety of readings in several copies proceeding from the negligence or ignorance of the transcribers, or the malicious endeavour of heretics,[m] or the inserting marginal notes into the text, or the nearness of several words. Indeed there is so much evidence of this particular, that it hath encouraged the servants of the vulgar translation, for so some are now-a-days, to prefer that translation before the original; for although they have attempted that proposition with very ill success, yet that they could think it possible to be proved, is an argument there is much variety and alterations in divers texts; for if there were not, it were impudence to pretend a translation, and that none of the best should be better than the original. But so it is that this variety of reading is not of slight consideration; for although it be demonstrably true, that all things necessary to faith and good manners are preserved from alteration and corruption, because they are of things necessary, and they could not be necessary, unless they were delivered to us, God, in his goodness and his justice, having obliged himself to preserve that which he hath bound us to observe and keep; yet, in other things which God hath not obliged himself so punctually to preserve, in these things, since variety of reading is crept in, every reading takes away a degree of certainty from any proposition derivative from those places so read: and if some copies, especially if they be public and notable, omit a verse or a tittle, every argument from such a tittle or verse loses much of its strength and reputation; and we find it in a great instance. For when, in probation of the mystery of the glorious Unity in Trinity, we allege that saying of St. John, "there are three which bear witness in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, and these three are one," the antitrinitarians think they have answered the argument by saying the Syrian translation and divers Greek copies have not that verse in them, and, therefore, being of doubtful authority, cannot conclude with certainty, in a question of faith. And there is an instance on the catholic part. For when the Arians urge the saying of our Saviour, "No man knows that day and hour," viz. of judgment, "no, not the Son, but the Father only,"—to prove that the Son knows not all things, and, therefore, cannot be God in the proper sense,—St. Ambrose thinks he hath answered the argument, by saying those words, "no, not the Son," were thrust into the text by the fraud of the Arians. So that here we have one objection, which must first be cleared and made infallible, before we can be ascertained in any such question as to call them heretics that dissent.

5. Secondly, I consider that there are very many senses and designs of expounding Scripture, and when the grammatical sense is found out, we are many times never the nearer; it is not that which was intended; for there is, in very many Scriptures, a double sense, a literal and a spiritual, (for the Scripture is "a book written within and without,"[n]) and both these senses are subdivided. For the literal sense is either natural or figurative: and the spiritual is sometimes allegorical, sometimes anagogetical; nay, sometimes there are divers literal senses in the same sentence, as St. Austin excellently proves in divers places;[o] and it appears, in divers quotations in the New Testament, where the apostles and divine writers bring the same testimony to divers purposes; and particularly, St. Paul's making that saying of the psalm, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," to be an argument of Christ's resurrection, and a designation or ordination to his pontificate, is an instance very famous in his first and fifth chapters to the Hebrews. But now there being such variety of senses in Scripture, and but few places so marked out, as not to be capable of divers senses, if men will write commentaries, as Herod made orations, μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας, what infallible κριτήριον will be left whereby to judge of the certain, dogmatical, resolute sense of such places, which have been the matter of question. For put case a question were commenced concerning the degrees of glory in heaven, as there is in the schools a noted one,—to show an inequality of reward, Christ's parable is brought of the reward of ten cities, and of five, according to the divers improvement of the talents; this sense is mystical, and yet very probable, and understood by men, for aught I know, to this very sense. And the result of the argument is made good by St. Paul, "as one star differeth from another in glory;" so shall it be in the resurrection of the dead. Now suppose another should take the same liberty of expounding another parable to a mystical sense and interpretation, as all parables must be expounded, then the parable of the labourers in the vineyard, and though differing in labour, yet having an equal reward, to any man's understanding may seem very strongly to prove the contrary; and, as if it were of purpose, and that it were "primum intentum" of the parable, the lord of the vineyard determined the point resolutely upon the mutiny and repining of them that had borne the burden and heat of the day, "I will give unto this last even as to thee;" which, to my sense, seems to determine the question of degrees; they that work but little, and they that work long, shall not be distinguished in the reward, though accidentally they were in the work: and if this opinion could but answer St. Paul's words, it stands as fair, and perhaps fairer than the other. Now if we look well upon the words of St. Paul, we shall find he speaks nothing at all of diversity of degrees of glory in beatified bodies, but the differences of glory in bodies heavenly and earthly. "There are," says he, "bodies earthly, and there are heavenly bodies: and one is the glory of the earthly, another the glory of the heavenly; one glory of the sun, another of the moon, &c. So shall it be in the resurrection; for it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." Plainly thus, our bodies in the resurrection shall differ as much from our bodies here, in the state of corruption, as one star does from another. And now suppose a sect should be commenced upon this question, (upon lighter and vainer many have been,) either side must resolve to answer the other's argument, whether they can or no, and to deny to each other a liberty of expounding the parable to such a sense, and yet themselves must use it, or want an argument. But men use to be unjust in their own cases; and were it not better to leave each other to their liberty, and seek to preserve their own charity; for when the words are capable of a mystical or a diverse sense, I know not why men's fancies or understandings should be more bound to be like one another than their faces: and either, in all such places of Scripture, a liberty must be indulged to every honest and peaceable wise man, or else all argument from such places must be wholly declined. Now, although I instanced in a question, which, by good fortune, never came to open defiance, yet there have been sects framed upon lighter grounds, more inconsiderable questions, which have been disputed, on either side, with arguments less material and less pertinent. St. Austin laughed at the Donatists, for bringing that saying of the spouse in the Canticles to prove their schism, "Indica mihi, ubi pascas; ubi cubes in meridie." For from thence they concluded the residence of the church was only in the south part of the world, only in Africa. It was but a weak way of argument; yet, the fathers were free enough to use such mediums, to prove mysteries of great concernment;[p] but yet again, when they speak either against an adversary, or with consideration, they deny that such mystical senses can sufficiently confirm a question of faith. But I shall instance, in the great question of rebaptization of heretics which many saints, and martyrs, and confessors, and divers councils, and almost all Asia and Africa, did once believe and practise. Their grounds for the invalidity of the baptism by a heretic, were such mystical words as these, "Oleum peccatoris non impinguet caput meum."[q]—And, "Qui baptizatur à mortuo, quid proficit lavatio ejus?"[r]—And, "Ab aquâ alienâ abstinete."[s]—And, "Deus peccatores non exaudit."[t]—And, "He that is not with me is against me."[u]—I am not sure the other part had arguments so good. For the great one of "una fides, unum baptisma," did not conclude it to their understandings who were of the other opinion, and men famous in their generations; for it was no argument that they who had been baptized by John's baptism, should not be baptized in the name of Jesus, because "unus Deus, unum baptisma:" and as it is still one faith which a man confesseth several times, and one sacrament of the eucharist, though a man often communicates; so it might be one baptism, though often ministered. And the unity of baptism might not be derived from the unity of the ministration, but from the unity of the religion into which they are baptized, though baptized a thousand times; yet, because it was still in the name of the Holy Trinity, still into the death of Christ, it might be "unum baptisma." Whether Sts. Cyprian, Firmilian, and their colleagues, had this discourse, or no, I know not; I am sure they might have had much better to have evacuated the force of that argument, although I believe they had the wrong cause in hand. But this is it that I say, that when a question is so undetermined in Scripture, that the arguments rely only upon such mystical places, whence the best fancies can draw the greatest variety, and such which perhaps were never intended by the Holy Ghost,—it were good the rivers did not swell higher than the fountain, and the confidence higher than the argument and evidence; for, in this case, there could not any thing be so certainly proved, as that the disagreeing party should deserve to be condemned, by a sentence of excommunication, for disbelieving it; and yet they were; which I wonder at so much the more, because they who, as it was since judged, had the right cause, had not any sufficient argument from Scripture, not so much as such mystical arguments, but did fly to the tradition of the church; in which also, I shall afterwards show, they had nothing that was absolutely certain.

6. Thirdly, I consider that there are divers places of Scripture containing in them mysteries and questions of great concernment, and yet the fabric and constitution is such, that there is no certain mark to determine, whether the sense of them should be literal or figurative; I speak not here concerning extrinsical means of determination, as traductive interpretations, councils, fathers, popes, and the like; I shall consider them afterwards in their several places; but here the subject matter being concerning Scripture in its own capacity, I say there is nothing in the nature of the thing to determine the sense and meaning, but it must be gotten out as it can; and that therefore it is unreasonable, that what of itself is ambiguous, should be understood in its own prime sense and intention under the pain of either a sin, or an anathema; I instance in that famous place from whence hath sprung that question of transubstantiation, "Hoc est corpus meum." The words are plain and clear, apt to be understood in the literal sense; and yet this sense is so hard, as it does violence to reason, and, therefore, it is the question, whether or no it be not a figurative speech. But here what shall we have to determine it? What mean soever we take, and to what sense you will expound it, you shall be put to give an account, why you expound other places of Scripture, in the same case, to quite contrary senses. For if you expound it literally, then, besides that it seems to intrench upon the words of our blessed Saviour, "The words that I speak, they are spirit and they are life," that is, to be spiritually understood (and it is a miserable thing to see what wretched shifts are used to reconcile the literal sense to these words, and yet to distinguish it from the Capernaitical fancy): but, besides this, why are not those other sayings of Christ expounded literally; "I am a vine," "I am the door," "I am a rock?" Why do we fly to a figure in those parallel words, "This is the covenant which I make between me and you?" and yet that covenant was but the sign of the covenant: and why do we fly to a figure, in a precept, as well as in mystery, and a proposition? "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off;" and yet we have figures enough to save a limb. If it be said, because reason tells us these are not to be expounded according to the letter; this will be no plea for them, who retain the literal exposition of the other instance, against all reason, against all philosophy, against all sense, and against two or three sciences. But if you expound these words figuratively, besides that you are to contest against a world of prejudices, you give yourself the liberty, which if others will use, when either they have a reason or a necessity so to do, they may, perhaps, turn all into allegory, and so may evacuate any precept, and elude any argument. Well, so it is that very wise men have expounded things allegorically,[x] when they should have expounded them literally. So did the famous Origen, who, as St. Jerome reports of him, turned paradise into an allegory, that he took away quite the truth of the story; and not only Adam was turned out of the garden, but the garden itself out of paradise. Others expound things literally, when they should understand them in allegory: so did the ancient Papias understand Christ's millenary reign upon earth,[y] and so depressed the hopes of christianity, and their desires to the longing and expectation of temporal pleasures and satisfactions: and he was followed by Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, Lactantius, and, indeed, the whole church generally, till St. Austin and St. Jerome's time, who, first of any whose works are extant, did reprove the error. If such great spirits be deceived in finding out what kind of senses be to be given to Scriptures, it may well be endured, that we, who sit at their feet, may also tread in the steps of them, whose feet could not always tread aright.

7. Fourthly, I consider that there are some places of Scripture that have the self-same expressions, the same preceptive words, the same reason and account, in all appearance; and yet, either must be expounded to quite different senses, or else we must renounce the communion and the charities of a great part of christendom. And yet there is absolutely nothing in the thing, or in its circumstances, or in its adjuncts, that can determine it to different purposes. I instance in those great exclusive negatives for the necessity of both sacraments: "Nisi quis renatus fuerit ex aquâ," &c. "Nisi manducaveritis carnem filii hominis," &c. a "non introibit in regnum cœlorum," for both these. Now, then, the first is urged for the absolute indispensable necessity of baptism, even in infants, insomuch that infants go to part of hell, if, inculpably, both on their own and their parents' part, they miss of baptism; for that is the doctrine of the church of Rome, which they learned from St. Austin; and others also do from hence baptize infants, though with a less opinion of its absolute necessity. And yet the same manner of precept, in the same form of words, in the same manner of threatening, by an exclusive negative, shall not enjoin us to communicate infants, though damnation, at least in form of words, be exactly, and "per omnia," alike appendant to the neglect of holy baptism, and the venerable eucharist. If "nisi quis renatus" shall conclude against the anabaptist, for necessity of baptizing infants, (as sure enough we say it does,) why shall not an equal "nisi comederitis" bring infants to the holy communion? The primitive church, for some two whole ages, did follow their own principles, wherever they led them; and seeing that, upon the same ground, equal results must follow, they did communicate infants as soon as they had baptized them. And why the church of Rome should not do so too, being she expounds "nisi comederitis" of oral manducation, I cannot yet learn a reason. And for others, they expound it of a spiritual manducation, why they shall not allow the disagreeing part the same liberty of expounding "nisi quis renatus," too, I by no means can understand. And, in these cases, no external determiner can be pretended in answer. For whatsoever is extrinsical to the words, as councils, traditions, church authority, and fathers, either have said nothing at all, or have concluded, by their practice, contrary to the present opinion, as is plain by their communicating infants by virtue of "nisi comederitis."

8. Fifthly; I shall not need to urge the mysteriousness of some points in Scripture, which "ex naturâ rei," are hard to be understood, though very plainly represented. For there are some "secreta theologiæ," which are only to be understood by persons very holy and spiritual; which are rather to be felt than discoursed of; and, therefore, if peradventure they be offered to public consideration, they will therefore be opposed, because they run the same fortune with many other questions; that is, not to be understood, and so much the rather because their understanding, that is, the feeling, such secrets of the kingdom, are not the results of logic and philosophy, nor yet of public revelation, but of the public spirit privately working; and in no man is a duty, but in all that have it is a reward,—and is not necessary for all, but given to some; producing its operations, not regularly, but upon occasions, personal necessities, and new emergencies. Of this nature are the spirit of obsignation, belief of particular salvation, special influences, and comforts coming from a sense of the spirit of adoption, actual fervours, and great complacencies in devotion, spiritual joys,—which are little drawings aside of the curtains of peace and eternity, and antepasts of immortality. But the not understanding the perfect constitution and temper of these mysteries, (and it is hard for any man so to understand, as to make others do so too that feel them not,) is cause, that, in many questions of secret theology, by being very apt and easy to be mistaken, there is a necessity in forbearing one another; and this consideration would have been of good use in the question between Soto and Catharinus, both for the preservation of their charity, and explication of the mystery.

9. Sixthly; But here it will not be unreasonable to consider, that all systems and principles of science are expressed, so that, either by reason of the universality of the terms and subject matter, or the infinite variety of human understandings, and these, peradventure, swayed by interest, or determined by things accidental and extrinsical,—they seem to divers men, nay, to the same men upon divers occasions, to speak things extremely desperate, and sometimes contrary, but very often of great variety. And this very thing happens also in Scripture, that if it were not in "re sacrâ et seriâ," it were excellent sport to observe how the same place of Scripture serves several turns upon occasion; and they

S. Script. dixit Basilius; ὡς κεκομψευμένον μὲν τὸν λόγον ἀποδεχόμεθα, ἀληθῆ δὲ εἶναι οὐ πάνυ δώσομεν. L. xx. de Civ. Dei, c. 7. præfat. L. xix. in Isai. et in c. 36. Ezek.

at that time believe the words sound nothing else; whereas in the liberty of their judgment and abstracting from that occasion, their commentaries understand them wholly to a differing sense. It is a wonder of what excellent use to the church of Rome, is "tibi dabo claves:" it was spoken to Peter, and none else (sometimes); and, therefore, it concerns him and his successors only; the rest are to derive from him. And yet, if you question them for their sacrament of penance, and priestly absolution, then "tibi dabo claves" comes in, and that was spoken to St. Peter, and, in him, to the whole college of the apostles, and, in them, to the whole hierarchy. If you question why the pope pretends to free souls from purgatory, "tibi dabo claves" is his warrant; but if you tell him the keys are only for binding and loosing on earth directly, and in heaven consequently; and that purgatory is a part of hell, or rather neither earth, nor heaven, nor hell, and so the keys seem to have nothing to do with it, then his commission is to be enlarged by a suppletory of reason and consequences, and his keys shall unlock this difficulty, for it is "clavis scientiæ," as well as "auctoritatis." And these keys shall enable him to expound Scriptures infallibly, to determine questions, to preside in councils, to dictate to all the world magisterially, to rule the church, to dispense with oaths, to abrogate laws: and if his key of knowledge will not, the key of authority shall, and "tibi dabo claves" shall answer for all. We have an instance in the single fancy of one man, what rare variety of matter is afforded from those plain words of "Oravi pro te, Petre;"[z] for that place (says Bellarmine[a]) is otherwise to be understood of Peter, otherwise of the popes, and otherwise of the church of Rome. And "pro te" signifies, that Christ prayed that Peter might neither err personally nor judicially; and that Peter's successors, if they did err personally, might not err judicially; and that the Roman church might not err personally. All this variety of sense is pretended by the fancy of one man, to be in a few words, which are as plain and simple as are any words in Scripture. And what then in those thousands that are intricate? So is done with "pasce oves," which a man would think were a commission as innocent and guiltless of designs, as the sheep in the folds are. But if it be asked, why the bishop of Rome calls himself universal bishop? "Pasce oves" is his warrant.—Why he pretends to a power of deposing princes? "Pasce oves," said Christ to Peter, the second time.—If it be demanded why also he pretends to a power of authorizing his subjects to kill him? "Pasce agnos," said Christ the third time:—And "pasce" is "doce," and "pasce" is "impera," and "pasce" is "occide." Now if others should take the same unreasonableness I will not say, but the same liberty in expounding Scripture; or if it be not license taken, but that the Scripture itself is so full and redundant in senses quite contrary, what man soever, or what company of men soever, shall use this principle, will certainly find such rare productions from several places, that either the unreasonableness of the thing will discover the error of the proceeding, or else there will be a necessity of permitting a great liberty of judgment where is so infinite variety, without limit or mark of necessary determination. If the first, then, because an error is so obvious and ready to ourselves it will be great imprudence or tyranny to be hasty in judging others; but if the latter, it is that I contend for: for it is most unreasonable, when either the thing itself ministers variety, or that we take license to ourselves in variety of interpretations, or proclaim to all the world our great weakness, by our actually being deceived, that we should either prescribe to others magisterially, when we are in error, or limit their understandings, when the thing itself affords liberty and variety.
